THE PREFACE.

undertake a worke of this mixture; mine owne reason though undertake a worke of this mixture; mine owne reason though exceeding weake, hath sufficiently resolved mee. For had it beene begotten then with my first dawne of day, when the light of common knowledge began to open it selfe to my younger yeares, and before any wound received, either from Fortune or Time: I might yet well have doubted that the darkness of Age 29

Death would have covered over both It and Mee, long before the performance. For beginning with the Creation, I have proceeded with the History of the World; and lastly purposed (some sew sallies excepted) to confine my Discourse, with this our renowned lland of Great Brittaine. I confesse that it had better sorted with my disability, the better part of whose times are run out in other travailes, to have set together (as I could) the unjoynted and scattered frame of our English affaires, than of the universall: in whom, had there beene no other defect (who am all defect) than the time of the day, it were enough; the day of a tempestuous life, drawn on to the very evening ere I began. But those inmost, and soule-piercing wounds, which are ever aking while uncoved: with the desire to satisfie those sew friends, which I have tryed by the fire of Adversity, the former enforcing, the later perswading, have caused me to make my thoughts legible, and my selfe the subject of every origin, wise or weake.

To the Forld I prefent them, to which I am nothing indebted: neither have of shere were, (Fortune changing), fled much better in any age. For Prosperity and Adversity baye evermore tyed and untyed oulgar affections. And as we fee transcriperience, That dogs doe alwayes barke at those they know not, and that it is their nature to accompany one another in those clamours: so it is with the inconsiderate multitude, who wanting that vertue which we call Plonesty in all men, and that effection if of O D which we call Charity in Christian men; condemn without bearing , wound without offence given; led thereunto by uncertaine report onely; which is Manifey truely acknowledgeth for the Author of all thes Demonolog. Rumor, res sine teste, sine judice, maligna, fallax, Rumor is without witnesse, without judge, malicious and deceiveable. This vanity of vulgar opinion it was that gave Saint Augustine Argument to affirme, That he feared the praise of good men, and detefted that of the evill. And berein no man hath given a better rule, than this of Landonia bond Seucca Conscientia farsfaciamus nihil in famam laboremus, sequatur time, e amais vel mala, dum bene metearis. we deserve well

For my selfe, if I have in any thing served my Country, and prized it before my private: the generall acceptation can yeeld me no other profit at this time, than doth a faire sunshine day to a Sea-man after shipwrack; & the contrary no other harm than an outragious tempest after the Port attained. I know that I lost the love of many, for my fidelity towards Her, whom I must still honour in the dust: though further than the defence of her excellent person, Inever persecuted any man. Of those that did it, and by what device they did it, He that is the Supreme Judge of all the world, hath taken the accompt: fo as for this kinde of Suffering, I must far with Seneca, Mala opinio, bene parta, delectat.

As for other men; if there be any that have made themselves Fathers of that fame, which hath been begotten for them: I can neither envy at such their purchased glory nor much lament mine owne mishap in that kind : but content my selfe to lay with Virgil, Sicvos non vobis, in many particulars. To labour other latisfaction, were an effect of phrenzie, not of hope, feeing it is not Truth, but Opinion that can travaile the World without a paß-port. For were it otherwise; and were there not as many internall formes of the minde, as there are externall figures of men; there were then some possibility to persuade by the mouth of one Advocate.

But fuch is the multiplying of extensive vertue of dead Earth of that breath viving life which God hath cast upon slime & dust, as that among those that were of whom we read and heare. of among those that are whom we see or converse with. every one bath received a severall picture of face, and every one a divers picture of minde every one a forme apart, every one a fancy & cogitation differing there being nothing wherein Nature so much triumpheth as in dissimilitude. From whence it commeth that there is found so great diversity of opinions fostrong a contrariety of inclinations fo many natural & unnatural; wife foolish, manly & childish affe-Etions and passions in mortall men. For it is not the visible fashion and shape of plants, and of reasonable Creatures, that makes the difference of working in the one, and of condition in the other; but the forme internall.

And though it hath pleased God to reserve the Art of reading mens thoughts to himselfe: yet, as the fruit tels the name of the Tree. so do the outward works of men (So far as their cogitatios are acted) give us wherof to ghess at the rest. Nay, it were not hard to expresse the one by the other, very neere the life, did not craft in many, feare in the most, and the worlds love in all, teach every capacity, according to the compasse it hath, to qualifie and maske over their inward desormities for a time. Though it be also true, Nemo potest diu personam serre fictam: cito in naturam suam residunt, quibus veritas non subest: No man can long continue masked in a counterfeit behaviour: the things that are forced for pretences having no ground of truth, cannot long diffemble their own natures. Neither can any man (faith Plutarch) so change himselfe, but that his heart may bee sometimes seene at his tongues end.

In this great discord and dissimilitude of reasonable Creatures, if we direct our selves to the Multitude. Omnis honestæ rei malus judex est vulgus: The common people are evill Judges of honest things, and whose Wisedome (saith Ecclesiastes) is to be despised: if to the better fort: every understanding bath a peculiar judgement, by which it both censureth other men, & valueth it self. And therefore unto me it will not seeme strange, though I finde these my worthlesse papers torn with Rats: seeing the flothfull Censurers of all ages have not spared to taxe the Reverend Fathers of the Church, with Ambitio, the severest men to themselves, with Hypocrisie; the greatest lovers of Justice, with Popularity and those of the truest valour and fortitude, with vaine-glory. But of these natures which lie in mait to finde fault, and to turne good into evill, seeing Solomon complained long Ecclesiers fince; and that the very age of the world renders it every day after other more mali-Nihilfadius cious . I must leave the professors to their easie wayes of reprehension than which realisms there is nothing of more facility.

To me it belongs in the first part of this Preface, following the common & approved cultome of thole, who have left the memories of time past to after ages. to give. as neere as I can the same right to History which they have done. Yet Jeeing therein I should but borrow other mens words. I will not trouble the Reader with the rebetition. True it is that among many other benefits, for which it hath bin honoured. in this one it triumpheth over all bumane knowledge, That it hath given us life in our understanding, since the world it selfe had life and beginning, even to this day: yea, it hath triumphed over time, which besides it nothing but eternity hath triumphed over: for it hath carried our knowledge over the vast and devouring space of many thousands of yeares, and given so faire and piercing eyes to our mind that we plainly behold living now (as if we had lived then) that great world, Magni Dei Capiens opus, The wifework (faith Hermes) of a great GoD, as it was then when but new to it selfe. By it (I/ay) it is that we live in the very time when it was created: we behold how it was governed: how it was covered with waters, and avaine repeopled: How Kings and Kingdomes have flourished and fallen, and for what vertue and piety God made prosperous; and for what vice and deformity he made wretched both the one and the other. And it is not the least debt which we owe unto History, that it bath made us acquainted with our dead Auncestors and out of the depth and darknesse of the earth, delivered us their memory and same. In aword, wee may gather out of History a policy no leffe wife than eternall; by the comparison and application of other mens fore-passed miseries with our owne like errours & ill defervings. But it is neither of Examples the most lively instruction. nor the words of the wisestmen, nor the terrour of future torments, that hath yet so Perought in our blind and stupisted mindes, as to make us remember, That the infinite eye and wisedome of God doth pierce through all our pretences; as to make us remember That the justice of God does require none other accuser, than our owne consciences: which neither the false beauty of our apparent actions nor all the formality, which (to pacifie the opinions of men) we put on: can in any, or the least kind cover from his knowledge. And so much did that heathen wisedome confesse. no way as yet qualified by the knowledge of a true God. If any (faith Euripides) having in his life committed wickednesse, thinke hee can hide it from the everlasting gods, he thinkes not well.

To repeat GOD Sjudgements in particular, upon those of all degrees, which bave played with his mercies; would require a volume apart: for the Sca of examples hath no bottome. The markes, set on private men, are with their bodies cast into the earth; and their fortunes, written onely in the memories of those that lived with them: so as they who succeed, and have not seene the fall of others, doe not feare their owne faults. GODS judgements upon the greater and greatest have beene left to posterity; first, by those happy hands which the Holy Ghost bath guided, and secondly, by their vertue, who have gathered the acts and ends of men mighty and remarkable in the world. Now to point farre off, and to speake of the conversion of Angells into Divells , for Ambition : Or of the greatest and most glorious Kings, who have gnawne the grasse of the earth with beasts for bride and ingratitude towards GOD: Or of that wife working of Pharach, when hee Que the Infants of Israel, ere they had recovered their (radles: Or of the policy of Tezabel, incovering the murder of Naboth by a triall of the Elders, according to the Law with many thousands of the like: what were it other than to make an hopelesse proofe, that farre-off examples would not be left to the same farre-off respects, as heretofore? For who hath not observed, what labour practice, perill bloudshed, and cruelty, the Kings and Princes of the world have undergone. exercifed, taken on them, and committed; to make themselves and their issues masters of the world? And yet hath Babylon, Persia, Egypt, Syria, Macedon, Carthage. Rome, o the rest, no fruit, no flower, grass, nor leaf, springing upon the face of the earth, of those seeds: No, their very roots and ruines doe hardly remain. Omnia quæ manu hominum facta sunt, vel manu hominum evertuntur, vel stando & durando deficiunt: All that the hand of man can make, is evther overturned by the hand of man, or at length by standing and continuing confumed. The reasons of whose ruines, are diversly given by those that ground their opinions on second causes. All Kingdoms and States have fallen (say the Politicians by outward and forrain force, or by inward negligence & diffention or by a third cause arising from both. Others observe, That the greatest have sunk downe under their owne weight; of which Livie bath a touch : co crevit, ut magnitudine laboret sua: Others, That the divine providence (which Cratippus obje-Eted to Pompey) hath set downe the date and period of every Estate. before their first foundation and erection. But hereof I will give my selfe a day over to

For seeing the first bookes of the following story, have undertaken the discourse of the first Kings and Kingdomes: and that it is impossible for the short life of a Preface, to travaile after, and overtake farre-off Antiquity, and to judge of it; I will, for the present, examine what profit hath been gathered by our own Kings, their Neighbour Princes: who having beheld, both in divine to humane letters, the successe of insidelity, injustice, and cruelty; have (notwithstanding) planted after

True it is, that the judgements of all men are not agreeable; nor (which is more strange) the affection of any one man stirred up a-like with examples of like nature: But every one is touched most, with that which most neerely seemeth to touch his owne private; Or otherwise best suteth with his apprehension. But the judgements of GOD are for ever unchangeable; neyther is hee wearied by the long processe of time, and won to give his blessing in one age, to that which he hath cursed in another. Wherefore those that are wise, or whose wisedome if it bee not great, yet is true and well grounded; will bee able to discerne the bitter fruites of irreligious policy, as well among those examples that are sound in ages removed farre from the present, as in those of latter times. And that it may no lesse appeare appeare by evident proofe, than by affeveration, That ill doing hash alwayes beene attended with ill successe; will here, by way of Preface, run over some examples, which the worke ensuing bath not reached.

Among our Kings of the Norman race, we have no sooner passed over the violence of the Norman Conquest, than we encounter with a singular and most remarkable example of Gods Justice, upon the children of Henry the first. For that King, when both by force craft and cruelty, he had disposses, overreacht, and lastly wade blinde and destroyed his elder Brother Robert Duke of Normandy, to make his owne sonnes Lords of this Land: GOD cast them all, Male and Female, Nephewes and Neeces (Maud excepted) into the bottome of the Sea, with above a hundred and sifty others that attended them; whereof a great many were Noble, and of the King dearly beloved.

To passe over the rest, till we come to Edward the Second, it is certaine, that after the murder of that King, the issue of bloud then made, though it had some times of stay and stopping, did againe breake out, and that so often and in such aboundance, as all our Princes of the Masculine race (very sew excepted) dyed of the same disease. And although the young yeares of Edward the Third, made his knowledge of that horrible fact no more than suspicious: yet in that he afterwards caused his owne Uncle the Earle of Kent to die, for no other offence than the desire of his Brothers redemption, whom the Earle as then supposed to be living; the King making that to be treason in his Uncle, which was indeed treason in himself, had his Uncles intelligence been true) this I say made it manifest, that he was not ignorant of what had past, nor greatly desirous to have had it otherwise; though be caused Mortimer to die for the same.

This cruelty the secret and unsearchable judgement of GOD revenged on the Grand-child of Edward the Third: and so it fellout, even to the last of that line. that in the second or third descent they were all buried under the ruines of those buildings of which the Mortar had beene tempered with innocent bloud. For Richard the Second, who faw both his Treasurers, his Chancellor, and his Steward, with divers others of his Counfellors, some of them flaughtered by the people others in his absence executed by his enemies, yet hee alwayes tooke himselfe for over-wife, to be taught by examples. The Earles of Huntingdon and Kent, Montagu & Spencer, who thought themselves as great Politicians in those daies as others have done in these: hoping to please the King, and to secure themselves, by the murder of Gloucester. died soone after with many other their adherents. by the like violent hands; and far more shamefully than did that Duke. And as for the King himselfe (who in regard of many deedes, unworthy of his Greatnesse cannot be excused, as the disavowing himselfe by breach of Faith. Charters, Pardons and Patents): Hee was in the prime of his youth deposed, and murdered by his Cofen Germane and vaffall, Henry of Lancaster, afterwards Henry the Fourth.

This King, whose Title was weake, we his obtaining the Crowne traiterouse who brake faith with the Lords at his Landing, protesting to intend onely the recovery of his proper inheritance, brake faith with Richard himselse; and brake faith with all the Kingdome in Parliament, to whom he swore that the deposed King should live. After that hee had enjoyed this Realme some few yeares, and in that time had beene set upon on all sides by his Subjects, and never free from founded and rooted in Adamant. Now for Henry the fixt, upon whom the great storm of his Grand-fathers grievous faults fell, as it formerly had done upon Richard the Grand-childe of Edward: although he was generally esteemed for a gentle & innocent Prince, yet as be refused the daughter of Armaignac, of the House of Navarre, the greatest of the Princes of France, to whom he was affianced (by which match he might have defended his inheritance in France) or married the daughter of Anjou, (by which he lost all that he had in France) foin condescending to the unworthy death of bis Uncle of Glocester, the maine and strong Pillar of the house of Lancaster. He drew on himselse of this kingdom the greatest joynt-losse of dishonour that ever it Sustained since the Norman conquest. Of whom it may truly be said which a Counfellor of his own spake of Henry the third of France, Q'uil estoit une fort gentile Prince: mais son reigne est advenu en une fort mauvois temps: That hee was avery gentle Prince; but his reigne happened in a verie unfortunate

It is true that Buckingham and Suffolk were the practifers and contrivers of the Dukes death: Buckingham and Suffolk, because the Duke gave instructions to their authority, which otherwise under the Queene had been absolute the Queene in respect of her personall wound, spretæque injuria formæ, because Gloucester dissipaded her marriage. But the fruit was answerable to the seed; the success to the Counsell. For after the cutting downe of Gloucester, Yorke grew up sofast, as he dared to dispute his right both by arguments and armes in which quarrell, Suffolke and Buckingham, with the greatest number of cheir adherents, were dissolved. And although for his breach of Oath by Sacrament, it pleased God to strike down Yorke: yet bis son the Earle of March, following the plaine path which his Father bad troden out, despoiled Henry the Father, and Edward the Son, both of their lives and Kingdome. And what was the end now of that politique Lady the Queenc, other than this. That she lived to behold the wretched ends of all her partakers: that she lived to looke on, while her Husband the King, and her only son the Prince, were hewen in sunder; while the Crowne was set on his head that did it? Shee lived to see her selfe despoiled of her Estate, and of her moveables: and lastly, her father, by rendering upt, the Crowne of France the Earledome of Provence and other places, for the payment of fifty thousand crownes for her Ransome, to be come aftarke Beggar. And this was the end of that subtilty, which Siracides cal-siraching. leth fine but unrighteous: for other fruit bath it never yeelded fince the world

And now it came to Edward the fourths turn (though after many difficulties) to triumbh. For all the plants of Lancaster were rooted up, one only Earle of Richmond excepted: whom also he had once bought of the Duke of Brittain, but could not hold him. And yet was not this of Edward fuch a Plantation, as could any way bromise it selfe stability. For this Edward the King (to omit more than many of his other cruelties) beheld and allowed the flaughter which Gloucester, Dorfer. Hastings, and others, made of Edward the Prince in his owne presence : of which travicall Actors, there was not one that escaped the judgement of GOD in the Same kinde. And He, which (besides the execution of his brother Clarence, for none other offence than he himselfe had formed in his own imagination) instructed Gloucester to kill Henry the fixt, his Predeceffour : taught him also by the same Art to kill bis own fons and successors, Edward and Richard. For those Kings which have fold the bloud of others at a low rate, have but made the mantet for their owne enemies, to buy of theirs at the same price.

To Edward the Fourth succeeded Richard the Third, the greatest Master in mischiefe of all that fore-went him: who although, for the necessity of his Tragedy, he had more parts to play, and more to performe in his owne person, than all the rest; yet he so well fitted every affection that playd with him, as if each of them had but afted his owne interest. For he wrought so cunningly upon the affections of Hastings and Buckingham, enemies to the Queene and to all her kindred, as be easily allured them to condescend that Rivers and Grey, the Kings Maternall Uncle and halfe brother, should (for the first) be severed from him: secondly . hee brought their confent to have them imprisoned : and lastly (for the avoiding of future inconvenience) to have their heads severed from their bodies. And having now brought those his chiefe instruments to exercise that common pre- Scelerasceleras cept which the Devill hath written on every post, namely, To depress those whom bus wends. they had grieved, and to destroy those whom they had deprest; Hee urged that argument so far and so forcibly : as nothing but the death of the young King bim. felfe of his brother could fashion the conclusion. For he caused it to be hammered into Buckinghams head, That, when soever the King or his Brother, should have able yeares to exercise their power, they would take a most severe revenge of that curelesse wrong offered to their Uncle and Brother, Rivers and Grey.

But this was not his manner of reasoning with Hastings, whose fidelity to his Masters Sonnes was without suspect : and yet the Divell, who never dissipades by impossibility taught him to try him. And fo be did. But when he found by Catesby who founded him, that he was not fordable; He first resolved to kill him sitting in councell: wherein having failed with his sword, He set the Hangman upon him, with a weapon of more weight. And because nothing else could move his appear vite. He canfed his head to be stricken off, before he eate his dinner. A greater judgement of God, than this upon Hastings, I have never observed in any storie. For the selfe same day that the Barle Rivers, Grey, and others, were (without triall of law, or offence given) by Hastings advice executed at Pomfret: Isay Hastings bimselfe in the same day, and (as I take it) in the same houre, in the same law-lesse manner had his head stricken off in the Tower of London.

But Bucking ham lived a while longer; and with an eloquent oration perswaded the Londoners to elect Richard for their king. And having received the Earledome of Hereford for reward, besides the high hope of marrying his daughter to the Kings onely some; after many grievous vexations of mind, and unfortunate attempts, being in the end betrayed and delivered up by his trustiest servant; Hee had his head severed from his body at Salisbury, without the trouble of any of his Peers. And what successe had Richard himself after all these mischieses on murders, policies, and counter-policies to Christian religion: and after such time as with a most mercilesse hand he had pressed out the breath of his Nephewes on Natural Lords; other than the prosperity of so short a life, as it tooke end, ere himselfe could well looke over and discerne it? the great out-cry of innocent bloud, obtained at GODS hands the effusion of his, who became a spectacle of shame and dishonour, both to his friends and enemies.

This cruell King, Henry the 7.cut off; and was therin (no doubt) the immediate instrument of Gods Justice. A politick Prince be was if ever there were any, who by the engine of his wisedome, beat downe and overturned as many strong oppositions both before and after he wore the Crown, as ever King of England did: I say by his wisdome, because as he ever left the rains of his affection in the hands of his prosit, so he alwayes weighed his undertakings by his abilities, leaving nothing more to hazzard than so much as cannot be denied it in all humane actions. He had well observed the proceedings of Loys the 11. whom he followed in all that was royall or royall-like, but he was far more just, ever begun not their processes whom he hated or feared by the execution, as Loys did.

He could never endure any mediation in rewarding his fervants, and therin exceeding wife; for what soever himselfe gave, he himselfe received back the thankes of the love, knowing it welthat the affections of men (purchased by nothing so readily as by benefits) were trains that better became great kings, than great subjects. On the contrary, in what soever he grieved his subjects, he wisely put it off on those, that he found fit ministers for such actions. How soever the taking off of Stanlies head, who see the Crown on his, and the death of the young Earle of Warwick, som to George D. of Clarence, shews, as the successe also did that he held somewhat of the errors of his Ancestors; for his possession in the first line ended in his grand-children, as that of Edward the Third and Henry the Fourth had done.

Now for King Henry the eight: if all the pictures and patternes of a mercilesse Prince were lost in the World, they might all againe be painted to the life, out of the story of this King. For how many servants did he advance in hast (but for what vertue no man could suspect) and with the change of his samie ruined againe; no man knowing for what offence? To how many others of more desert gave he aboundant slowers from whence to gather bony, and in the end of Harvest burnt them in the Hive? How many wives did he cutoff, so cast off, as his sancy so affection chaged? How many Princes of the bloud (whereof some of them for age could hardly crawle towards the blocke) with a world of others of all degrees (of whom our common (bronicles have kept she accompt) did he execute? yea, in his very death-bed, and when hee was at the point to have given his accompt so GOD for the aboundance of blow! already spilt: He imprisoned the Duke of Norfolke the Father; or executed the Earle of Surrey the son; whose deservings have knew not how to value, having never omitted any thing that concerned his owne has nour & the kings fervice; the other never having comitted any thing worthy of his least displeasure: the one exceeding valiant and advised; the other no lesse valiant than learned, and of excellent hope. But besides the sorrowes which he heaped upon the Fatherleffe and Widowes at home: and besides the vaine enterprises abroad. wherein it is thought that be confumed more treasure than all our victorious Kings did in their severall Conquests: what causelesse and cruell wars did be make upon bis own Nephew King James the fift? What Lawes and Wils did he devise toestablish this Kingdome in his owne Issues? using his sharpest weapons to cut off, and cut downe thole branches, which sprang from the same root that himselfe did And in the end (notwithstanding these his so many irreligious provisions) it pleased God to take away all his owne without increase, though, for themselves in their severall kindes, all Princes of eminent vertue. For thefe words of Samuel to Agao King of the Amalekites, have beene verified upon many others: As thy sword hath made other women childlesse, so shall thy mother be childlesse among other women. And that bloud which the same King Henry affirmed, that the cold aire of Scotland had frozen up in the North, God hath diffused by the sun-Chine of his grace: from whence His Majesty now living, and long to live is descended. Of whom I may say it truly, That if al the malice of the world were infused into one everyet could it not discerne in his life, even to this day, any one of those foule hoes by which the consciences of all the forenamed Princes (in effect) have bin defiled nor any drop of that innocent bloud on the sword of his suffice, with which the most that fore-went him have stained both their hands and fame. And for this fromne of England; it may truely be avowed: That he hath received it even from the hand of God, and hath staied the time of putting it on, how soever he were propoked to hasten it: That he never tooke revenge of any man, that sought to put him beside it: That he refused the assistance of Her enemies, that wore it long. with as great glory as ever Princessedid: That his Majesty entred not by a breach, nor by bloud; but by the Ordinary gate, which his owne right fet open; and into which by a generall love and obedience, He was received. And how foever His Majeffics preceding title to this Kingdome, was preferred by many Princes (witnessethe Treaty at Cambray in the yeare 1559) yet he never pleased to dispute it, during the life of that renowned Lady his Predecessor : no notwithstanding the injury of not being declared Heire in all the time of Her long reigne.

Neither ought we to forget, or neglect our thankfulnesse to GOD for the uniting of the Northen parts of Brittany to the South, to wit, of Scotland to England, which though they were severed but by small brookes and bankes, yet by reason of the long continued warre, and the cruelties exercised upon each other, in the affection of the Nations, they were infinitly severed. This I say is not the least of Gods blessings which His Majesty bath brought with him unto this Land: No, put all our petty grievances together, wheap them up to their hight, they will appeare but as a Mole-bill compared with the Mountaine of this concord. And if all the Historians since then have acknowledged the uniting of the Red-Rose, and the White, for the greatest bappinesse (Christian Religion excepted) that ever this Kingdome received from GOD, certainly the peace betweene the two Lions of gold and gules, and the making them one doth by many degrees exceed the former, for by it, besides the sparing of our british bloud, heretofore and during the difference, so ften and abundantly shed, the state of England is more assured, the Kingdome more enabled to recover her ancient honour and rights, and by it made more invincible than by all our former alliances, practices, policies, o conquests. It is true that hereof we doe not yet finde the effect. But had the Duke of Parma in the yeare 1588. jouned the army which he commanded, with that of Spaine, and landed it on the South coast. & had his Majesty at the same time declared himselfe against us in the North: it is easie to divine what had become of the liberty of England, certainly me would then without murmur have brought this union a farre greater praise than it bath fince cost us. It is true, that there was never any Comon weale or Kingdom in the world, wherein no man had cause to lament. Kings live in the world, and not above it. They are not infinit to examine every mans cause, or to relieve every mans mants. And yet in the latter, (though to his some prejudice) His Majesty hath had more compassion of other mens necessities, than of his owne (offers. Of whom it may be said, as of Solomon, Dedit Deus Solomoni latitudinem cordis: Which if other men do not understand with Pineda, to be meant by Liberality, but by Latitude of knowledge; yet may it be better spoken of His Majesty, than of any King that ever England had; who as well in divine, as humane understanding bath exceeded all that fore-went him, by many degrees.

I could say much more of the Kings Majesty, without flatterie: did Inot feare the imputation of presumption, withall suspect, that it might befall these papers of mine (though the losse were little) as it did the Pictures of Queen Elizabeth. made by unskilfull and common Painters, which by her owne commandement were knockt in pieces and cast into the fire. For ill Artists, in setting out the beauty of the externall; and weake writers, in describing the vertues of the internall; doe often leave to posterity, of well formed faces a deformed memory; and of the most Perfect and Princely mindes, a most defective representation. It may suffice. and there needes no other discourse; if the honest Reader but compare the cruell and turbulent passages of our former Kings, and of other their Neighbour-Princes (of whom for that purpose I have inserted this briefe discourse) with His Maicflies temperate revengeleffe and liberall disposition: I say that if the honest Reader weigh them justly and with an even hand; and withall but bestow every deformed child on his true Parent; He shall find, that there is no man that hath so just cause to complaine, as the King himselfe hath. Now as wee have told the successe of the trumperies and cruelties of our owne Kings, and other great personages: so we finde, that GOD is every where the same GOD. And as it pleased bim to punish the usurpation, or unnaturall cruelty of Henry the first, er of our third Edward, in their Children for many generations: so dealt Hee with the sons of Loys Debonaire, the son of Charles the great, or Charlemaine. For after such time as Debonaire of France, had torne out the eyes of Bernard his Nephen, the fon of Pepin the eldest son of Charlemaine, and heire of the Empire, and then caused him to die in prison, as did our Henry to Robert his eldest brother: there followed nothing but murders upon murders, poyfoning, imprisonments, and civill war; till the whole race of that famous Emperour was extinguished. And though Debonaire, after he had rid himselfe of his nephew by a violent death; and of his bastard brothers by a civil death (having inclosed them with sure gard, all the daies of their lives, within a Monastery) held himself secure from all opposition: Yet God raised up against him (which he saspected not) his own sons to vex him to invade him to take him prisoner, and to depose him bis own sons with whom (to satisfie their ambition) be had shared his estate, and given them Crownes to weare, and Kingdomes to governe, during his owne life Yea his eldest Jon Lothaire (for he had foure, three by bis first wife, and one by his second; to wit, Lothaire, Pepin, Loys, and Charles) made it the cause of his deposition, That hee had used violence towards his brothers and kin [men; and that he had suffered his Nephew (whom he might have delivered) to be flaine. Eo quod, saith the Text, fratribus, & propinquis violentiam seen Balquiere intulerit, & nepotem suum, quem ipse liberare poterat, interfici permiserit: vecher. Ly a. 1. Because he used violence to his Brothers and Kinsmen, and suffered his Nephew to be slaine whom he might have delivered.

Yet did be that which few Kings doe; namely, repent him of his cruelty. For among many other things which hee performed in the Generall Assembly of the States, it followes: Post hac autem palam se errasse confessus, & imitatus pass, tindent, Imperatoris Theodofii exemplum, ponitentiam spontaneam suscepit, tam de his, quam quæ in Bernardum proprium nepotem gesserat: After this hee did openly confesse himselfe to have erred, and following the example of the Emperour Theodofius, hee underwent voluntary penance, as well for his other offences, as for that which he had done against Bernard his own Nephew.

This he did and it was praise-worthy. But the Bloud that is unjustly spile. is not againe gathered up from the ground by repentance. These Media cines, ministred to the dead, have but dead rewards.

This King, as I have faid, had foure Sonnes. To Lothaire his eldest he gave the Kingdome of Italy: as Charlemaine, his father, had done to Pepin the father of Bernard, who was to succeed him in the Empire. To Pepin the second son hee gave the Kingdome of Aquitaine: to Loys, the Kingdome of Bavier: and to Charles. whom he had by a second wife called Judith, the remainder of the Kingdome of France. But this second wife, being a Mother-in-law to the rest, perswaded Debonaire to cast his son Pepin out of Aquitain; therby to greaten Charles. which. after the death of his sonne Pepin, he prosecuted to effect, against his Grand-child bearing the same name. In the mean while, being invaded by his son Loys of Bavi-

Debonaire dead, Lovs of Bavier, and Charles afterwards called the bald, their Nephew Pepin of Aquitaine, joyne in league against the Emperour Lothaire their eldest Brother. They fight neere to Auxerre the most bloudy battaile that ever was stroken in France: in which, the marvellous losse of Nobility, on men of war, gave courage to the Saracens to invade Italy; to the Hunnes to fall upon Almaine; the Danes to enter upon Normandy. Charles the bald by treason feizethupon his Nephew Pepin, kils him in a Cloyster : Carloman rebels against his Father Charles the bald, the Father burns out the eyes of his son Car-Ioman Bavier invades the Emperour Lothaire his brother, Lothaire quits the Empire, Hee is affailed and wounded to the heart by his owne conscience, for his rebellion against his Father, and for his other cruelties, and dies in a Monastery. Charles the bald, the Uncle oppresseth his Nephewes the Sonnes of Lothaire, hee usurpeth the Empire to the prejudice of Loys of Bavier his elder Brother; Baviers armies and his Sonne Carloman are beaten, hee dies of griefe, the Usurper Charles is poyloned by Zedechias a Jew his Physician, his Son Loys le Beque dies of the same drinke. Beque bad Charles the simple and two Bastards, Loys and Carloman; they rebell against their Brother, but the eldest breakes his Neck, the younger is slain by a wild Bore; the son of Baviere had the same ill destiny, and brake his Neck by a fall out of a window in sporting with his companions. Charles the groffe becomes Lord of all that the sonnes of Debonaire beld in Germany ; where with not contented, he invades Charles the fimple: but being forfaken of his Nobility, of his wife, and of his understanding. he dies a distracted beggar. Charles the simple is held in Wardship by Eudes Maior of the Pallace, then by Robert the Brother of Eudes: and lastly, being taken by the Earle of Vermandois, hee is forced to dye in the prison of Peron. Loys the sonne of Charles the simple breakes his Neck in chasing a Wolfe, and of the two sonnes of this Loys, the one dies of poyson, the other dies in the prison of Orleans; after whom Hugh Capet, of another race, and a stranger to the French. makes himselfe King.

These miserable ends had the issues of Debonaire; who after he had once apparrelled injustice with authority, his Jonnes and successours tooke up the fashion and pore that Garment fo long without other provision, as when the same was torne from their shoulders, every man despised them as miserable so naked beggars. The pretched successe they had, (faith a learned French-man) shewes, que en cefte mort il y avoit plus du fait des hommes que de Dieu, ou de la justice: that in the death of that Prince, to wit, of Bernard the son of Pepin, the true heir of Charlemaine, men had more medling than either God, or Justice had.

But to come neerer home; it is certaine that Francis the first, One of the worthiest Kings (except for that fast) that ever the French-men had, did never enion himselfe, after he had commended the destruction of the Protestants of Mirandoler Cabrieres, to the Parliament of Provence, which poore people were therupon burnt and murdered; men, women, and children. It is true that the faid King Francis repented him elfe of the fact, and gave charge to Henry his sonne to doe instice upon the Murderers, threatning his sonne with GODS judgements if he neglected it. But this unseasonable care of his, GOD was not pleased to accept for payment. For after Henry himselfe was staine in sport by Montgomery. mee all may remember what became of his foure sonnes, Francis, Charles, Henry, and Hercules. Of which although three of them became Kings, and were married to beautifulland vertuous Ladies: yet were they, one after another, cast out of the world, without stock or seed. And notwithstanding their subtilty and breach of faith: with all their Massacres upon those of the religion, and great effusion of blond, the (rowne was set on his bead, whom they all laboured to diffolve; the Protestants remaine more in number than ever they were, and hold to this day more strong cities than ever they had.

Let us now see if God be not the same God in Spaine, as in England & France. Towards whom wee will looke no further backe than to Don Pedro of Castile: in respect of which Prince, all the Tyrants of Sicil, our Richard the third, and the great Evan Vasilowick of Moscovia, were but petty ones: this Castilian, of all Christian and Heathen Kings, having beene the most mercilesse. For besides those of his own Bloud and Nobility, which he caused to be slaine in his owne Court and Chamber, as Sancho Ruis, the great Master of Calatrava, Ruis Gonsales, Alphonso Tello, and Don John of Arragon, whom hee cut in pieces and cast into the streets, denying him Christian burial: I say be sides these, and the slaughter of Gomes Mauriques, Diego Peres, Alphonso Gomes, and the great Commander of Castile; He made away the two Infants of Arragon bis Cofengermans, his brother Don Frederick, Don John de la Cerde, Albuquergues, Nugnes de Guzman, Cornel, Cabrera, Tenorio, Mendes de Toledo, Guttiere his great Treasurer, and all his kindred; of a world of others. Neither did he spare his two youngest brothers, innocent Princes: whom after he had kept in close prison from their Cradles, tillone of them had lived sixteene yeares, and the other fourteene, he murdered them there. Nay he spared not his Mother, nor his Wife the Lady Blanch of Bourbon. Lastly, as he caused the Archbishop of Toledo, or the Dean to be killed of purpose to enjoy their treasures: so did he put to death Maho-Histof Spains met Aben Alhamar King of Barbary, with 37.0f his Nobility, that came unto him for succour, with a great summe of money, to levy (by his favour) some companies of souldiers to returne withall. Yea, he would needs assist the Hangman with his owne hand, in the execution of the old King; in so much as Pope Urban declareth him an enemy both to God and Man. But what was his end? Having been formerly beaten out of his Kingdome, and re-established by the valour of the English Nation, led by the famous Duke of Lancaster: He was stabled to death by bis younger Brother the Earle of Astramara, who disposseft all bis (hildren of their inheritance, which, but for the Fathers injustice and cruelty, had never beene in danger of any fuch thing.

If we can parallel any man with this King, it must be Duke John of Burgoigne. who, after his traiterous murder of the Duke of Orleans, caused the Constable of Armagnac, the Chancellor of France, the Bishops of Coffance, Bayeux, Eureux, Senlis, Saintes, and other religious and reverend Church-men, the Earle of gran Pré, Hector of Chartres, and (in effect) all the officers of justice, of the (hamber of Accompts, Treasury, and request, (with fixteene hundred others to accompany them) to be suddenly and violently slaine. Hereby, while he hoped to governe, and to have mastred France: He was soone after strucken with an axe in the face, in the presence of the Dauphin; and, without any leisure to repent his misseeds, pre- French in Anno 1418. fently flaine. These were the Lovers of other mens miseries: and misery his sonne, the Prince of Spaine, the greatest Monarch of the world : saw him die in the flower of his yeares; and his wife great with childe, with her untimely birth, at once & together buried. His eldest daughter married unto Don Alphoso Prince of Portugall, beheld her first husband breake his necke in her presence; and being with childe by her second, died with it. A just judgement of God upon the race of John, father to Alphonso, now wholly extinguished: who had not onely left many disconsolate Mothers in Portugall, by the slaughter of their children; but had formerly staine with his owne hand, the sonne and onely comfort of his Aunt the Lady Beatrix, Dutchesse of Visco. The second daughter of Ferdinand, married to the Arch-Duke Philip, turned foole, and died mad and deprived. His third daughter, bestowed on King Henry the eight, He saw cast off by the King the mother of many troubles in England; and the mother of a daughter, that in her unhappy zeale (hed a world of innocent bloud; lost Calice to the French; and died heart-broken without increase. To conclude, all those Kingdomes of Ferdinand have masters of a new name; and by a strange family are governed and possest.

Now for the Kings of Spaine, which lived both with Henry the feventh, Hen? Ty the eight, Queene Mary, and Queene Elizabeth; Ferdinand of Arragon was the first : and the first that laid the foundation of the present Austrian greatnesse. For this King did not content himselfe to hold Arragon by the usurpation of his Ancestor; so to fasten thereunto the Kingdome of Castile and Leon, which lsabel his wife held by strong hand, and his assistance, from her owne Neece the Daughter of the last Henry: but most cruelly and craftily, without all colour or pretence of right, Hee also cast his owne Neece out of the Kingdome of Navarre, and, contrary to faith, and the promise that hee made to restore it, fortified the best places, and so wasted the rest, as there was no means lest for any army to invade it. This King, Isay, that betrayed also Ferdinand and Frederick Kings of Naples, Princes of his owne bloud, and by double alliance tyed unto him; sold them to the French: and with the same Army, sent for their succour under Gonsalvo, cast them out; and shared their Kingdome with the French, whom afterwards he most Shamefully betrayed.

Charles the fift, son to the Arch-Duke Philip, in whose vaine enterprises upon the French, upon the Almans, and other Princes and States, so many multitudes of Christian souldiers, and renowned Captaines were consumed: who gave the while a most perillous entrance to the Turkes, and suffered Rhodes, the Key of Christendom, to be taken; was in conclusion chaced out of France, and in a fort out of of Germany, and left to the French, Mentz, Toule, and Verdun, places belonging to the Empire, stole away from Inspurg; and scaled the Alpes by torch-light, purfued by Duke Maurice, having hoped to swallow up all those dominions wherein hee concocted nothing fave his owne difgraces. And having, after the flaughter of so many Millions of men, no one foote of ground in eyther : Hee crept into a Cloyster, and made himselfe a Pensioner of an hundred thousand Duckets by the Nether-Hift.1.7. yeare, to his sonne Philip, from whom he very slowly received his meane and ordi-

His Son againe King Philip the fecond, not fatisfied to hold Holland and Zeland, (wrested by his ancestors from Jaqueline their lawfull Princesse) & to posseffe in peace many other Provinces of the Netherlands: perswaded by that mischievous Cardinall of Granvile, and other Romish Tyrants; not onely forgot the most remarkable services, done to his Father the Emperour, by the Nobilitie of those countries, not onely forgot the Present made him upon his entry, of forty millions of Florens, called the Novaile aide; nor onely forgot that hee had twice most solemnly sworne to the Generall States, to maintaine and preserve their ancient rights, priviledges, and customes, which they had enjoyed under their thirtie and five Earles before him, Conditionall Princes of those Provinces: but beginning first to constraine them, and enthrall them by the Spanish Inquisition, and then to impoverish them by many new devised and intolerable impositions; hee lastly, by strong hand and maine force, attempted to make himselfe not onely an absolute Monarch over them, like unto the Kings and Soveraignes of England and France; but Turke-like, to tread under his feet all their Naturall and fundamentall Lawes, Priviledges, and ancient Rights. To effect which, after he had eafily obtained from the Pope a Dispensation of his former Oathes (which dispensation was the true cause of the war and bloudshed since then:) & after he had tried what he could performe, by dividing of their owne Nobility, under the government of his base sister, Margaret of Austria, or the Cardinall Granvile; He emploied that most merciles Spaniard Don Ferdinand Alvarez of Toledo, Duke of Alva, followed with a powerfull army of strange Nations: by whom hee first Saughtered that renowned Captaine the Earle of Egmont, Prince of Gavare: Philip Montmorency Earle of Horn: made away Montigue, & the Marquis of Bergues, and cut off in those six yeares (that Alva governed) of Gentlemen & others, eighteene thousand and sixe hundred, by the hands of the Hangman, besides all his other barbarous murders of massacres. By whose ministry when he could not vet bring his affaires to their wished ends, having it in his hope to worke that by Subtilty, which he had failed to performe by force: He sent for Governour his ba-Stard brother Don John of Austria; a Prince of great hope, and every gracious to those people. But he, using the same Papall advantage that his predecessors had done made no scruple to take Oath upon the Holy Evangelists, to observe the treaty made with the Generall States; and to discharge the Low Countries of all Spaniards & other strangers therin garrison'd: Towards whose Pay & Pashort. the Netherlands strained themselves to make payment of 600. thousand pounds. Which monies received, He suddenly surprised the Citadels of Antwerpe of Nemures : not doubting (being unsuspected by the States) to have possest himselfe of all the mastring places of those Provinces. For whatsoever he overtly pretended Hee held in secret a contrary counsell with the Secretary Escovedo, Rhodus. Barlemont, and others, Ministers of the Spanish tyranny, formerly practised, and now againe intended. But let us now see the effect and end of this perjury & of all other the Dukes cruelties. First, for himselfe; after he had murdered so many of the Nobility: executed (as afore faid) eighteen thou fand fix hundred in fix yeares. and most cruelly slain Man, woman, and (hild, in Mecklin, Zutphen, Naerden, and other places: and after he had confumed fix and thirty millions of treasure in fix yeares: notwithstanding his Spanish vant. That he would suffocate the Hollanders in their owne butter-barrels, and milk-tubbes: Hee departed the country no otherwise accompanied, than with the curse and detestation of the whole Nation leaving his Masters affaires in a tenfold worse estate, than hee found them at bis first arrivall. For Don John, whose haughty conceit of himselfe overcame the greatest difficulties: though his judgement were over-weake to mannage the least: what wonders did his fearefull breach of faith bring forth, other than the King his brothers jealousie and distrust, with the untimely death that seized him. even in the flower of his youth? And for Escovedo his sharpe-witte Secretarie, who in his owne imagination had conquered for his Master both England and the Netherlands ; being font into Spaine upon some new project, Hee was at the first arrivall, and before any accesse to the King, by certain Ruffians appointed by An. thony Peres (though by better warrant than his) rudely murdered in his own lodg. ing. Lastly, if we consider the King of Spaines carriage, his counsell and successe in this businesse, there is nothing left to the memory of man more remarkeable. For be bath paid above an hundred Millions, or the lives of above four hundred thous Sand Christians, for the losse of all those countries; which, for beauty, gave place to none, and for revenue, did equall his West Indies: for the lose of a nation which most willingly obeyed him, and who at this day, after forty yeares warre, are in dea spight of all his forces become a free Estate, and far more rich and powerfull than they were when he first began to impoverish and oppresse them.

Oh by what plots, by what for swearings, betrayings, oppressions, imprisonments, tortures, poyfonings, and under what reasons of State, and politique subtlety, have these forenamed Kings, both strangers, and of our owne Nation, pulled the vengeance of GOD upon themselves, upon theirs, and upon their prudent ministers! and in the end have brought those things to passe for their enemies, and seene an effect so directly contrary to all their own counsels and cruelties; as the one could never have hoped for themselves; and the other never have succeeded; if no such opposition had ever been made. GOD hath said it and performed it ever: Perdam fapientiam sapientum; I will destroy the wised ome of the wise.

But what of all this? and to what end doe we lay before the eyes of the living, the fall and fortunes of the dead : seeing the world is the same that it hath bin; and the children of the present time, will still obey their parents? It is in the present time, that all the wits of the world are exercised. To hold the times wee have, wee hold all things lawfull: and either we hope to hold them for ever; or at least wee bope, that there is nothing after them to bee boped for. For as wee are content to forget our owne experience, and to counterfeit the ignorance of our owne know. ledge, in all things that concerneour selves; or persuade our selves, that GOD bath given us letters patents to pursue all our irreligious affections, with a non obstante : so we neither looke behinde us what hath been, nor before us what shall be. It is true, that the quantity which we have, is of the body: wee are by it joyned to the earth: wee are compounded of earth; and wee inhabit it. The Heavens are high, farre off, and unsearcheable: we have sense and feeling of corporall things: and of eternall grace, but by revelation. No marvaile then that our thoughts are also earthly: and it is lesse to be wondred at, that the words of worthlesse men cannot cleanse them: seeing their doctrine and instruction, whose understanding the Holy Ghost vouchsafed to inhabite, have not performed it. For as the Prophet Esay cryed out long agone, Lord, who hath believed our reports? And out of doubt, as Esay complained then for himselfe and others: so are they lesse beleeved. every day after other. For although Religion, and the truth thereof be in every mans mouth yea, in the discourse of every moman, who for the greatest number are but Idols of vanity: what is it other than an universall dissimulation? Wee professethat we know GOD: but by workes wee deny him. For Beatitude doth not confift in the knowledge of divine things, but in a divine life: for the Divels know them better than men. Beatitudo non est divinorum cognitio, sed vita divina. And certainly there is nothing more to be admired, and more to bee lamented, than the private contention, the passionate dispute, the personall hatred, and the perpetuall war, massacres, and murthers, for Religion among Christians: the discourse whereof hath so occupied the World, as it bath well neere driven the pra-Flice thereof out of the World. Who would not soone resolve, that tooke knowledge but of the religious disputations among men, and not of their lives which dispute? that there were no other thing in their desires, than the purchase of Heaven: and that the Worldit selfe were but used as it ought, and as an Inne or place, wherein to repose our selves in passing on towards our celestiall habitation? when on the contrary, besides the discourse and outward profession, the soule bath nothing bat hypocrifie. We are all (in effect) become (omadians in religion: and while wee act in gesture and voyce, divine vertues, in all the course of our lives wee renounce our Persons, and the parts wee play. For (harity, Justice, and Truth, have but their being in termes, like the Philosophers Materia prima.

Neither is it that wisedome, which Solomon defineth to be the Schoole-Mistresse of the knowledge of God, that hath valuation in the world: it is enough that we give it our good word: but the same which is altogether exercised in the service of the World, as the gathering of riches chiefly, by which wee purchase and obtaine honour, with the many respects which attend it. These indeed bee the markes, which (when we have bent our consciences to the highest) we all shoot at. For the obtaining whereof it is true, that the care is our owne; the care our owne in this life, the perill our owne in the future: and yet when we have gathered the greatest aboundance, we our selves enjoy no more thereof, than so much as belongs to one man. For the rest, He that had the greatest wisdome, and the greatest ability that ever man had, hath told us that this is the use: When goods increase ((aith Solomon) they also increase that eate them; and what good Eccles and commeth to the Owners, but the beholding thereof with their eyes? As for those that devoure the rest, and follow us in faire weather: they againe for sake us in the first tempest of misfortune, and steere away before the Sea and Winde leaving us to the malice of our destinies. Of these, among a thousand examples. I will take but one out of Master Dannet, and use his owne words: Whilest the Emperour Charles the fift, after the refignation of his estates, staied at Uloshing for winde, to carry him his last journey into Spaine; He conferred on a time with Seldius, his brother Ferdinands Embassadour, till the deepe of the night. And when Seldius should depart: the Emperour calling for some of his servants, and no body answering him, (for those that attended upon him, were some gone to their lodgings, and all the rest asleepe) the Emperour tooke up the candle himselse, and went before Seldius to light him downe the staires; and so did, notwithstanding all the resistance that Seldius could make. And when He was come to the staires foote, Hee faid thus unto him: Seldius, remember this of Charles the Emperour. when he shall be dead and gone, That Him, whom thou hast knowne in thy time environed with so many mighty Armies and Guards of souldiers, thou hast also seene alone, abandoned, and forsaken, yea even of his owne domesticall servants, &c. I acknowledge this change of Fortune to proceed from the mighty hand of GOD, which I will by no meanes goe about to withstand.

But you will fay, that there are some things else, and of greater regard than the former. The first, is the reverend respect that is held of great men, and the Honour done unto them by all forts of people. And it is true indeed: provided, that an inward love for their justice and piety, accompany the outward worship given to their places and power; without which what is the applause of the Multitude, but as the out-cry of an Heard of Animals, who without the knowledge of any true cause please themselves with the noyse they make? For seeing it is a thing exceeding rare to distinguish Vertue and Fortune: the most impious (if prosperous) have ever been applauded; the most vertuous (if unprosperous) have ever beene despised. For as Fortunes man rides the Horfe, fo Fortune her felfe rides the Man. Who when he is descended and on foote: the Mantaken from his Beast, and Fortune from the Man; a base groome beates the one, and a bitter contempt spurnes at the other with equall liberty. The

The second is the greatning of our posterity, and the contemplation of their glore whom we leave behinde us. Certainely, of those which conceive that their soules departed take any comfort therein, it may be truly faid of them, which Lactantius Bake of certaine Heathen Philosophers, quod sapientes sunt in re stulta. For when our spirits immortall shall be once separate from our mortall bodies, and disholed by GOD: there remaineth in them no other joy of their posterity which succeed, than their doth of pride in that stone, which sleepeth in the Wall of a Kings Palace; nor any other sorrow for their poverty, than there doth of shame in that, which beareth up a Beggars cottage. Nesciunt mortui, etiam sancti, quid agunt vivi, etiam eorum filii, quia animæ mortuorum rebus viventium non intersunt: The dead, though holy, know nothing of the living, no, not of their owne children: for the soules of those departed, are not conversant with their affaires that remaine. And if wee doubt of Saint Augustine, wee cannot of Job; who tels us, That wee know not if our sonnes shall bee honourable: neither shall wee understand concerning them, whether they shall bee of low degree. Which Ecclesiastes also confirmeth: Man walketh in a shadow, and disquieteth himselse in vaine: hee heapeth up riches, and cannot tell Ecclos. & i. who shall gather them. The living (faith hee) know that they shall die, but the dead know nothing at all: for who can shew unto man, what shall be after him under the Sun? Hee therefore accounteth it among the rest of worldly vanities, to labour and travaile in the world; not knowing after death. whether a foole or a wife man should enjoy the fruits thereof: which made mee (faith he) endeavour even to abhorre mine own labour. And what can other men hope, whose bleffed or sorowfull estates after death Godhath reserved? mans knowledge lying but in his hope, feeing the Prophet Esay confesseth of the elect. That Abrahamis ignorant of us, and Israel knowes us not. But hereof we are affured that the long and darke night of death, (of whose following day wee Thall never behold the dawne till his returne that hath triumphed over it) shall cover us over till the world be no more. After which, and when we shall againe receive Organs glorified and incorruptible, the seats of Angelicall affections: in so great admiration shall the soules of the blessed be exercised, as they cannot admit the mixture of any second or lesse joy: nor any returne of forgone and mortall affection towards friends, kindred, or children. Of whom whether we shall retaine any particular knowledge, or in any fort distinguish them, no man can assure us the wifest men doubt. But on the contrary . If a divine life retaine any of those faculties, which the foule exercised in a mortall body; wee shall not at that time so divide the joyes of Heaven, as to cast any part thereof on the memory of their felicities which remain in the World. No, be their estates greater than ever the World. gave, we shall (by the difference knowne unto us) even detest their consideration. And what soever comfort shall remaine of all forepast, the same will confist in the charity, which we exercised living: and in that Piety, Justice, and firme Faith, for which it pleased the infinite mercy of God to accept of us, and receive us, Shall wee therefore value honour and riches at nothing? and neglect them, as unnecessarie and vaine? Certainly no. For that infinite wisedome of God, which hath distinquished his Angels by degrees: which hath given greater and leffe light and beauty, to Heavenly bodies: which hath made differences betweene beafts and birds: created the Eagle and the Flye, the Cedar and the Shrub; and among stres, given the fairest tincture to the Ruby, and the quickest light to the Diamond . hath also ordained Kings, Dukes or Leaders of the people, Magistrates, Judges, and other degrees among men. And as bonour is left to posterity, for a marke and ensigne of the vertue and understanding of their Ancestors: so (seeing Siracides preferreth Sirac.40.10.28) Death before Beggary : and that titles, without proportionable estates, fail under the miserable succour of other mens pity;) I account it foolishnesse to condemne such a care: Provided, that worldly goods be well gotten, and that we raise not our owne buildings out of other mens ruines. For, as Plato doth first preferre the Plate leg. 1.23 perfection of bodily health; secondly, the forme and beauty; and thirdly, Divitias nulla fraude quæsitas : /o Jeremy cries, Woe unto them that erect their hou-IGI.22.13. fes by unrighteousnesse, and their chambers without equity : and Esay the same, Woe to those that spoile and were not spoiled. And it was out of the Esay 33. true wisdome of Solomon, that he commandeth us, not to drinke the wine of Protisties violence; not to lie in wait for bloud, and not to swallow them up alive, 25,9,81 whose riches we covet: for such are the wayes (faith hee) of every one that is greedy of gaine.

And if we could afford our selves but so much leisure as to consider, That hee which hath most in the world, bath, in respect of the world, nothing in it: and that be which hath the longest sime lent him to live init, hath yet no proportion at all therein, setting it either by that which is past, when we were not, or by that time which is to come, in which we shall abide for ever: Isay, if both, to wit, our proporzion in the world, and our time in the world, differ not much from that which is nothing it is not out of any excellency of understanding, that we so much prise the one, which bath (in effect) no being : and fo much neglect the other, which bath no ending: coveting those mortall things of the world, as if our soules were therein immortall and neglecting those things which are immortall, as if our selves after the world were but mortall.

But let every man value his owne wisedome, as he pleaseth. Let the Rich man thinke all fooles, that cannot equall his abundance the Revenger esteeme all neglivent that have not trodden down their opposites; the Politician, all groffe that cannot merchandize their faith: Yet when we once come in fight of the Port of death. to which all windes drive us to when by letting fall that fatall Anchor, which can never be weighed again, the Navigation of this life takes end: Then it is, I fay, that our own cogitations (those sad & severe cogitations, formerly beaten from us by our Health and Felicity) returne againe, and pay us to the uttermost for all the pleafing passages of our lives past. It is then that we cry out to God for mercy then. when our selves can no longer exercise cruelty to others: and it is onely then , that me are strucken through the soule with this terrible sentence, That God will not Galera be mocke. For if according to S. Peter, The righteous scarcely be saved: and that God spared not his Angels : where shall those appeare, who, having served their appetites all their lives, presume to think, that the severe Commandements of the All-powerfull God were given but in sport and that the short breath, which we draw when death presseth us, if we can but fashion it to the sound of Mercy (without any kind of satisfaction or amends) is safficient? O quam multi, saith a reverend Father, cum hacipe ad aternos labores & belladelcendunt ! I confesse that it is a great comfort to our friends, to have it faid, that we ended welfor we all desire (as Balaam did) to die the death of the righteous. But what shall wee call a difesteeming, an apposing, or (indeed) a mocking of God: if those men doe not appose him, disesteeme him, and mocke him, that thinke it enough for God, to aske bim forgivenesse at leasure, with the remainder and last drawing of a malicious breath? For what doe they otherwise, that die this kinde of wel-dying, but say unto God as followeth? We be seech thee, O God, that all the falshoods, for swearings, and treacheries of our lives past, may be pleasing unto thee; that thou wilt for our sakes (that have had no leafure to doe any thing for thine) change thy nature (though impossible) and forget to be a just God; that thou wilt love injuries and oppressions. call ambition wifedome, and charity foolishnesse. For I shall prejudice my sonne (which I am refolved not to doe) if I make restitution; and confesse my selfe to have beene unjust, (which I am too proud to doe) if I deliver the oppressed. Certainly thele wife worldlings have either found out a new God; or made One; and in all likelihood such a Leaden One, as Lewis the eleventh ware in his Cappe. which when he had caused any that he feared, or hated, to be killed, he would take it from his head and kiffe it: befeeching it to pardon him this one evill act more, and io should be the last; which (as at other times) he did, when by the practice of a Cardinall and a falfified Sacrament, he caused the Earle of Armagnac to be stabbed to death:mockeries indeed fit to be used towards a Leaden, but not towards the everliving God. But of this composition are all devout lovers of the World, that they feare all that is durelesse and ridiculous: they feare the plots and practices of their opposites, and their very whisperings : they feare the opinions of men, which beate but upon shadowes: they flatter and for sake the prosperous and unprosperous. be they friends or Kings : yea they dive under water, like Duckes, at every pebble Rone, that is but throwne towards them by a powerfull hand : and on the contrary! they shew an obstinate and Giant-like valour, against the terrible judgements of the All-powerfull God: yeathey shew themselves gods against God, and slaves to wards men towards men whose bodies and consciences are alike rotten.

Now for the rest: If we truly examine the difference of both conditions; to wit, of the rich and mighty, whom we call fortunate; and of the poore to oppressed, whom we account wretched: wee shall finde the happinesse of the one, and the miserable eflate of the other, so tied by God to the very instant, and both so subject to enterchange (witnesse the sudden downefall of the greatest Princes, and the speedy uprifing of the meanest persons) as the one hath nothing so certaine, whereof to boast? nor the other so uncertaine, whereof to bewaile it selfe. For there is no man so asfured of his honour, of his riches, health, or life; but that he may be deprived of eyther, or all, the very next houre or day to come. Quid vesper vehat, incertum est. What the evening will bring with it, it is uncertaine. And yet ye cannot tell (faith S. fames) what shall be to morrow. To day he is set up? and to morrow he shall not be found; for hee is turned into dust, and his purpose perisheth. And although the aire which compasseth adversity be very obscure: yet therin we better discerne God than in that shining light which environ neth worldly glory; through which, for the clevernesse there is no vanity which escapeth our fight. And let adversity seem what it will to happy men ridiculous, who make themselves merry at other mens misfortunes, and to those under the crosse, grievous: yet this is true, That for all that is past, to the very instant, the portions remaining are equall to either. For bee it that wee have lave lived many yeares, and (according to Solomon) in them all wee have reovced or beit that we have measured the same length of dayes and therein have evermore for rowed: yet looking backe from our prefent being, wee finde both the one and the other, to wit, the joy and the woe, fayled out of fight; and death, which doth pursue us and hold us in chace, from our infancy, bath gathered it. Quicquid ætatis retro est, mors tenet: Whatsoever of our age is past, death holds it. So as who soever hee bee, to whom Fortune hath beene a servant, and the Time a friend: let him but take the accompt of his memory (for wee have no other keeper of our pleasures past) and truly examine what it hath reserved evther of beauty and youth, or fore-gone delights, what it hath saved, that it might last, of his dearest affections, or of whatever else the amorous Spring-time gave his thoughts of contentment, then unvaluable; and bee shall finde that all the Art which his elder yeares have, can draw no other vapour out of these dissolutions. than heavie, secret, and sad sighes. He shall finde nothing remaining, but those forrowes. which grow up after our fast-springing youth; overtake it, when it is at a stand and over-topt it utterly, when it beginnes to wither: in so much as looking back from the very instant time, of from our now being, the poore, discased, and captive creature, bath as little sense of all his former miseries and paines, as hee that is most blest in common opinion, hath of his fore-passed pleasure and delights. For phatsoever is cast behinde us, is just nothing: and what is to come, deceitfull hope bathit : Omnia quæ eventura funt, in incerto jacent. Onely those few blacke Swannes I must except: who having had the grace to value worldly vanities at no more than their owne price. doe, by retayning the comfortable memory of a well acted life, behold death without dread, and the grave without feare: and embrace both, as necessary guides to endlesse glory.

For my selfe this is my consolation, and all that I can offer to others, that the forrowes of this life are but of two forts: whereof the one hathrespect to GOD: the other to the World. In the first we complaine to GOD against our selves for our offences against bim: and confesse, Et tu justus es in omnibus quæ venerunt super nos, And thou O Lord art just in all that hath befallen us. In the second wee complaine to our selves against GOD: as if hee had done us wrong either in not giving us worldly goods and honours, answering our appetites: or for taking them againe from us having had them; forgetting that humble Gjust acknowledgment of Job, the Lord hath given, & the Lord hath taken. To the first of which Saint Paul hath promised blesseduesse; to the second, death. And out of doubt he is either a foole, or ungratefull to GOD, or both, that doth not acknowledge, how meane soever his estate be, that the same is yet far greater. than that which God oweth him: or doth not acknowledge, how sharpe soever his afflictions bee, that the same are yet far lesse, than those which are due unto him? And if an Heathen wife man cal the adversities of the world but tributa vivendi. the tributes of living: a wife (bristian man ought to know them, & beare them, but as the tributes of offending. He ought to beare them manlike, or resolvedly; or not as those whining souldiers doe, qui gementes sequuntur imperatorem.

For seeing God, who is the Author of all our tragedies, hath written out for us, coappointed us all the parts we are to play: and hath not, in their distribution, beene partiallto the most mighty Princes of the world. That gave unto Darius the part of the greatest Emperour, and the part of the most miserable beggar.

a beggar begging water of an Enemy, to quench the great drought of death. That appointed Bajazet to play the Grand Signior of the Turks in the morning, of in the same day the Footstoole of Tamerlane (both which parts Valerian had alfoplaid, being taken by Sapores:) that made Bellifarius play the most victorious Captaine & lastly the part of a blinde beggar; of which examples many thousands may be produced: why should other men, who are but as the least wormes. complaine of wrongs? Certainly there is no other account to be made of this ridiculous world than to refolve, That the change of fortune on the great Theater, is but as the change of garments on the leffe. For when on the one and the other, every man weares but his own skin, the Players are all alike. Now if any man out of weakness prize the passages of this world otherwise (for saith Petrarch, Magni ingenii est revocare mentem a sensibus) it is by reason of that unhappy fantasie of ours. which forgeth in the braines of Man all the miseries (the corporall excepted) whereunto he is subject. Therein it is that Misfortune and Adversity work all that they worke. For feeing Death, in the end of the Play, takes from all. whatfoever Fortune or Force takes from any one; it were a foolish madnesse in the shipwracke of worldly things, where all finkes but the Sorrow, to fave it. That were, as Seneca Saith Fortunæ succumbere, quod tristius est omni fato: To fallunder Fortune, of all other the most miserable destinie.

But it is now time to sound a retrait; and to defire to be excused of this long purfuit : and withall, that the good intent, which bath moved mee to draw the picture of time past (which we call History) in so large a Table, may also bee accepted in place of a better reason.

The examples of divine providence, every where found (the first divine Histories being nothing elle but a continuation of such examples) have persuaded me to fetch my beginning from the beginning of all things; to wit, (reation. For though these two glorious actions of the Almighty be so neere, and (as it were) linked together, that the one necessarily implyeth the other: Creation inferring Providence (for what father for saketh the childe that he hath begotten?) and Providence pre-Supposing Creation: Yet many of those that have seemed to excell in worldly wisedome, have gone about to dis-joyne this coherence; the Epicure denying both (reation and Providence, but granting that the world had a Beginning; the Aristotelian granting Providence, but denying both the Creation and the Beginning.

Now although this doctrine of Faith, touching the Creation in time (for by faith we understad, that the world was made by the word of God) be too weighty a worke for Aristotles rotten ground to beare up, upon which he hath (notwithstanding) founded the Defences and Foreresses of all his Verball Doctrine: Yet that the necessity of infinite power, and the worlds beginning, and the impossibilitie of the contrary even in the judgement of Naturall reason, wherein he believed, had not better informed him . it is greatly to be mar velled at. And it is no leffe strange. that those men which are desirous of knowledge (seeing Aristotle hath failed in this maine point : and taught little other than termes in the rest) have so retrencht their mindes from the following and overtaking of truth, and so absolutely subjected themselves to the . w of those Philosophicall principles; as all contrary kinde of teaching, in the fearch of causes, they have condemned either for phantasticall, or curious. But doth it follow, that the positions of Heathen Philosophers are undoubted grounds and principles indeed, because so called ? Or that ipsi dixerunt, doth make them to be such ? Certainly no. But this is true, That where natural reason hath built any thing so strong avainst it selfe, as the same reason can hardly assaile it, much lesse batter it downe: the same in every question of Nature, and infinite power, may be approved for a fundamentall law of bumane knowledge. For faith Charron in his booke of chamon de Sat wildome, Tout proposition humaine a autant d'authorite quel'autre, si la sile raison n' on fait la difference; Every humane proposition hath equall authority, if reason make not the difference, the rest being but the fables of principles. But hereof how shall the upright and unpartiall judgement of man oive a lentence, where opposition and examination are not admitted to give in evidence? And to this purpose it was well said of Lactantius, Sapientiam fibi adimunt. Latt. de originale qui fine ullo judicio inventa majorum probant, & ab aliis pecudum more ducuntur: They neglect their owne wisdome, who without any judgement approve the invention of those that fore-went them; & suffer themselves after the manner of Beasts, to be led by them. By the advantage of which floth and dulneffe, ignorance is now become so powerfull a Tyrant as it hath let true Philosophy, Physick, and Divinity in a Pillory; and written over the first. Contra negantem Principia; over the second, Virtus specifica; and over the third, Ecclesia Romana.

But for my selfe, I shall never be perswaded, that God hath shut up all light of Learning within the lanthorne of Aristotles braines : or that it was ever faid unto him, as unto Esdras, Accendam in Corde tuo Lucernam intellectus: that God bath given invention but to the Heathen, and that they onely invaded Nature, and found the strength and bottome thereof; the same Nature having confumed all her ftore, and left nothing of price to after-ages. That these and these bee the causes of these and these effects, Time hath taught us; and not reason: and so bath experience without Art. The Cheeefe-wife knoweth it as well as the Philofopher, that sowre Rennet doth coagulate her milke into a curd. But if wee aske a reason of this cause, why the sowrenesse doth it? whereby it doth it? and the manner how? I think that there is nothing to be found in vulgar Philosophy, to satisfie this and many other like vulgar questions. But man to cover his ignorance in the least things, who cannot give a true reason for the Grasse under his feet, why it should be greene rather than red, or of any other colour; that could never yet difcover the way and reason of Natures working, in those which are far lesse noble creatures than himselfe: who is farre more Noble than the Heavens themselves: Man (Jaith Solomon) that can hardly discerne the things that are upon the Salomon 1.3 Earth, and with great labour finde out the things that are before us. that hath fo short a time in the world, as he no sooner begins to learne, than to die; that hath in his memory but borrowed knowledge; in his understanding nothing truly; that is ignorant of the Effence of his owne foule, and which the wifest of the Naturalists (if Aristotle be be) could never so much as define, but by the Action & Effect, telling us what it works (which all men knew as well as he) but not what it is , which neither he nor any else , doth know, but GOD that created it ; (For though I were perfect, yet I know not my foule, faith Job.) Man, I fay, that is but an idiot in the next cause of his owne life, and in the cause of all actions of his life: will (notwithstanding) examine the Art of GOD in creating the World; of GOD, who (faith Job) is so excellent as we know him not; Job 250

andexamine the beginning of the worke, which had end before Mankinde had a beginning of being. He will disable Gods power to make a world, without matter to make it of. He will rather give the motes of the Aire for a cause; cast the work on nece Sity or chance bestow the honour thereof on Nature; make two powers the one to be the Author of the Matter, the other of the Forme; and lastly, for want of a worke-man, have it Eternall: which latter opinion Aristotle, to make him. lelfe the Author of a new Dostrine, brought into the World: and his Sestatours baye maintained it : parati ac conjurati, quos sequuntur, Philosophorum animis invictis opiniones tueri. For Hermes, who lived at once with, or some after Moses, Zoroaster, Muszus, Orpheus, Linus, Anaximenes, Anaxago. ras, Empedocles, Melissus, Pherecydes, Thales, Cleanthes, Pythagoras, Plato and many others (pobole opinions are examifitely gathered by Steuchius Eugubinus) found in the necessity of invincible reason, One eternal and infinite Being, to be the Parent of the universall. Horum omnium sententia quamvis sit incerta, eodem tamen spectar, ut Providétiam unam esse confentiant: five enim Natura, five Æther, five Ratio, five mens, five fatalis necessitas, sive divina Lex; idem est quod à nobis dicitur Deus: All these mens opinions (faith Lactantius) though uncertain, come to this. That they agree upon one Providence; whether the same be Nature, or light, or Reason, or understanding, or destinie, or divine ordinance, that it is the same which we call GOD. (ertainly, as all the Rivers in the world, though they have divers rifings, and divers runnings; though they sometimes hide themselves for a Phile under ground, and seem to be lost in Sea-like Lakes . doe at last find, and fall into the great Ocean: so after all the searches that humane capacity hath; and after all Philosophicall contemplation and curiofity; in the necessity of this infinite power, all the reason of man ends and dissolves it selfe.

As for others; and first touching those which conceive the matter of the World to have beene eternall, and that God did not create the World ex nihilo, but ex materia præexistete: the Supposition is so weak, as is hardly worth the answering. For (saith Eusebius) Mihi videntur qui hoc dicunt, fortunam quoque Deo annectere, They seeme unto me, which affirme this, to give part of the work to God, & part to Fortune: insomuch as if God had not found this first matter by chance, He had neither beene Author, nor father, nor Creator, nor Lord of the Universall. For were the Matter or Chaos eternall: it then followes, That either this supposed Matter did fit it selfe to God, or God accommodate himselfe to the matter. For the first, it is impossible, that things without sense could proportion themselves to the Work-mans will. For the second it were horrible to conceive of God, That as an Artificer he applyed himselfe, according to the proportion of matter which he lighted upon.

But let it be supposed, That this matter hath bin made by any Power, not Omnipotent, and infinitely wife: I would gladly learne how it came to passe, that the Same was proportionable to his intention, that was Omnipotent and infinitely wife; and no more, nor no leffe, than served to receive the form of the Universall. For had it wanted any thing of what was sufficient; then must it be granted, That God created out of nothing so much of new matter, as served to finish the worke of the World: Or had there binmore of this matter, than sufficed, then God did dissolve & annihilate what soever remained and was superfluous. And this must every reafonable

Sonable Soule confesse, That it is the same worke of God alone, to create any thing out of nothing, And by the same art and power, and by none other, can thole things or any part of that eternall matter, be againe changed into Nothing; by which those things, that once were nothing, obtained a beginning of being.

Againe, to say that this matter was the cause of it selfe; this, of all other were the greatest Idiotisme. For , if it were the cause of it selfe at any time ; then there was also a time when it selfe was not: at which time of not being, it is easie enough to conceive, that it could neither procure it selfe, nor any thing else. For to be, and not to be, at once, is impossible. Nihil autem seipsum præcedit. nea; seipsum componit corpus: There is nothing that doth precede it

For the rest. Those that faine this matter to be eternall, must of necessity confesses that Infinite cannot bee Separate from Eternity. And then had infinite matter left no place for infinite forme, but that the first matter was finite, the forme which it received proves it. For conclusion of this part, who loever will make choice. rather to believe in eternall deformity, or in eternall dead matter, than in eternall light and eternall life : let eternall death be his reward. For it is a madne se of that kind, as wanteth tearmes to expresse it. For what reason of man (whom the curse of presumption hath not stupified) hath doubted, That infinite power (of which we can comprehend but a kind of shadow, quia comprehensio est intra terminos, qui infinito repugnant) hath any thing wanting in it self, either for matter or forms vea for as many worlds (if such had beene Gods will) as the Sea hath sands? For where the power is without limitation, the work hath no other limitation, than the workmans will. Yea Reason it selfe finds it more easie for infinite power, to deliver from it selfe a finite world, without the help of matter prepared; than for a finite man, a foole and dust, to change the forme of matter made to his hands. They are Dionysius bis words, Deus in una existentia omnia præhabet: and againe consecution Esse omnium est ipsa Divinitas, omne quod vides, & quod non vides : to Dit, causaliter, or in better tearmes, non tanquam forma, sed tanquam causa universalis. Neither hath the world universall closed up all of GOD: For the most part of his workes (faith Siracides) are hid. Neither can the depth of his wifedome bee opened, by the glorious worke of the world: which never brought to knowledge all it can; for then were his infinite power bounded and made finite. And hereof it comes; That wee seldome entitle GOD the all-Thewing, or the all-willing; but the Almighty, that is, infinitely able.

But now for those, who from that ground, That out of nothing no thing is made, inferre the Worlds eternity; and yet not so salvage therein, as those are, which give an eternall being to dead matter: It is true, if the word (nothing) be taken in the affirmative; and the making, imposed upon Naturall Agents and finite power; That out of nothing, nothing is made. But seeing their great Doctor Aristotle himselfe confesseth, quod omnes antiqui decreverunt quasi quoddam rerum principium, ipsumq; infinitum: That all the Ancient decree a kind of beginning, and the same to be infinite: and a little after, more large ly and plainly, Principium ejus est nullum, sed ipsum omnium cernitur esse stencements principium ac omnia complecti ac regere: it is strangethat this Philosopher, Philos with his followers, should rather make choice out of falshood, to conclude falsly; than out of truth, to resolve truly. For if we compare the world Universal & all the unmeasurable Orbes of Heaven, and those marvellous bodies of the Sun, Moone, and Stars, with ipfum Infinitum : it may truly be faid of them all, which bimfelf affirmes of his imaginary Materia prima, That they are neither quid, quale, nor quantum and therfore to bring finite (which hath no proportion with infinite) out of infinite (qui destruit omnem proportione) is no wonder in Gods power. And ther fore Anaximander, Melissus, & Empedocles, call the world universall, but particulam Universitatis and infinitatis, a parcell of that which is the universality and the infinity it self; Plato, but a shadow of God. But the other to prove the worlds eternity, urgeth this Maxime, That, A sufficient & effectual cause being granted, an answerable effect therof is also granted. Inferring that God being for ever a Jufficient & effectual cause of the world the effect of the cause should also have bin for ever to wit, the world universall. But what astrange mockery is this in so great a Master, to confesse a sufficient es effectual cause of the porld, (to wit, an almighty God) in his Antecedent to the same God to be a God restrained in his conclusion to make God free in power & bound in wil able to effect. unable to determine; able to make all things, and yet unable to make choice of the time when? For this were impiously to resolve of God, as of naturall necessity: which hath neither choice, nor will, nor understanding; which cannot but worke matter being present: as fire, to burne things combustible. Againe he thus disputeth. That every Agent which can work, and doth not work, if it afterward worke, it is either thereto moved by it selfe, or by somewhat else: and so it passeth from power to AEt: But God (saith he) is immoveable, and is neither moved by himselfe, nor by any other : but being alwayes the same, doth alwayes worke. Whence he concludeth. If the world were caused by God, that he was for ever the cause thereof: and therefore eternall. The answer to this is very easie. For that Gods performing indue time that, which he ever determined at length to performe, doth not argue any alteration or change, but rather constancy in him. For the same action of his will, which made the world for ever, did also with-hold the effect to the time ordained. To this answer, in it selfe sufficient, others add further, that the Patterne or Image of the World may be said to be sternall: which the Platonicks call, spiritualem mundum; and doe in this fort distinguish the Idea and Creation in time. Mar Ficin de jus Spiritualis ille mundus, mundi hujus exemplar, primumque Dei opus, mon. Anima la 8. vita æquali est Architecto, fuit semper cum illo, eritque semper. Mundus autem corporalis, quod secundum opus est Dei, decedit jam ab opifice ex parte una, quia non fuit semper : retinet alteram, quia sit semper futurus: That representative, or the intentional world (/ay they) the fampler of this visible world, the first worke of GOD, was equally ancient with the Architect: for it was for ever with him, and ever shall bee. This materiall world, the second worke or creature of 60 D, doth differ from the worker in this, That it was not from everlasting, and in this it doth agree, that it shall be for ever to come. The first point, That it was not for ever, all Christians confesse: The other they understand no otherwise, than that after the consumation of this world, there shalbe a new Heaven and a new Earth, without any new creation of matter. But of these things we need not here stand to argue: though such opinions be not unworthy the propounding, in this consideration, of an eternall and unchangeable cause, producing a changeable

The Preface.

That the compounded effence of the World (and because compounded, therefore dissipable) is continued, o knit to the Divine Being, by an individual o inseparable power flowing from Divine unity, & that the Worlds naturall appetite of God sheweth that the same proceedeth from a good and understanding divine; and that this vertue by which the World is continued & knit together must be infinite that it may infinitely and everlastingly continue and preserve the same. Which infinite Vertue, the finite World (faith he) is not capable of , but receiveth it from the divine infinite according to the temporall Nature it hath, successively every moment by little and little even as the whole Materiall World is not altogether : but the abolithed parts are departed by small degrees, and the parts yet to come doe by the same small decrees succeed: as the shadow of a tree in a River, seemeth to have continual ed the same a long time in the water, but it is perpetually renewed, in the continuall

Butto returne to them, which denying that ever the World had any beginning? withall deny that ever it shall have any end, and to this purpose affirm. That it was never heard never read, never scene, no not by any reason perceived, that the Heavens have ever suffered corruption; or that they appeare any way the older by continuance : or in any fort other wife than they were; which had they been subject to finall corruption. some change would have been discerned in so long a time. To this it is answered. That the little change as yet perceived, doth rather prove their new nesse, and that they have not continued so long; than that they wil continue for ever as they are. And if conjecturall arguments may receive answer by conjectures: it then feemeth that fome alteration may bee found. For either Aristotle, Plinie, Anife Mieral Strabo, Beda, Aquinas, and others, were grossely mistaken: or else those parts of Strabla. the world, lying within the burnt Zone, were not in elder times habitable, by rea-Bedade values the world, lying within the burnt Zone, were not in elder times habitable, by rea-Bedade values tem. 11.6.32. fon of the Suns heate, neither were the Seas, under the Equino Etial, na vigable. But Thomps q. wee know by experience, that those Regions, so situate, are filled with people, and rozaita, exceeding temperate; and the Sca, over which wa Navigate, passable enough. We reade also many Histories of deluges; and how that in the time of Phaeton divers places in the World were burnt up, by the Suns violent heate.

But in a Word, this observation is exceeding feeble. For we know it for certain, That stone-wals, of matter moldring and friable have stood two, or three thousand yeares: that many things have beene digged up out of the earth, of that depth, as supposed to have beene buried by the generall floud; without any alteration either of substance or figure: yea it is beleeved, and it is very probable, that the gold which is daily found in Mynes, and Rockes, under ground, was created together with the Earth.

And if bodies elementary, and compounded, the eldest times have not invaded and corrupted: what great alteration should we looke for in Calestiall and quintessentiall bodies? And yet we have reason to thinke, that the Sunne, by whose help all Creatures are generate, doth not in these latter Ages asist Nature, as heretod fore. We have neither Giants, such as the eldest world had: nor mighty men, such as the elder world had; but all things in generall are reputed of leffe vertue which from the Heavens receive vertue. Whence, if the nature of a Preface would permit a larger discourse, we might easily fetch store of proofe; as that this world shall at length bave end, as that once it had beginning.

And I see no good answer that can bee made to this objection : if the World and temporall effect. Touching which point Proclus the Platonist disputeth, were evernall; why not all things in the World Eternall? If there were no first, no cause, no Father, no Creator, no incomprehensible wisedome, but that every Nature had beene alike eternall, and Man more rationall than every other Nature: Why had not the eternall reason of Man, provided for his eternall being in the World? For if all were equall, why not equall conditions to all? Why should heavenly bodies live for ever; and the bodies of Menrot and dye?

Againe, who was it that appointed the Earth to keepe the center, and gave Order that it should hang in the Aire: that the Sunne should travaile betweene the Tropicks, and never exceed those bounds, nor faile to performe that Progresse once in every yeare: the Moon to live by borrowed light; the fixed Stars (according to common opinion) to bee fastned like Nailes in a Cart-wheele, and the Planets to mander at their pleasure? Or if none of these had power over other: was it out of Charity and Love, that the Sunne by his perpetuall travaile within those two Circles, hath visited, given light unto, and relieved all parts of the Earth, and the Creatures therein, by turnes and times? Out of doubt, if the Sunne have of his owne accord kept this course in all eternity : He may justly be called eternall Charity and everlasting Love. The same may be said of all the Stars: who being all of them most large and cleare fountaines of vertue and operation, may also bee called eternall vertues: the Barth may be called eternall patience: the Moone, an eternall borrower and beggar; and Man of all other the most miserable, eternally mortall. And what were this, but to believe againe in the old Play of the gods? Yeain more gods by Millions, than ever Hesiodus dream'd of. But in stead of this mad folly, we see it well enough with our feeble and mortall eyes: and the eyes of our reafon discerne it better; That the Sun, Moon, Stars, and the Earth, are limited, bounded, and constrained: themselves they bave not constrained, nor could. Omne determinatum causam habet aliquam efficientem, quæ illud determinaverit; Every thing bounded hath some efficient cause, by which it is bounded.

Now for Nature; As by the ambiguity of this name, the schoole of Aristotle hath both commended many errours unto us, and fought also thereby to obscure the glory of the high Moderator of all things, shining in the Creation, and in the governing of the World: so if the best definition be taken out of the second of Aristotles Phylicks, or primo de Cœlo, or out of the fift of his Metaphylicks; I say that the best is but nominall, and serving onely to difference the beginning of Naturall motion from Artificiall: which yet the Academicks open better, when they call it A Seminary strength, infused into matter by the Soule of the World: who give the first place to Providence, the second to Fate, and but the third to Nature. Providentia (by which they understand GOD) dux & caput Fatum, medium ex providentia prodiens; Natura postremum. But be it what he will, or be it any of these (God excepted) or participating of all: yet that it hath choice or understanding (both which are necessarily in the cause of all things) no man hath avowed. For this is unanswerable of Lactantius, Is autem facit aliquid, qui aut voluntatem faciendi habet, aut scientiam: He only can be said to be the doer of a thing, that hath either will or knowledge in the doing it.

But the will and science of Nature, are in these words truly exprest by Ficinus: Potest ubiq; Natura, vel per diversa media, vel ex diversis materils, diversa facere: sublata vero medioru materiarumq, diversitate, vel unicu, vel simi-limum operatur, neque potest quando adest materia non operari; It is the power of Nature by diversity of meanes, or out of diversity of matter, to produce divers things: but taking away the diversity of meanes, and the diversity of matter, it then workes but one or the like worke; neither can it but worke, matter being present. Now if Nature made choice of diversity of matter, to worke all these variable workes of Heaven and Earth, it had then both understanding and will; it had counsell to beginne; reason to dispose; vertue and knowledge to finish, and power to governe: without which all things had been but one and the same: all of the matter of Heaven; or all of the matter of Earth. And if wee grant Nature this will, and this understanding, this counsell, reason, and power: Cur Natura potius quam Deus nominetur? Why should we then Last de ma Deus call such a cause rather Nature, than God? God, of whom all men have notion, and give the first and highest place to Divine power: Omnes homines notionem diffiliade deorum habent, omnesse: summum locum divino cuidam numini assignant. And this I fay in short: that it is a true effect of true reason in man (were there no authority more binding than reason ; to acknowledge and adore the first and most sublime power. Vera Philosophia, est ascensus ab his quæ fluunt. & oriuntur, & occidunt, ad ea quæ vere sunt, & semper eadem : True Philosophy, is an ascending from the things which flow, and arise, and fall to the things that are for ever the same. For the rest: I doe also account it not the meanest, but an impiety monstrous, to confound God and Nature : be it but in tearmes. For it is God, that only disposeth of all things according to his own will, of maketh of one Earth, Vessels of honour & dishonor. It is Nature that can dispose of nothing, but according to the will of the matter wherin it worketh. It is God that comandeth al. It is N ature that is obedient to all. It is God that doth good unto all knowing and loving the good he doth: It is Nature, that secondarily doth also good, but it neither knoweth nor loveth the good it doth. It is God, that hath all things in himfelfe: Nature nothing in it felf. It is God, which is the Father, and hath begotten all things: It is Nature, which is begotten by all things, in which it liveth and laboureth, for by it selfe it existeth not. For shall we say, that it is out of affection to the Earth, that heavie things fall towards it? Shal we call it Reason, which doth conduct every River into the salt Sea? Shall we tearme it knowledge in fire, that makes it to confume combustible matter? If it be Affection, Reason, and Knowledgin these: by the same Affection, Reason, and Knowledge it is that Nature worketh. And therefore seeing all things works as they doe, (call it by Forme, or Nature, or by what you please) yet because they porke by an impulsion, which they cannot refift; or by a faculty, infused by the supremest power: We are neither to wonder at, nor to worship, the faculty that worketh, nor the Creature wherein it worketh. But herein lies the wonder: and to him is the worship due, who hath created such a Nature in things, & such a faculty, as neither knowing it selfe, the matter wherein it worketh, nor the vertue and power which it hath; doe yet worke all things to their last and attermost perfection. And therefore every reasonable man, taking to himselfe for a ground that which is granted by all Antiquitie, and by all men truly learned that ever the world had; to wit. That there is a power infinite, and eternall (which also necessity doth prove unto us, without the helpe of Faith, and Reason. without the force of Authority) all things do as easily follow which have bin delivered by divine letters, as the were eternall; why not all things in the World Eternall? If there were no first, no cause, no Father, no Creator, no incomprehensible wisedome, but that every Nature had beene alike eternall. and Man more rationall than every other Nature: Why had not the eternall reason of Man, provided for his eternall being in the World? For if all were equall, why not equall conditions to all? Why should heavenly bodies live for ever; and the bodies of Menrot and dye?

For the rest. I doe also account it not the meanest, but an impiety monstrous, to confound God and Nature: be it but in tearmes. For it is God, that only disposeth of all things according to his own will, & maketh of one Earth, Vesiels of honour & dishonor. maters of a running river do successively pursue each other fro the first fountains.

This much I say it is, that Reason it selfe hath taught us: and this is the beginning of knowledge. Sapientia præcedit, Religio sequitur: quia prius est Deum Enclique a. ning of knowleage. Sapiente goes before, Religion followes: because it is devera sapiente. scire, consequens colere, Sapience goes before, Religion followes: because it is first to know God, and then to worship him. This Sapience Plato calleth absoluti boni scientiam, The science of the absolute good: and another scientiam rerum primarum, sempiternarum, perpetuarum, For Faith (faith Isidore) is not extorted by violence; but by reason and examples persuaded: fides nequaquam vi extorquetur, sed ratione & exemplis suadetur. I confesse it, That to enquire further as of the essence of God of his power of his Art, & by what meane He created the world: Or of his secret judgement & the causes is not an affect of Reason. Sed cum ratione in saniunt, but they grow mad with reason, that inquire after it: For as it is no shame nor dishonour (faith a French Author) de faire arrest au but qu'on nasceu surpasser, For a man to rest himself there, where he finds it impossible to passe on further: so what soever is beyond, and out of the reach of true reason, it acknowledgeth it to be fo; as under standing it felf not to be infinite, but according to the iName and Nature it hath, to be a Teacher, that best knowes the end of his own Art. For seeing both Reason & Necessity teach w (Reason, which is pars didumnaturam ter- vini spiritus in corpus humanum mersi) that the world was made by a power infinite; and yet how it was made, it cannot teath us; and feeing the same Reason and Necessito make us know, that the same infinite power is every where in the porld and yet how every where, it cannot informe us: our beliefe hereof is not peakned, but greatly strengthened, by our ignorance, because it is the same Reason that tels us, That such a Nature cannot be faid to be God, that can be in all conceived by man.

> Thave been already over-long, to make any large discourse either of the parts of the following Story, or in mine owne excuse: especially in the excuse of this or that paffage; feeing the whole is exceeding weak and defective. Among the groffest, the unsutable division of the bookes, I could not know how to excuse, had I not beene directed to enlarge the building after the foundation was laid, and the first part sinished. All men know that there is no great Art in the dividing evenly of those things, which are subject to number and measure. For the rest, it sutes well enough with a great many Bookes of this Age, which speake too much, and yet say little; Ipfi nobis furto subducimur; We are stollen away from our selves setting a high price on all that is our owne. But hereof, though a late good Writer make complaint, yet shall it not lay hold on mee, because I beleeve as hee doth; That who fothinkes himselfe the wisest man, is but a poore and miserable ignorant. Those that are the best men of war, against all the vanities and fooleries of the World, do alwayes keepe the strongest guards against themselves, to defend them from themselves: from selfe love selfe estimation, and selfe opinion.

Generally concerning the order of the Worke. I have onely taken counsell from the Argument. For of the Assyrians, which after the downe-fall of Babel take up the first part, and were the first great Kings of the World, there came little to the rosew of posterity: some few enterprises, greater in fame than faith, of Ninus and Semiramis, excepted.

It was the story of the Hebrewes, of all before the Olympiads, that overcame the confuming disease of time, and preserved it selfe, from the very cradle and beginning ginning to this day: and yet not so entire, but that the large discourses thereof (to which in many Scriptures we are referred) are no where found. The Fragments of other Stories, with the actions of those Kings and Princes which shot up here and there in the same time, I am driven to relate by way of digression: of which wee may fay with Virgil:

They appeare here and there floring in the great gulfe of time. To the same first Ages doe belong the report of many Inventions therein found. and from them derived to us : though most of the Authors Names have perished in solong a Navigation. For those Ages had their Lawes they had diversity of Government they had Kingly rule. Nobility Policy in war Navigation and all or the most of needfull Trades. To speak therfore of these (seeing in a generall History we should have left a great deale of Nakedne ffe, by their omission) it cannot properly be called a digression. True it is that I have made also many others: which if they shall belaid to my charge, I must cast the fault into the great heape of humane error. For feeing we digreffe in all the waies of our lives : yea, feeing the life of man is nothing else but digression; I may the better be excused, in writing their lives es actions. I am not altogether ignorant in the Lawes of History, and of the Kindes.

The same hath been taught by many but by no man better, and with greater brevity. than by that excellent learned Gentleman Sir Francis Bacon. Christian Lawes are also taught us by the Prophets and Apostles; and every day preacht unto us. But we still make large digressions : yea, the Teachers themselves doe not

For the rest, after such time as the Persians had wrested the Empire from the Chaldwans, and bad raised a great Monarchy, producing Actions of more importance than were elsewhere to be found: it was agreeable to the Order of Story to attend this Empire; whilf it so flourished, that the affaires of the nations adjorning had reference thereunto. The like observance was to be used towards the fortunes of Greece, when they againe began to get ground upon the Persians. as also towards the affairs of Rome, when the Romans gre wmore mighty that the Greeks.

As for the Medes, the Macedonians, the Sicilians, the Carthaginians, and other Nations who resisted the beginnings of the former Empires, and afterwards became but parts of their composition and enlargement: it seemed best to remember What was knowne of them from their severall beginnings, in such times and places as they in their flourishing estates opposed those Monarchies, which in the end swallowed them up. And herein I have followed the best Geographers: Who seldome give names to those small brookes, whereof many joyned together, make great Rivers; till such time as they become united, and run in maine streame to the Ocean Sea. If the Phrase be weak, & the Stile not every-where like it self; the first shews their legitimation and true Parent . the second will excuse it self upon the Variety of Matter. For Virgil, who wrote his Eclogues, gracili avena, used stronger pipes, when he sounded the wars of Aneas. It may also be laid to my charge, that Iuse divers Hebrew words in my first booke, and elsewhere: in which language others may thinke, and I my selfe acknowledge it, that I am alweether ignorant; but it is true, that some of them I find in Montanus, others in latin Caracter in S. Senensis and of the rest I have borrowed the interpretation of some of my friends. But say I had bin beholding to neither, yet were it not to be wondred at, having had an eleven yeares leasure, to attaine the knowledge of that, or of any other tongue; How oever, Iknow that it will be faid by many. That I might have been more pleafing to the Reader, if I had written the Story of mine owne times, having been permitted to draw water as neare the Well-head as another. To this I answer, that who soever in writing a moderne History, shall follow truth too neare the heeles, it may haply strike out his teeth. There is no Mistresse or Guide, that bath led her followers and servants into greater miseries. He that goes after her too far off lofeth ber fight, and lofeth himself: and he that walkes after her at a middle distance. Iknow not whether I should call that kinde of course, Temper or Basenesse. It is true, that Inevertravelled after mens opinions, when I might have made the best use of them : and I have now too few dayes remaining, to imitate those, that either out of extreme ambition, or extreme cowardise or both, doe yet (when death hath them on his shoulders) flatter the world, between the bed and the grave. It is enough for me (being in that state I am) to write of the eldest times : wherein also why may it not be said, that in speaking of the past, I point at the present, and taxe the vices of those that are yet living in their persons that are long since dead; and have it laid to my charge? But this I cannot helpe, though innocent. And certainly if there be any that finding themselves spotted like the Tigers of old time, shal find fault with mee for painting them over anew, they shall therein accuse themselves justly and

For I protest before the Majesty of God. That I malice no man under the Sunne. Imposible I know it is to please all: seeing few or none are so pleased with themselves, or so assured of themselves by reason of their subjection to their private passions, but that they seem divers persons in one & the same day. Seneca hath said it, and so do I: Unus mihi pro populo erat: and to the same effect Epicurus, Ho: ego non multis sed tibi; or (as it hath since lamentably fallen out) Imay borrow the resolution of an ancient Philosopher, Satis est unus, Satis est nullus. For it was for the service of that inestimable Prince Henry, the successive hope, and one of the greatest of the Christian World, that I undertooke this Worke. It pleased him to peruse some part thereof, and to pardon what was amisse. It is now left to the world without a Mafter: from which all that is presented, hath received both blows and thanks: Fadem probamus, eadem reprehendimus: hic exitus est omnis judicii, in quolis secundum plures datur. But these discourses are idle. I know that as the charitable will judge charitably: so against those, qui gloriantur in malitia, my present adversity hath disarmed me. I am on the ground already. therefore have not far to fall: and for rising againe, as in the Naturall privation there is no recession to habit; so it is seldome seene in the privation politique. Ido therefore forbeare to stile my Readers Gentle, Courteous, and Friendly, therby to beg their good opinions, or to promise a second and third volume (which I also intend) if the first receive grace and good acceptance. For that which is already done, may be thought enough, and too much: and it is certaine, let us claw the Reader with never so many courteous phrases, yet shall we evermore be thought fooles, that write foolishly. For conclusion, all the hope I have lies in this, That I have already found more ungentle and uncourteous Readers of my Love towards them, and well-deserving of them, than ever I shall doe againe. For had it been otherwise, I should hardly have had this leifure to have made my selfe a foole in print.

That the invisible God is seene in his Creatures.

O D, whom the wifest men acknowledge to bee a Power uneffable, and Vertue infinite, a Light by abundant claritie invifible; and Understanding which it selfe can onely comprehend, an Effence eremall and spirituall, of absolute purenesse and simplicity; was, and is pleased to make himselfe knowne by the worke of the World: in the wonderfull magnitude whereof, (all which He imbraceth, filleth and fustaineth) we behold the Image of that glory, which cannot be measured, and withall that one, and yet univerfall Nature, which cannot be defined. In the glorious Lights of Heaven, we perceive a shadow of his divine Countenance; in his mercifull provision for all that live, his manifold goodnesse: and lastly, in creating and making existent the World univerfall, by the absolute Art of his owne Word, his Power and Almightinesses, which Power, Light, Vertue, Wisdome, and Goodnesse, being all but attributes of one simple Essence, and one God, we in all admire, and in part discerne per speculum creaturarum, that is, in the disposition, order, and variety of Celestiall and Terrestriall bodies: Terrestriall, in their strange and manifold diversities; Celestiall, in their beauty and magnitude; which in their continuall and contrary motions, are neither repugnant, intermixt, *Hugosuper nor confounded. ding, grounded on these places of S. John and S. Paul, Yee have not heard his voice at any time, neither have ye seene his shape. And againe, Whom never man saw, nor can see.

And this, I am fure, agreeth with the nature of Gods simplicity, of which S. Augustine Ipfaenimnatura, vel substantia, vel quolibet alio nomine appellandum est, id ipsum quod Deus est, corporaliter viderinen poiest; That nature, or that substance, or by whatsoever name that is to be called which is God, whatloever that be, the same cannot be corporally Estatam.Augl.2. de Prince 12. & perceived. And of this opinion were Origen, Cyril, Chry softome, Gregory NaZian Zenus, Hie. rome, Augustine, Gregory the great, Evaristus, Alcuinus, Dionysius Areopagita, Aquinas, and all others of authoritie. But by his owne Word, and by this visible World, is God perceived of men; which is also the understood language of the Almighty, vouch fafed to to all his Creatures, whose Hieroglyphicall Characters, are the unnumbred Starres, the Sunne and Moone, written on these large Volumes of the Firmament: written also on the Earth and the Seas, by the letters of all those living Creatures, and Plants, which inhabite and refide therein. Therefore faid that learned Cus Anus, Mundus universus nihil aliudest, quam Deus explicatus; The World univerfall, is nothing else but God exprest. And the invisible things of God (faith S. Paul) are seene by creation of the World, being confidered in his Creatures. Of all which, there was no other cause preceding, than his owne Will, no other matter than his owne Power, no other workman than his owne Word, no other confideration than his owne infinite Goodnesse. The example and patterne of these his Creatures, as hee beheld the same in all eternity in the abundance of 2 his owne love, fo was it at length in the most wise order, by his unchanged Will moved, by his high Wisedome disposed, and by his almighty Power perfected, and made visible. And therefore (faith Mirandula) we ought to love God, Ex fide, & ex effectibus, (that is) both perswaded by his Word, and by the effects of the Worlds creation: Neg; enim qui causacaret, ex causa & origine sciri, cognosciq; potest, sed vel ex rerum, qua facta sunt quaq; fiunt & gubernantur observatione & collatione, vel ex ipsius Dei verbo : For he of whom there is no higher cause, cannot be knowne by any knowledge of cause or beginning, (faith Montanus) but either by the observing and conferring of things, which he hath, or doth create and governe, or else by the Word of God himfelfe.

> That the wisest of the Heathen, whose authority is not to be dispised, have acknowledged the world to have beene created by God.

His worke and creation of the World, did most of the ancient and learned Philo-I fophers acknowledge, though by divers termes, and in a different manner exprest, I meane all those who are intitled by S.Augustine, Summi Philosophi, Philosophers of highest judgement and understanding. Mercurius Trismegistus calleth God, Principium universorum; The original of the universall: to whom he giveth also the attributes of Mens, Natura, Actus, Necessitas, Finis, & Renovatio. And wherein he truely, with S. Paul, cafteth upon God all power; confessing also, that the world was made by Gods almighty Word, and not by hands: Verbo, non manibus fabricatus est mundus. Zoroaster (whom Heraclitus followed in opinion) tooke the word Fire, to expresse God by (as in Deuteronomy, and in S. Paul it is used) Omnia ex unoigne genita sunt , All things (faith he) are caused, or produced out of one fire.

So did Orpheus plainely teach, that the world had beginning in time, from the Will of the most High God; whose remarkeable words are thus converted: Cum abscendisset omnia Jupiter summus, deinde in lumen gratum emisit, ex sacro corde operans cogitata & mirabilia : Of which I conceive this sense : When great Jupiter had hidden all thing in him. selfe; working out of the love of his sacred heart, he sent thence, or brought forth into gratefull light, the admirable workes which he had fore-thought.

Pindarus the Poet, and one of the wifest, acknowledged also one God, the most High, to be the Father and Creator of all things : Unus Deus, Pater, Creator fummus. P L A T O calleth God the cause and originall, the nature and reason of the universall; Totius rerum natura, causa, & origo Deus. But hereof more at large hereafter.

Now, although the curiofity of some men have found it superfluous, to remember the opinions of Philosophers, in matters of Divinity: (it being true, that the Scripture hath not want of any forraine testimonie) yet as the Fathers, with others excellently learned, are my examples herein; fo S. Paul himselfe did not despise, but thought it lawfull and profitable, to remember whatfoever hee found agreeable to the Word of Godamong the Heathen, that he might thereby take from them all escape, by way of ignorance. God rendring vengeance to them that know him not as in the Epiftle to Titus he cyteth Epimenides against the Cretians, and to the Corinthians, Menander; and in the feventeenth of the Acts, Aratus &c. For, Truth (faith S. Ambrofe) by whom foever uttered is of the holy Ghost; Veritas à quocunq; dicatur, à Spiritusancto est: and lastly, let those kind of men learne this rule ; Que facris ferviunt prophana non funt ; Nothing is prophane that serveth to the use of holy things.

> 6. III. Of the meaning of In Principio, Genef. 1.1.

His visible world of which Moses writeth, God created in the beginning, or, first of all: in which (faith Tertullian) things began to be. This word Beginning (in which the Hebrewes feeke fome hidden mysterie, and which in the Jewes Targum is converted by the word Sapientia) cannot be referred to fuccession of time, nor to order, as some men have conceived, both which are subsequent: but onely to Creation then. For before that Beginning, there was neither primarie matter to be informed, nor forme to informe, nor any being, but the Eternall. Nature was not, nor the next Parent of Time begotten, Time properly and naturally taken: for if God had but disposed of Matter already in being, then as the word Beginning could not be referred to all things. fo must it follow, that the institution of Matter proceeded from a greater power, than that of God. And by what name shall wee then call such an One (faith Lanctantius) as exceedeth God in potency: for it is an act of more excellencie to make than to dispose of things made : whereupon it may be concluded that Matter could not be before this Beginning: except we faine a double creation, or allow of two powers, and both infinite, the impossibility whereof scorneth defence. Namimpossibile plura esse infinita: quoniam cusande mente alterum estern altero finitum. There cannot be more infinites than one: for one of them 163. would limit the other.

of the meaning of the words Heaven and Earth, Genef. i. 1.

■He univerfall matter of the world (which Mofes comprehendeth under the names of Heaven and Earth) is by divers diversly understood: for there are that conceive, that by those words was meant the first matter, as the Peripatetickes understand it to which S. Augustine and Isidore seeme to adhere. Fecisti mundum (favth S. Augustine de materia informi, quam fecifi de nulla re pene nullamrem : that is Thou hast made the world of a matter without forme which matter thou made ft of nothing, and being made it was little other than nothing.

But this potential and imaginarie materia prima, cannot exist without forme. Peter Lombard, the Schoolemen, Beda, Lyranus, Comeftor, Tostatus, and others affirme, that it pleased God first of all to create the Empyrean Heaven: which at the succeeding instant (faith Beda and Strabo) he filled with Angels. This Empyrean Heaven Steuchius Engubi. Beda Hex. Strab nus calleth Divine clarity, and uncreated: an errour, for which he is sharpely charged by Europe de Parerius, though (as I conceive) he rather failed in the fub fequent, when he made it to be rather failed in the fub fequent, when he made it to be rather failed in the fub fequent. a place, and the seate of Angels and just Soules, than in the former affirmation: for of the first, That God liveth in eternall Light, it is written; My foule, praise thou the Lord, Platsonie that covereth himselfe with light: and in the Revelation; And the City hath no need of the Clavitus divines noneflux fix Sunne, neyther of the Moone to shine in it: for the glory of God did light it. And herein also eta, ed fajea-John Mercer upon Genefis, differeth not in opinion from Engulinus: for as by Heaven liabeing created in the beginning, was not meant the invisible or supercelestiall, so in his judgement, because it was in all eternitie the glorious seat of God himselfe, it was not neces-Sarie to be created; Quem mundum supercalestem meo judicio creari (faith Mercer) non e. capatous fa rat necelle the weaknesse of their capacities, whom he then cared to informe of those things which were more manifest, (to wit) that God did not only by a strong hand deliver them from the bondage of <code>Egypt</code>, according to his promise made to their foresathers; but also that he created, and was the sole cause of this aspectable, and perceiveable Universall: so on the other side I dare not thinke, that any supercelestiall Heaven, or whatsoever else (not the other side I dare not thinke, that any supercelestiall Heaven, or whatsoever else (not the other side I dare not thinke, that any supercelestiall Heaven, or whatsoever else (not the other side I dare not thinke, that any supercelestiall Heaven, or whatsoever else (not the other side I dare not thinke, that any supercelestiall Heaven, or whatsoever else (not the other side I dare not thinke, that any supercelestial Heaven, or whatsoever else (not the other world created, himselse) was increased and as for the place of God (saith Baruch) selfe, whom no magnitude else can containe: How great is the bouse of God (saith Baruch) show large is the place of his possession! it is great, and hath no end, it is high and unmeassurable. To be the supercelestic that he supercelestic strong allowed that he supercelestic supercelestic strong allowed that he supercelestic supercelestic strong and allowed that he supercelestic supercelestic strong and supercelestic superc

But leaving multiplicity of opinion, it is more probable and allowed, that by the words Heaven and Earth, was meant the folid matter and substance, aswell of all the words Heavens, and Orbes supernall, as of the Globe of the Earth and Waters, which covered it Heavens, to wit) that very matter of all things, materia, Chaos, possibilitas, sive possession over, (to wit) that very matter of all things, materia, Chaos, possibilitas, sive possession which matter (faith Calvin) was so called, quod totius mundi semen sucrit; Because it was the seed of the Universal . an opinion of ancient Philosophers long before-

That the substance of the waters, as mixt in the body of the earth, is by Mosks understood in 20 the word Earth: and that the Earth, by the attributes of unformed and voide, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heathen.

Os Es first nameth Heaven and Earth (putting waters but in the third place) as comprehending waters in the word Earth; but afterwards hee nameth them apart, when God by his Spirit began to distinguish the confused Masse, and (as Basil saith) praparare naturam aqua ad facunditatem vitalem; to prepare the nature of water to a vital fruitful nesse.

For under the word Heaven, was the matter of all heavenly bodies, & natures express: and by the name of Earth and waters, all was meant, what foever is under the Moone, and subject to alteration. Corrupt seedes bring forth corrupt plants; to which the pure 30 heavens are not subject, though subject to perishing. They shall perish (faith David) and the heavens shall vanish away like smoake, saith Esay. Neither were the waters the matter of Earth: for it is written, Let the waters under the heavens be gathered into one place, and let the drie land appeare: which proveth, that the drie land was mixt and covered with the waters, and not yet diftinguished; but no way, that the waters were the matter or seede of the Earth, much lesse of the Universall. Initio tu Domine terram fundasti, Thou, O Lord. in the beginning hast founded the Earth : and againe, The Earth was covered with the Deepe (meaning with waters) as with a garment; faith David. And if by naturall arguments it may be proved, that water by condensation may become earth, the same reason teacheth us also, that earth rarified may become water: water, aire; aire, fire; and so on the 40 contrarie. Deus ignis substantiam per aerem in aquam convertit, God turneth the substance of fire, by aire, into water. For the Heavens and the Earth remained in the fame state, in which they were created, as touching their fubstance, though there was afterwards added multiplicitie of perfection, in respect of beauty and ornament. Calum verò & terra in statu creationis remanserunt, quantum ad substantiam, licet multiplex perfectio decoris & ora natus eis postmodum superaddita est. And the word which the Hebrews call Maim, is not to be understood according to the Latine translation simply, and as specificall water; but the same more properly signifieth liquor. For (according to Montanus) Est autem Maim liquor geminus, & boc nomen propter verborum penuriam, Latina lingua plurali numero aquas fecit. For Maim (faith he) is a double liquor (that is, of divers natures) and this name 50 or word the Latines, wanting a voyce to exprese it call it in the Plurall, Aquas, Waters.

This Masse, or indigested matter, or Chaos created in the beginning, was without forme, that is, without the proper forme, which it afterwards acquired, when the Spirit of God had separated the Earth, and digested it from the waters. And the earth was woide: that is, not producing any creatures, or adorned with any plants, struits, or flowers. But after the Spirit of God had moved upon the waters and wrought this indigested matter into that forme, which it now recayneth, then did the earth bud forth the herbe, which seed the seed, and the struit full tree according to his kind, and God saw that it was good: which struit full tree according to his kind, and God saw that it was good: which struit full tree according to his kind, and God saw that it was good: which attribute was not given to the Earth, while it was confused; nor to the Heavens, before they had motion, and adornement. God saw that it was good; that is, made perfect: for perfection is that to which nothing is warting. Et perfect Dei perfect sunt opera; The works of the perfect God, are perfect.

From this lump of imperfect Matter had the ancient Poets their invention of Demograpon: Hesiodus and Anaxagorus the knowledge of that Chaos: of which Ovid:

Ante Mare, & Terras, & (quod tegit omnia) Cælum, Unus erat toto natura vultus in Orbe, Quem dixêre Chaos, rudis indigestage moles.

Before the Sea and Land was made, and Heaven, that all doth hide; In all the World one onely face of Nature did abide: Which Chaos hight, a huge rude heape.

How it is to be understood that the Spirit of God moved upon the Waters, and that this is not to be searched curiously.

Fter the Creation of Heaven and Earth, then void and without forme, the Spirit of God moved upon the Waters. The Seventy Interpreters use the word superfe-20 A rebatur, moved upon or over: incubabat, or fovebat (faith Hierome) out of Basil; and Basil out of a Syrian Doctor; Equidem non meam tibi, sed viri cujusdam Syrisenten- Basil. Herann. tiam recensebo (faith Basil:) which words incubare or fovere, importing warmth, harching, or quickning, have a speciall likenesse. Verbum translatumest ab avibus pullitiei sue incubantibus, quamvis spirituali, & plane inenarrabili, non autem corporali modo. The word is ta- Junio. ken of birds hatching their yong, not corporally, but in a spiritual and unexpressible manner. Some of the Hebrewes convert it to this effect, Spiritus Dei volitabat . The Spirit of God did flutter : the Chaldwan Paraphrast in this sense. Fentus à conspectu Dei sufflabat : or as other understand the Chaldwan, Flabat, pellebat, removebat: The wind from the face of God did blow under, drive, or remove, or did blow upon; according to the 147. Pfalme, Pfalme, Pfalme, 30 He caused his wind to blow, and the waters increase: but there was yet no wind nor exhalation. Ar Montage Arias Montanus in these words, Et Spiritus Elohim Meracheset, idest, efficaciter motitans supersuling consovens ac acitans super facies remini lianoris. The Spirit of God effectively of consovens. confovens, ac agitans super facies gemini liquoris; The Spirit of God effectually & often moving, keeping warme, and cherifbing, quickning and stirring upon the face of this double liquor. For he maketh foure originals, whereof three are agents, and the last passive and materiall, to wit, Caufa, which is the divine goodnesse: Jehi, which is, flat sive, erit, Let it Ar. Montide bee, or it shall be. Que vox verbo Dei prima prolata fuit : Which voice (faith he) was the natura paging first that was uttered by the word of God. The third, Spiritus Elohim, the Spirit of God, id est, vis quadam divina, agilis acprasens, per omnia pertingens, omnia complens; that is, A certaine divine power, or frength every where active and extending, and firetching through Ao all, filling and finishing allthings. The fourth he calleth Maim, idest, materies ad omnemrem conficiendam habilis , Matter apt to become every thing. For my felfe, I am refolved (Cima Deus sit super rationale omni ratione; Seeing God is in all reason above reason) that although the effects which follow his wonderfull waies of working, may in a measure be perceived by mans understanding, yet the maner and first operation of his divine power, cannot be conceived by any mind, or spirit, compassed with a mortall body. Animalis homo que Dei sunt non percipit : For my thoughts (faith the Lord in E s A +) are not your Elaste? thoughts, neither are your wayes my wayes. And as the world hath not knowne God himselfe: fo are his wayes (according to S.Pall) past finding out. O righteous Father, the world hath not knowne thee, faith Christ. And therefore, whether that motion, vitality 50 and operation, were by incubation or how elfe, the manner is onely knowne to God. Quomodoin omnibus sit rebus vel per essentiam, vel per potentiam, intellectus noster non ca- Aug Tractico. Pit; For, how God faith S. Gen. 1.2

of the Univerfall, is a labour and fearch like unto his, who not contented with a knowne and fafe Foord, wil prefume to paffe over the greatest River in all parts, where he is ignorant of their depths: for so doth the one lose his life, and the other his understanding. We behold the Sunne, and enjoy his light, as long as wee looke towards it, but tenderly, and circumspectly: we warme our selves safely, while we stand neere the fire; but if we seeke to out-face the one, to enter into the other, we forthwith become blind or burnt,

But to eschew curiofity: this is true, that the English word (moved) is most proper and fignificant: for of motion proceedethall production, and all what foever is effected. And this omnipotent Spirit of God, which may indeed be truely called, Principium motus, and with MIRAN DULA, Vis causa efficientis, The force of the efficient cause; S. Augustine some- 10 times taketh for the holy Ghoft; fometime for a wind or breath, Sub nomine Spiritus, under the name of a Spirit, which is sometimes so taken: or for virtualis creatura, For a created virtuality : Tertullian and Theodoret call it also a breath or winde : Mercurius namethit, Spiritum tenuem intelligibilem, A pure or thin intelligible Spirit: Anaxa Goras, Mentem: Tostatus, Voluntatem & mentem Dei : The will and minde of God : which mens, Plato in Timeo, maketh Animammundi, The foule of the world: and in his fixt Booke de Republica, he calleth it the Law of Heaven; in his Epistles, The Leader of things to come. and the presence of things past. But as Cyprian wrote of the Incarnation of Christ our Saviour, Mens desicit, vox silet, & non mea tantum, sed etiam Angelorum; My minde fayleth, my voyce is silent, and not mine onely, but even the voyce Angels: so may all menelse say in 20 the understanding, and utterance of the wayes and works of the Creation; for to him (faith NaZianZenus) there is not one substance by which he is, and another, by which hee can, Sed consubstantiale illi est, quicquid ejus est, & quicquid est; Whatsoever attribute of him there is, and what foever he is it is the very fame fub stance that him felfe is.

But the Spirit of God which moved upon the waters, cannot be taken for a breath or wind, nor for any other creature, separate from the infinite active power of God, which then formed and diftinguished, and which now fustaineth, and giveth continuance to the Universall. For the Spirit of the Lord filleth all the world; and the same is it which main. tayneth all things, faith SALOMON. If thou fend forth thy Spirit (faith David) they are created: And GREGORY, Deus suo prasentiali esse, dat omnibus rebus esse, ita quod si se 30 rebus subtraheret, sicut de nihilo facta sunt omnia, sic innihilum defluerent universa; Godgi, wethbeing to all things, by being present with all things, so as if he should withdraw himselfe from them then as of nothing the world was made, it would againe fall away and vanish into nothing. And this working of Gods Spirit in all things, Virgil hath exprest excellently:

And this was the same Spirit, which moved in the Universall, and thereby both di-Stinguished and adorned it. His Spirit bath garnished the Heavens, faith Job. So then the Spirit of God moved upon the waters, and created in them their spirituality, and naturall motion; motion brought forth heate; and heate rarifaction, and fubtilty of parts. By this Spirit (which gave heate and motion, and thereby, operation to every nature, 5 while it moved upon the waters, which were in one indigested lump, and Chaos, dispofed to all formes alike) was begotten Aire: an element superior, as lighter than the waters, through whose vast, open, subtile, Diaphanicke, or transparent body, the light afterwards created might eafily transpierce: Light for the excellency thereof being the first creature which God called good, whose creation immediatly followed. This Spirit Chysostome calleth a vitall Operation, Aquis à Des insitam, ex qua aqua non solum motisnem, sed & vim procreandi animalia habuerint. Hee callethit, A vitall Operation given by God unto the waters, whereby the waters had pot onely motion, but also power to procreate or S.VII. bring forth living Creatures.

of the light created, as the materiall substance of the Sunne : and of the nature of it, and diff. cultly of knowledge of it: and of the excellency and use of it: and of motion, and heate and nexeduntoit.

Hefe waters were afterwards congregated, and called the Sea: and this Light afterwards (in the fourth day) gathered and united, and called the Sunne, the Organ, and inftrument of created light. For this first and dispersed light did not (as I conceive) distinguish the night from the day, but with a reference to the Sunnes To creation, and the uniting of the dispersed light therein. This is proved by these words, Let there be lights in the Firmament, to separate the day from the night : which Genes. 14. lights in the firmament of Heaven, were also made for fignes, & for seasons, and for dayes. and for yeares, implying a motion inftantly to follow, by which, dayes and yeares are diflinguished; after which succeeded Time, or together with which, that Time (which was the measure of motion) began. For that space of the first three dayes which preceded the Sunnes creation, or formall perfection, when as yet there was not any motion to be meafured, and the day named in the fift Verse; was but such a space, as afterwards by the Sunnes motion made a civill or naturall day. And as Waters were the matter of Aire, of the firmament, and of the lower and upper waters, and of the Seas, and Creatures there-20 in: Earth, the matter of Beafts, Plants, Minerals, and Mans body: fo may Light (for expression sake) be called the Chaos, or materiall substance of the Sunne, and other lights of heaven: Howbeit, neither the Sunne, nor any thing fensible, is that Light it selfe. Que causa est lucidorum, which is the cause that things are light some (though it make Luxdicium) it felfe & all things else visible): but a body most illightned, which illuminate the Moon, que le comit felse & all things else visible): but a body most illightned, which illuminate the Moon, que le comit felse & all things else visible): but a body most illightned, which illuminate the Moon, que le comit felse & all things else visible): but a body most illightned, which illuminate the Moon, que le comit felse & all things else visible): but a body most illightned, which illuminate the Moon, que le comit felse & all things else visible): but a body most illightned, which illuminate the Moon, que le comit felse & all things else visible): but a body most illightned, which illuminate the Moon, que le comit felse & all things else visible): but a body most illightned, which illuminate the Moon, que le comit felse & all things else visible): but a body most illightned, which illightned illi by whom the neighbouring Region (which the Greeks call Ather, the place of the fup discussion) posed Element of fire) is affected and qualified, and by it all bodies living in this our compendator, aire. For this light Avicenna calleth vehiculum & fomentum omnium calestium virtu. & executibis. tum & impressionum : The conducter, and preserver, or nourisher of all celestiall vertues and impressions, nothing descending of heavenly influences, but by the medium, or meanes. 30 of light. Aristotle calleth light a quality, inherent, or cleaving to a Diaphanous body, Lumen est qualitas inharens Diaphano : but this may be better avouched of the heate, which it transporteth and bringeth with it, or conducteth: which heate (fay the Platonicks) Abeunte lumine residet in subjecto, The light being departed, dothreside in the subject, Ficiallib de Inas warmth in the aire, though the same be deprived of light. This light Plotinus and all the Academicks make incorporall, & so doth Montanus, Cui nec duritia resistit, nec spatium ; Which neither hardnesse resisteth, nor space leaveth.

Aristotle findeth corporality in the beames of light; but it is but by way of repetition of other mens opinions, faith Picolomineus. Democritus, Leucippus, and Epicurus, Picale finite give materiality to light it selfe, but improperly: for it passeth at an instant, from the Heaven to the Earth, nor is it relisted by any hardnesse; because it pierceth through the folid body of glaffe, or other Crystalline matter; & whereas it is withstood by uncleane, and unpure earthy fubstances, lesse hard, and more easie to invade than the former, the fame is, Quodobstaculum natura terreum atq ; fordidum, non capit candidam lunzinis purita-Plotius tem; Because an obstacle by nature earth, and foule, doth not receive the pure clearenesse of light : alluding to that most divine Light, which onely shineth on those mindes, which are purged from all worldly droffe, and humane uncleanneffe.

But of this created light, there is no agreement in opinion; neither doe I marvaile at it for it cannot be found either in the Fathers, Philosophers, or Schoole-men, or other ancient or later Writers, that any of them understood either it or themselves therein: all o men (to cast offignorance) have disputed thereof, but there is no man that hath beene taught thereby. Thomas Aquinas (not inferiour to any in wit) as hee hath shewed little strength of argument in refuting the opinions of Beda, Hugo, Lombard, Lyranus, and others: fo is his owne judgement herein as weake as any mans; and most of the Schoole men were rather curious in the nature of termes, and more subtile in distinguishing upon the parts of doctrine already laid downes than discoverers of any thing hidden, either in Philosophy or Divinity: of whom it may be truely fayd, Nihil sapientia odiosius acumine nimio, Nothing is more odious to true wisedome, than too acute sharpnesse. Neither hatia the length of time, and the fearch of many learned men, (which the fame time hath CHAP.I. $.8.

brought forth and devoured) refolved us, whether this light be substantiall, corporall, or incorporall: Corporall they fay it cannot be, because then it could neither pierce the aire, nor those hard, solid, and Diaphanous bodies; which it doth, and yet every day we fee the aire illightned: incorporall it cannot be, because it sometime affecteth the fight of the eye with offence, and therefore by most of the Fathers so esteemed. Others fay (as Patricius) that it cannot be matter, because no forme so excellent as it selfe to informe it : neither can it be any accident, which is not separable without the destruction of the subject: for light being taken from the Sunne, the Sunne is no more the Sunne in existence. Secondly, if light were proceeding from matter and forme, then either, or both must be one of these, lucide or bright, darke or opake, Diaphanous or transparent; to but darkenesse cannot be parent of light; and things Diaphanous (being neither light, nor darknesse, but capable of either) cannot be the cause of either, and therefore must the matter, or forme, or both, be lucide and shining. Lucide and shining obtaine their so being of the light; and therefore, if wee derive this being of light from a former, then would the progresse goe on infinitely and against nature; and therefore he concludeth, that light in the Sunne hath his being primarily, and immediately of it selfe, and is therefore the Sunnes forme, and the forme of all lucide and shining bodies: but what is taught hereby, let others judge.

But in my understanding, Lumen (which may be Englished by the word Shine) is an intentionall Species of that, which may bee Englished by Light, and so, this shining 2d which proceedeth from the Sunne, or other lights of Heaven, or from any other light, is an Image, or intentionall Species thereof; & an intentionall Species may be underflood by the example of a red, or greene colour, occasioned by the shining of the Sun through red or greene glaffe: for then we perceive the same colour cast upon any thing opposite; which rednesse or other colour, we call the intentionall Species of the colour in that glasse. And againe, as this light, touching his fimple nature, is no way yet understood: To it is disputed, whether this light first created, bee the same which the Sunne inholdeth and cafteth forth, or whether it had continuance any longer than till the Sunnes creation.

But by the most wife and unchanged order, which God observed in the worke of the World, I gather, that the Light, in the first day created, was the substance of the Sunne: 30 for Moles repeateth twice the maine parts of the Universall: first, as they were created in matter; secondly, as they were adorned with forme: first, naming the Heavens, the Earth, the Waters, all confused; and afterward, the Waters congregated, the Earth made drie Land, and the Heavens distinguished from both, and beautified. And therefore the Earth, as it was earth, before it was uncovered, and before it was called Arida, or drie Land; and the Waters were waters, before they were congregated and called the Sea, though neither of them perfect, or inriched with their vertuall formes: So the Sun although it had not his formall prefection, his circle, beauty, and bounded magnitude, till the fourth day, yet was the substance thereof in the first day (under the name of Light) created; and this Light formerly dispersed, was in the same fourth day united, and set 44 in the Firmament of Heaven: for, to Light created in the first day, God gave no proper place or fixation; and therefore the effects named by Anticipation, (which was to separate day from night) were precifely performed, after this Light was congregated, and had obtained life and motion. Neither did the wisedome of God finde cause why it should move (by which motion, dayes and nights are distinguished) till then: because there was not yet any Creature produced, to which, by moving, the Sunne might give light, heate and operation.

But after the Earth (diftinguished from Waters) began to bud forth the bud of the herbe,&c. God caused the Sunne to move, and (by enterchange of time) to visite every part of the inferiour world; by his heate to stirre up the fire of generation, and to give 50 activity to the feedes of all natures: For, as a King, which commandeth some goodly building to be erected, doth accommodate the fame to that use and end, to which it was ordained; so it pleased God (faith Procopius) to command the Light to bee; which by his all-powerfull Word hee approved, and approving it, disposed thereof, to the use and comfort of his future Creatures.

But in that it pleased God to aske of Jo B, By what way is the light parted, and where is the way where light dwelleth? we thereby know, that the nature thereof falleth not under mans understanding ; and therefore let it suffice, that by Gods grace we enjoy the effects thereof. For this light is of the treasure of God (faith E s D R A s :) And those which Esdl. 2.06.40 inhabite the Heavens, doe only know the Essence thereof. Nibil ignotum in calo, nibil notum Hem. interra : Nothing unknowne in Heaven, nothing perfectly knowne on earth. Res were funt in mundo invisibili; in mundo visibili umbra rerum: Things themselves are in the invisibile world in the world visible, but their shadowes. Surely, if this Light be not spirituall, ver it approcheth neerest unto spiritualitie; and if it have any corporalitie, then of all other the most subtile and pure; for howsoever, it is of all things seene, the most beautifull, and of the fwiftest motion, of all other the most necessary and beneficiall. For it ministreth to men, and other creatures, all celeftiall influences; it diffipateth those sad thoughts and forrowes, which the darknesse both begetteth and maintayneth; it discovereth unto us the glorious workes of God, and carryeth up with an Angelicall fwiftnesse, our eyes unto Heaven, that by the fight thereof, our minds being informed of his visible marvailes, may continually travaile to furmount these perceived Heavens, and to finde out their omnipotent Cause and Creator. Cognitio non quiescit in rebus creatis; Our knowledge doth not Fine auiet it selfe in things created. Et ipsa lux facit, ut cateramundi membra digna sint laudibus, cum suam bonitatem & decorem omnibus communicet; It is the Light (fairh Saint AMBROSE) that maketh the other parts of the world so worthy of praise seeing that it selfecommunicateth its goodnesse and beauty unto all. Of which ovid out of orpheus:

Ille ego fum, qui longum metior annum. Omnia qui video, per quem videt omnia mundus. Mundi oculus.

Quid Met 1.83

The World discernes it selfe, while I the World behold, By me the longest yeares, and other times are told, I the worlds eve.

Lastly, if we may behold in any creature, any one sparke of that eternal fire, or any far-offdawning of Gods glorious brightnesse, the same in the beautie, motion, and vertue of this Light, may be perceived. Therefore was God called Lux ipfa, and the Light, by Hermes named Lux fantta, and Christ our Saviour faid to be that Light, which light- John got 14 nethevery manthat commeth into the world. Yet in respect of Gods incomprehensible sub- 46. limitie, and puritie, this is also true, that God is neither a minde, nor a Spirit of the nature of other spirits ; nor a light, such as can be discerned. Deus profecto non mens est, at verò ut sit mens causa est ; nec spiritus, sed causa qua spiritus extat ; nec lumen, sed causa qua lumen existit : God (faith HERMEs in Poemandro) certainly is not a minde, but the cause that the minde bath his being; nor spirit, but the cause by which every spirit is; nor light, but the cause by which the light existeth.

So then the Masse and Chaos being first created, void, darke, and unformed, was by the operative Spirit of God, pierced and quickned; and the Waters, having now received Spirit and motion, refolved their thinner parts into Aire, which Godillightned: the Earth also by being contiguat, & mixt with waters (participating the same divine vertue) General brought forth the bud of the herbe that feedeth feede, &c. and for a meane and organ, by which this operative vertue might be continued, God appointed the Light to be united, and gave it also motion and heate, which heate caused a continuance of those severall species, which the Earth (being made fruitfull by the Spirit) produced, and with motion begat the time and times fucceeding.

Of the Firmament, and of the waters above the Firmament: and whether there be any Crys. stalline Heaven, or any Primum mobile.

Fter that the Spirit of God had moved upon the waters, and light was created, God said, Let there be a Firmament in the middest of the waters, and let it separate the waters from the waters: that is, those waters which by rarifaction and evaporation were ascended, and those of the Earth and Sea.

But these waters separate above this extension, which the Latine Translation calleth firmamentum, or expansum (for so Vatablus, Pagninus, and Junius turne it) are not the Crystalline Heavens, created in the imaginations of men; which opinion Bafilius Magwas calletha childish supposition, making in the same place many learned arguments against this infancie. For the waters above the firmament, are the waters in the ayre above us, where the fame is more folid and condense, which God separated from the neather waters by a firmament, that is, by an extended distance and vast space: the words Raquia, which Montanus writeth Rakiagh, and Shamajim, being indifferently taken for the heaven and for ayre, and more properly for the ayre and Ather, than for the heavens, as the best Hebricians understand them, Quo suprema ac tenuia ab insimis crassis di. ducta, intersectaq; distarent, for that whereby the supreme and thin bodies were placed in distance, being severed and cut off from low and grosse matters: and the waters above the firmament, exprest in the word Majim, are in that tongue taken properly for the waters above the ayre, or in the uppermost region of the same.

And that the word Heaven is used for the Ayre, the Scriptures every where witnesse; as in the bleffings of Joseph, and in the 104. Pfalme: * By these Springs shall the fowle of the Heaven dwell; and oupon Sodome and Gomorrha it rained brimstone and fire out of the Heawen; and in Ifaces bleffing to Jacob; God give therefore of the dew of Heaven: and in Deuteronomy the 11. But the land whither you goe to possesse it is a land that drinketh water of the rayne of Heaven; and in Job, Who bath ingendred the frosts of Heaven; and in S. Matthew, Behold the Fowles of Heaven, for they fow not . So as in all the Scriptures of the Old Testament throughout, is the word Heaven very often used for Ayre, and taken also hyperbolically for any great height, as, Let us build as a Tower, whose sop may reachts Heaven &c. And in this very place Basil avoucheth, that this appellation of Heaven for 20 the Firmament, is but by way of similitude : his owne words be these ; Et vocavit Deus firmamentum cœlum. Hœc appellatio alti quidem proprie accommodatur, huic autem nunc ad similitudinem , And God called the firmament Heaven: This appellation (faith Basil) is properly applyed to another (that is, to the Starrie Heaven) but to this (that is, to the Firmament dividing the waters) it is imposed by similitude. And if there were no other proofe, that by the firmament was meant the Ayre, and not the Heaven, the wordes of Moses in the eighth verse, conferred with the same word Firmament in the twentieth verse, make it manifest : for in the eighth verse it is written, that God called the Firmament, which divided waters from waters, Heaven; and in the twentieth verse he calleth the firmament of Heaven, Ayre, in these words: And let the Fowle flye upon the 32 earth in the open firmament of Heaven. And what use there should be of this yeie or crystalline, or waterie Heaven, I conceive not, except it bee to moderate and temper the heare, which the primum mobile would otherwise gather and increase: though in very truth, in stead of this helpe, it would adde an unmeasurable greatnesse of circle, whereby the swiftnesse of that first Moveable would exceed all possibilitie of beleefe. Sed nemo tenetur ad impossibilia; but no man ought to be held to impossibilities: and faith it selse (which furmounteth the height of all humane reason) hath for a forcible conducter, the Word of Truth, which also may be called lumen omnis ration is of intellectus, the light of all reason and under standing. Now that this supposed first Moveable, turneth it selfe so many hundred thousand miles in an instant (seeing the Scriptures teach it not) let those 40 that can beleeve mens imagination, apprehend it, for I cannot. But of these many Heavens, let the Reader that desireth satisfaction, search orontins, and of this waterie Heaven, Basilius Magnus, in his Hexam. fol. 40.41. Gr. and Matth. Beroaldus, his second Booke and fixt chapter. For my felfe, I am perswaded, that the waters called, The waters above the Heavens, are but the clouds and waters engendred in the uppermost ayre.

A conclusion, repeating the summe of the workes in the Creation which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter, The forming of it, The finishing of it.

O conclude, it may be gathered out of the first Chapter of Genesis, that this was the order of the most wise God in the beginning, and when there was no other nature, or being, but Gods incomprehensible eternitie. First, hee created the matter of all things : and in the first three dayes hee distinguished and gave to every nature his proper forme; the forme of levicie to that which afcended; to that which descended, the forme of gravitie: for hee separated light from darkenesse, divided waters from waters, and gathered the waters under the firmament into one place. In the last three dayes, God adorned, beautified, and replenished the World: hee fet in the Firmament of Heaven, the Sunne, Moone, and Starres; filled the Earth with Beafts, the Aire with Fowle, and the Sea with Fish, giving to all that have life, a power generative, thereby to continue their Species and kindes; to Creatures vegetative and growing, their feedes in themselves; for he created all things, that they might have their being; and the was deside generations of the world are preserved.

That Nature is no Principium per se; nor Forme the giver of being: and of our ignorance how (econd causes should have any proportion with their effects.

Nd for this working power, which we call Nature, the beginning of motion and rest, according to Aristotle, the same is nothing else, but the strength and Afaculty, which God hath infused into every creature, having no other selfe-ability, than a Clocke, after it is wound up by a mans hand, hath. These therefore that attribute unto this faculty, any first or sole power, have therein no other understanding, than fuch a one hath, who looking into the Sterne of a Ship, and finding it guided by the Helme and Rudder, doth ascribe some absolute vertue to the peece of wood, without all confideration of the hand that guides it, or of the judgement, which also directeth and commandeth that hand: forgetting in this and in all else, that by the vertue of the first act, all Agents worke what soever they worke: Virtute primi actus agunt agentia omnia quicquid agunt: for as the minde of man feeth by the Organ of the eve, heareth by the eares, and maketh choyce by the will: and therefore wee attribute fight to the eye, and hearing to the eares, &c. and yet it is the minde onely, that giveth ability, life, and motion to all these his instruments and Organs; so God worketh by Angels, by the Sunne, by the Starres, by Nature, or infufed properties, and by men, as by feverall Organs, feverall effects; all fecond causes whatsoever, being but instruments, conduites, and pipes, which carry and disperse what they have received from the head and fountaine of the Univerfall. For as it is Gods infinite power, and everiewhere-presence (compassing, embracing, and piercing all things) that giveth to the Sunne power to draw up vapours, to vapours to be made cloudes, cloudes to containe raine, and raine to fall: fo all fecond and inftrumentall causes, together with Nature it selfe, without that operative faculty which God gave them, would become altogether filent, vertueleffe, and dead : of which excellently O R P H E U S; Per te virefount om- Natura enion nia, All things by thee spring forth in youthfull greene. I enforce not these things, thereby remota provito annihilate those variable vertues which God hath given to his creatures, animate dentia & pote-and inanimate, to heavenly and earthly bodies, &c. for all his workes in their vertues profits missless. prayse him: but of the manner how God worketh in them, or they in or with each o- Last defait sa ther, which the Heathen Philosophers, and those that follow them, have taken on piential 3 cases them to teach: I fay, there is not any one among them, nor any one among us, that could ever yet conceive it, or expresse it, ever enrich his owne understanding with any certaine truth, or ever edifie others (not foolish by selfe-flattery) therein. For (faith Lactantius, speaking of the wisedome of the Philosophers) Si facultas invenienda veritatis huic studio subjaceret, aliquando esset inventa; cum verò tot temporibus, tot ingeniis in ejus inquisitione contritis, non sit comprehensa, apparet nullam ibi esse sapientiam; If in this sudie (faith hee) were meanes to find out the truth, it had ere this bin found out : but seeing it is not yet comprehended, after that so much time, and so many wits have beene worne out in the inquirie of it, it appeareth, that there is no wisedome there to be had. Nam si de una re con de mone pracifa scientia haberetur, omnium rerum scientia necessario haberetur: If the precise know-tib 3, ledge of any one thing were to be had, it should necessarily follow, that the knowledge of all things were to be had. And as the Philosophers were ignorant in Nature, and the wayes of her working: so were they more curious, than knowing, in their first matter and Phyficall forme. For if their first marter had any being, it were not then the first matter: for, as it is the first matter; it hath onely a power of being, which it altogether leaveth, when it doth substift. And seeing it is neither a substance perfect, nor a substance inchoate, or in the way of perfection, how any other substance should thence take concrescence, it hath not beene taught, neyther are these formes (saith a learned Author) any thing, fex ea exprimatur potentia, qua nibil est. Againe, bow this first matter should bee sub-jectum formarum, and passive, which is understood to precede the forme, it is hard to conceive: for to make forme, which is the cause, to be subsequent to the thing caused (to wit, to the first matter) is contrary to all reason, divine and humane: onely it may bee faid, that originally there is no other difference betweene matter and forme, than betweene heate and fire, of which the one cannot subfift without the other, but in a kinde of rationall confideration. Leaving therefore these Riddles to their Lovers, who by certaine scholasticall distinctions wrest and pervert the truth of all things, and by which Aristotle hath laboured to prove a false eternitie of the World, I thinke it farre sa. fer to affirme with Saint Augustine, That all species and kindes are from God, from whom, what soever is naturall proceedeth, of what kinde or estimation soever, from whence are 10 the seedes of all formes, and the formes of all seedes and their motions; A quo est omnis see cies, à quo est quicquid naturaliter est, cujuscunq; generis est, cujuscunq; est imationis est à quo funt semina formarum, forma seminum, motus seminum atq; formarum. And thus much Auerrois is forced to confesse. For all forme (faith hee) are in primo motore; which is also the opinion of Aristotle in the twelfth of his Metaph, and of Albertus upon Diony fius.

 \S . XI. Of Fate , and that the Starres have great influence : and that their operations may diverfly $_{20}$ be prevented or furthered.

Nd, as of Nature, such is the dispute and contention concerning Fate or Destinie, of which the opinions of those learned men that have written thereof, may be fafely received, had they not thereunto annexed and faftened an inevitable necessity, and made it more generall, and universally powerfull than it is, by giving it Dominion over the minde of man, and over his will, of which ovid and fuveral:

An errour of the Chaldwans, and after them of the Stoicks, the Pharifees, Prifcillianists, the Bardisanists, and others, as Basil, Augustine, and Thomas have observed: but that Fate is an obedience of fecond causes to the first, was well conceived of Hermes, and Apuleius the Platonist. Plotinus out of the Astronomers calleth it a disposition from the acts of celeftiall Orbes, unchangeably working in inferiour bodies, the fame being also true enough, in respect of all those things which a rationall minde doth not order nor direct. Ptolomie, Seneca, Democritus, Epicurus, Chrysippus, Empedocles, and the Stoicks, some of them more largely, others more strictly, ascribe to Fate a binding and 40 inevitable necessity; and that it is the same which is spoken and determined by God (quod de unoquoq: nostrum fatus est Deus) and the definite lot of all living. And certainly it cannot be doubted, but the Stars are instruments of far greater use, than to give an obscure light, and for men to gaze on after Sun-set: it being manifest, that the diversity of feafons, the Winters, and Summers, more hote and cold, are not fo uncertained by the Sunne and Moone alone, who alway keepe one and the fame courfe, but that the Starres have also their working therein.

And if we cannot deny, but that God hath given vertues to Springs and Fountaines, to cold earth, to plants and stones, Mineralls, and to the excrementall parts of the bafest living creatures, why should we robbe the beautifull Starres of their working powers: for feeing they are many in number, and of eminent beauty and magnitude, wee may northinke, that in the treasurie of his wisedome, who is infinite, there can bee wanting (even for every Starre) a peculiar vertue and operation; as every herbe, plant, fruit, and flower adorning the face of the Earth, hath the like. For as these were not created to beautifie the earth alone, and to cover and shadow her dustie face, but otherwise for the use of man and beast, to feede them and cure them; so were not those uncountable glorious bodies fet in the Firmament, to no other end, than to adorne it, but for instruments and Organs of his divine providence, so farre as it hath pleased his just will to determine. Origen upon this place of Genesis, Let there be light in the Firmament, dre of Genaus. formeth, that the Starres are not causes (meaning perchance binding causes) but are as open Bookes, wherein are contained and fer down all things whatfoever to come; but not to be read by the eyes of humane wisedome: which latter part I believe well, and this saving of Swacides withall: That there are hid yet greater things than the febe, and we have feene but Ecological a few of his workes. And though, for the capacity of men, we know somewhat, yet in the true and uttermost vertues of herbes and plants, which our selves sow and set, and which grow under our feet, we are in effect ignorant; much more in the powers and wors king of celestiall bodies. For hardly (faith SALOMON) can wee discerne the things that will also are upon the Earth, and with great labour finde we out those things that are before us; who can then investigate the things that are in Heaven? Multum est de rebus collestibus a. Aislantes liquid cognoscere: It is much to know a little of heavenly things. But in this question of Fate, the middle course is to be followed, that as with the Heathen wee doe not binde God to his creatures, in this supposed necessity of destiny; so on the contrary, we doe nor robbe those beautifull creatures of their powers and offices. For had any of these second causes despoyled God of his prerogative, or had God himselfe constrained the minde and will of man to impious acts by any celestiall inforcements, then fure the imvious excuse of some were justifiable; of whom S. Augustine: Impia peruersitate in Aug. 20. Sugar malis factis rectifsime reprehendends ingerunt accusandum potius auctorem syderum, quam Genadius, ocommissorem scelerum. Where we reprehend them of evill deeds, they againe with wicked perversenesse that rather the Author and Creator of the Starres, than the doer of the evill, is to be accused.

But that the Starres and other celeftiall bodies incline the will by mediation of the fensitive appetite, which is also stirred by the constitution and complexion, it cannot be doubted. Corpora coleftia (faith DAMASCENE) conflituunt in nobis habitus, complexi- Gallungan ones. & dispositiones. The heavenly bodies (faith he) make in us habits, complexions, and dif seguence. politions: for the body (though Galen inforce it further) hath undoubtedly a kinde of drawing after it the affections of the minde, especially bodies strong in humour, and weake in vertues: for those of cholericke complexion are subject to anger, and the furious effects thereof; by which they fuffer themselves to bee transported, where the minde hath not reason to remember, that passions ought to be her Vassals not her Mafters. And that they wholly direct the reasonlesse minde, I am resolved: For all those which were created mortall, as birds, beafts, and the like, are left to their naturall appetites; over all which, celeftiall bodies (as inftruments and executioners of Gods providence) have absolute dominion. What we should judge of men, who little differ from beafts. I cannot tell: for as he that contendeth against those inforcements, may easily mafter or refift them; fo who foever shall neglect the remedies by vertue and piety prepared putteth himselfe altogether under the power of his sensual appetite. Vincitur 200018 fatum firefiftas, vincit ficontempferis : Fate will be overcome, if thou refift it if thou nerlectic conquereth.

But that either the Starres or the Sunne have any power over the mindes of men immediately, it is abfurd to thinke, other than as aforefaid, as the fame by the bodies temper may be effected. Lumen folis ad generationem sensibilium corporum confert, & ad witam Angai Civile ipsammovet & nutrit & auget, & perficit : The light of the Sunne (faith S. Augustine) helpeth the generation of sensible bodies, moveth them to life, and nourisheth, augmenteth and perfecteth them: yet still as a Minister, not as a Master: Bonus quidemest Solin mini- Hex. 11.0.4 16.5. sterio, non imperio : The Sunne is good to serve, not to sway (faith S. Ambrose.) And Saint worms Augustine: Deus regit inferiora corpora per superiora; God ruleth the bodies below by those above: but hee avoucheth not, that superiour bodies have rule over mens mindes. which are incorporeall.

But how foever we are by the Starres inclined at our birth, yet there are many things both in Nature and Art, that encounter the same, and weaken their operation; and Aristotle himselse confesseth, that the Heavens do not alwaies worke their essects in inferiour bodies no more than the figures of raine and winde doe alwayes come to passe. And it is divers times seene, that paternall vertue and vice hath his counter-working to these inclinations. Eft in Juvencis patrum virtus; In the yongueoff-foring the Fathers vertue is, and so the con- 30. trary patrum vitia: and herein also there is often found an enterchange; the Sonnes of vertuous men, by an ill constellation become inclinable to vice; and of vicious men, to vertie. Egregia est soboles scelerato nata parente:

A worthy sonne is borne of a wicked father.

But there is nothing (after Gods referved power) that fo much fetteth this art of influence out of square and rule, as education doth: for there are none in the World so wickedly inclined, but that a religious instruction and bringing up may fashion anew and reforme them; nor any fo well disposed, whom (the reines being let loose) the continuall fellowship and familiarity, and the examples of dissolute men may not corrupt and deforme. Veffels will ever retaine a favour of their first liquor : it being equally difficult eyther to clenfe the minde once corrupted, or to extinguish the fweet favour 16 of vertue first received, when the minde was yet tender, open, and easily seasoned; but where a favourable confectation (allowing that the Starres incline the will) and a vertuous education doe happily arrive, or the contrary in both, thereby it is that men are found to exceeding vertuous or vicious, Heaven and Earth (as it were) running together, and agreeing in one: for as the feedes of vertue may by the art and husbandry of Christian counsaile produce better and more beautifull fruit, than the strength of selfe-nar ture and kind could have yeelded them; fo the plants apt to grow wilde, and to change themselves into weedes, by being set in a soyle sutable, and like themselves, are made more unfavoury and filled with poylon. It was therefore truly affirmed, Sapiens adjuvabit opus astrorum, quemadmodum agricola terra naturam; A wise man assisteth the worke 20 of the Starres, as the Husbandman helpeth the nature of the foyle. And Ptolemie himselse confesseth thus much, Sapiens, & omina sapientis medici dominabuntur astris; A wise man, and the ominous art of a wise Physician shall prevaile against the Starres. Lastly, we ought all to know, that God created the Starres, as he did the rest of the Universall, whose influences may be called his reserved and unwritten Lawes. But let us consider how they bind: even as the Lawes of men doe; for although the Kings and Princes of the World have by their Lawes decreed, that a Thiefe and a Murderer shall suffer death; and though their Ordinances are daily by Judges and Magistrates (the Starres of Kings) executed accordingly; yet these Lawes doe not deprive Kings of their naturall or religious compassion, or binde them without prerogative, to such a severes execution, as that there should be nothing left of liberty to judgment, power, or conscience : the Law in his owne nature, being no other than a deafe Tyrant. But feeing that it is otherwise, and that Princes (who ought to imitate God in all they can) doe sometimes for causes to themselves knowne, and by mediation, pardon offences both against others and themselves, it were then impious to rike that power and liberty from God himselfe, which his Substitutes enjoy; God bei. gmercy, goodnesse, and charity it selfe. Otherwise that example of Prayer by our Saviour taught; And let us not be led into temptation, but deliver us from evil, had be ne no other but an expence of words and time; but that God (which onely knoweth eoperation of his owne creatures truely) hath affured us, that there is no inclination or temptation fo forcible, which 4 our humble Prayers and Defires may not make frustrate and breake asunder : for were it (as the Stoicks conceive) that Fate or Destiny, though depending upon eternall power, yet being once ordered and disposed, had such a connexion and immutable dependency, that God himselfe should in a kinde have shut up himselfe therein: How miserable them were the condition of men (faith S. Augustine) left altogether without hope!

And if this strength of the Starres were so transferred, as that God had quitted unto them all dominion over his creatures; be he Pagan or Christian that so believeth, the onely true God of the one, and the imaginary gods of the other, would thereby be defpoyled of all worship, reverence, or respect.

And certainly, God which hath promised us the reward of well-doing, which Christ is himselfe claimed at the hands of the Father, (I have finished the worke which then gavestime to doe:) and the same God, who hath threatned unto us the forrow and torment of offences, could not, contrary to his mercifull nature, be so unjust, as to bind us inevitably to the Destinies or influences of the Starres, or subject our soules to any imposed necessity. But it was well said of Plotinus, that the Starres were significant, but not efficient, giving them yet something lesse than their due: and therefore as I doe not consent with them, who would make those glorious creatures of God vertuelesse: so I thinke that wee derogate from his eternall and absolute power and providence, to ascribe to them the fame dominion over our immortall foules, which they have over all bodily sub-stances, and perishable natures: for the soules of men, loving and fearing God, receive influence from that divine light it selfe, whereof the Sunnes clarity, and that of the Starres, is by Plato called but a shadow. Lumen est umbra Dei, Deus est lumen luminis; Light is the Plat pole. Indow of Gods brightnesse, who is the light of light: But to end this question, because this Finish Indow, together with Providence, Prescience, and Predestination are often consounded, I thinke it not impertinent to touch the difference in a word or two; for every man hath not observed it, though all learned men have.

Rescience, or fore-knowledge (which the Greekes call Prognosis, the Latines pracognitio, or prascientia) considered in order and nature (if we may speake of God after the manner of men) goeth before Providence : for God fore-knew all things. before he had created them, or before they had being to be cared for; and Prescience is no other than an infallible fore-knowledge. For whatfoever our felves fore-know except the same be to succeed accordingly, it cannot be true that we fore-know it. But this Prescience of God (as it is Prescience onely) is not the cause of any thing sururely 20 succeeding : neither doth Gods fore-knowledge impose any necessity, or binde. For in that we fore-know that the Sunne will rife, and set; that all men borne in the World shall dye againe; that after Winter, the Spring shall come; after the Spring Summer and Harvest; and that according to the severall seeds that we sow, we shall reap severall forts of graine; yet is not our fore-knowledge the cause of this, or any of these: neither doth the knowledge in us bind or constraine the Sume to rise and set, or mento dve for the causes (as men perswade themselves) are otherwise manifest and knowne to all. The eye of man (faith Boetius) beholdeth those things subject to sense, as they are the ere feeth that fuch a beaft is an horse, it feethmen, trees, and houses, oc but our seeing of them (a they are) is not the cause of their so being, for such they be in their owne natures. And a- Boetius decombia gaine out of the same Author; Divina providentia rebus generandis non imponit necessitatem, quia si omniaevenirent ex necessitate, pramiabonorum, & pæna malorum periret : Diwine Providence (faith he) imposeth no necessity upon things that are to exist for if all came to passe of necessity, there should neither be reward of good, nor punishment of evill.

ow Providence (which the Greekes call Froncia) is an intellectuall knowledge, both fore-feeing, caring for, and ordering all things, and doth not onely behold all paft, all prefent, and all to come, but is the cause of their so being, which Prefeince (simply taken) is not: and therefore Providence by the Philosophers (saith Sangustine) is divided into Memory, Knowledge, and Care: Memory of the past, Knowledge of the present, and Care of the future: and wee our selves account such a man for provident; as, remembring things past, and observing things present, can by judgement, and comparing the one with the other, provide for the suture, and times succeeding. That such a thing there is as Providence, the Scriptures every-where teach us; Moses in many places, the Prophets in their Predictions, Christ himselse and his Apostles assured; and besides the Scriptures, Hermes, Orpheus, Euripides, Pythagoras, Plato, Plotinus, and (ineffect) all learned men acknowledge the Providence of God: 50 yea the Turkes themselves are so consident therein, as they resuse not to accompany and visit each other, in the most pestilent diseases, nor shun any perill whatsoever though death thereindo manifestly present it selse.

The places of Scripture proving Providence, are so many, both in generall and particular, as I shall neede to repeate but a few of them in this place. Sing unto God (laith David) which covereth the Heavens with cloudes, and prepareth raine for the earth, and materialist keth the grasset or upon the Mountaines, which give theo beats their food, and feedeth the yongue Raven that cries: All these wait upon the, that thou mayest give them sood in due least of the River Cheareth (saith Godto Eliah) and I have Plaliod. The Court of the River Cheareth (saith Godto Eliah) and I have the saith of the River Cheareth (saith Godto Eliah) and I have the saith of the River Cheareth (saith Godto Eliah) and I have the saith of the River Cheareth (saith Godto Eliah) and I have the saith of the River Cheareth (saith Godto Eliah) and I have the saith of the River Cheareth (saith Godto Eliah).

commanded the Ravens to feed thee there. Behold, the Fowles of the Ayre, they sow not nor reape, and yet your heavenly Father feedeth them : Againe, Are not two Sparrowes fold for a farthing: and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father: yea all the hayres of your head arenumbred : And S. Peter, Cast all your care on him, for hee careth for you. And his judgements are written, faith DAV I D.

God therefore, who is every-where present, who filleth the Heavens and the Earth, whose eyes are upon the Righteous and his countenance against them that doe evill, was therefore by orpheus called oculus infinitus, an infinite eye, beholding all things; & cannot therefore be esteemed as an idle looker on, as if he had transferred his power to any other: for it is contrary to his owne Word: Gloriam meam alteri non dabo. I will not give my glory to 10 another. No man commandeth in the Kings presence, but by the Kings direction; but God is every-where prefent, and King of kings. The example of Gods univerfall Providence is feene in his creatures. The Father provideth for his children: beafts and birds and all livings for their young ones. If Providence be found in fecond Fathers, much more in the first and Universall: and if there be a natural loving care in men, and beasts. much more in God, who hath formed this nature, and whose Divine love was the beginning, and is the bond of the Univerfall: Amor divinus rerum omnium est principium, & vinculum universi (faith Plato.) Amor Deiest nodus perpetuus, mundi copula, partiumq; ejus im. mobile sustent aculum, ac universa machina fundamentum; The love of God is the perpetual knot, and linke or chaine of the world, and the immoveable pillar of every part there-20 of, and the Basis and foundation of the universall. God therefore who could onely be the cause of all, can onely provide for all, and sustaine all; so as to absolute power; to everywhere presence; to perfect goodnesse; to pure and divine love; this attribute transcendent hability of Providence is onely proper and belonging.

§.XIV. Of Predestination.

TOw for Predefination, we can difference it no otherwise, from Providence and Prescience, than in this, that Prescience onely fore-seeth; Providence fore-seeth30 and careth for, and hath respect to all creatures, even from the brightest Angels of Heaven, to the unworthieft Wormes of the Earth: and Predeffination (asicis used specially by Divines) is onely of men, and yetnot of all to men belonging, but of their falvation properly, in the common use of Divines, or perdition, as some have used it. Yet Peter Lombard, Thomas, Bernensis Theologue, and others, take the word Predestination more strictly, and for a preparation to felicity: divers of the Fathers take it more largely fometimes: among whom Saint Augustine speaking of two Cities, & two Societies, useth these words, Quarum est una, qua pradestinata est in aternum regnare cum Deo, altera aternum supplicium subire cum Diabolo ; Whereof one is it, which is predestinated to reigne for ever with God, but the other is to undergoe everlasting torment with 40 the Devill: for according to Nonius Marcellus, destinare est preparare; and of the fame opinion are many Protestant writers, as Calvin, Beza, Buchanus, Danaus, and such like: and as for the manifold questions hereof arising, I leave them to the Divines; and why it hath pleafed God to create fome veffels of honour, and fome of dishonour, I will answer with Gregory, who faith, Qui in factis Deirationem non videt, infirmitatem suam considerans, cur non videat, rationem videt . He that seeth no reason in the actions of God by consideration of his owne insirmity perceiveth the reason of his blindnesse. And againe with S. Augustine, Occultaeffe causa porest, injusta effe non potest ; Hidden the cause of his Prede-Aination may be, unjust it cannot be.

S. XV.

Of Fortune: and of the reason of somethings that seeme to be by fortune, and against Rea-Son and Providence.

Aftly, seeing Destiny or Necessity is subsequent to Gods Providence, and seeing that the Starres have no other dominion, than is before spoken, and that Nature is nothing, but as Plato calleth it, Dei artem, wel artificiosum Dei Organum; The art, or artificiall Organ of God: and Cus Anus, Divini pracepti instrumentum; The art, or artificiall organ of God: and Cus ANUS, Divini pracepti instrumentum. The instrument of the divine precept : we may then with better reason reject that kinde of Idolarry, or God of fooles, called Fortune or Chance: a Goddeffe, the most reverenced, and the most reviled of all other, but not ancient; for Homer maketh her the Daughter of Oceanus as Paufanias witnesseth in his Messeniacks. The Greekes call her wyw, fignifying a relative being, or betiding, so as before Homers time this great Lady was scarce heard of and Hesiodus, who hath taught the birth and beginning of all these counterfeit gods. hath not a word of Fortune: yet afterward she grew so great and omniptent, as from senepoli. Kings and Kingdomes, to Beggars and Cottages, the ordered all things, refifting the Autoritide wisedome of the wisest, by making the Possessor thereof miserable valuing the folly of tertinace Serithe most foolish by making their successe prosperous; insomuch as the actions of men in Polioretes were faid to be but the sports of Fortune, and the variable accidents happening in mens in the great and were faid to be but the sports of Fortune, and the variable accidents happening in mens in the great and were faid to be but the sports of Fortune, and the variable accidents happening in mens in the great and lives, but her pastimes: of which PALLADIUS, Vita hominum ludus fortuna est; The offis Fortune, life of man is the play of Fortune: and because it often falleth out, that enterprises guided is said to have by ill counfels, have equall fuccesse to those by the best judgement conducted, therefore upon Fortune. had Fortune the fame externall figure with Sapience; whereof Athenaus:

From Wisedome Fortune differs farre. And yet in workes most like they are.

But I will forbeare to be curious in that, which (as it is commonly understood) is nothing else but a power imaginary, to which the successe of humane actions and endevours were for their variety ascribed; for when a manifest cause could not be given. then was it attributed to fortune, as if there were no cause of those things, of which most men are ignorant; contrary to this true ground of PLATO: Nihil est ortum sub Sole, cuius causa legitima non pracesserit; Nothing ever came to passe under the Sunne, of which there was not a just preceding cause. But Aquinas hath herein answered in one distinction. what foever may be objected; for many things there are (faith he) which happen, to besides the intention of the Inferior but not besides the intention of the Superior : Prater intentionem Inferioris, sed non prater intentionem Superioris, (to wit, the ordinance of God :) and therefore (faith MELANCHTON) Quod Poeta fortunam, nos Deum appellamus; Tefacimus Fort whom the Poets call Fortune, we know to be God. And that this is true, the Scripture in time Dean, can many places teacheth us; as in the Law of Murder, He that smitteth a man, and he dye, shall log locamus. dyethe death and if a man hath not laid waite, but God hath offered him into his hands, then Expd. 112.1 I will appoint thee a place whither hee shall flee. Now, where the Scripture hath these words. God hath offered him into his hands, we fay, If he hurt him by Chance: and in verse. Deuteronomy the nineteenth, where the flipping of an Axe from the helve, whereby another is flaine, was the worke of God himselfe, we in our phrase attribute this accio dentto Chance or Fortune: and in the Proverbes the fixteenth, The lot is cast into the vertage lap, but the whole disposition thereof is of the Lord: so as that which seemeth most casuall and fubiect to Fortune, is yet disposed by the ordinance of God, as all things else; and hereof the wifer fort, and the best learned of the Philosophers were not ignorant, as Cieero witnesseth for them, gathering the opinion of Aristotle and his Sectators, with those of Plato, and the Academicks, to this effect, That the same power which they called animam mundi; The soule of the World, was no other than that incomprehensible wisedome, which we expresse by the name of God, governing every being aswell in heaven as in earth; to which wisedome and power they sometime gave the title of Ne- cicac qualities. ceffity or Fate, because it bindeth by inevitable ordinance: sometime, the style of Forto tune, because of many effects there appeare unto us no certaine causes. To this effect speaketh S. Augustine in his questions upon Genesis the first Booke: the same hath Seneca in his fourth of Benefits : which was also the doctrine of the Stoicks, of which Sect he was : senect forte For what (oever (faith hee) thou callest God, be it Nature, Fate, or Fortune, all are but one & the same differenced by diverstermes, according as he useth, & exerciseth his power diversly.

But it may be objected, That if Fortune and Chance were not formetimes the caufes of good and evill in men, but an idle voice, wherby we expresse successe; how comes it then, that so many worthy and wise men depended upon so many unworthy and empty-headed fooles; that riches and honour are given to externall men, and without kernell: and formary learned, vertuous, and valiant men weare out their lives in poore and dejected estates. In a word, there is no other inferior, or apparent cause, beside the partiality of mans affection, but the fashioning and not fashioning of our selves according to the nature of the time wherein we live: for who foever is most able, and best sufficient to discerne, and hath with all an honest and open heart and loving truth; if Princes, or those that governe, endure no other discourse than their owne flatteries, then I say such an one, whose vertue and courage forbiddeth him to be base and a dissembler, shall evermore hang under the wheele; which kinde of deferving well and receiving ill, we alwayes falfly charge Fortune withall. For whosoever shall tell any great Man or Magi-Hrate, that he is not just; the Generall of an Army, that he is not valiant, and great La- 10 dies that they are not faire; shall never be made a Counseller, a Captaine, or a Courtier. Neither is it sufficient to be wife with a wife Prince, valiant with a valiant, and just with him that is just, for such a one hath no estate in his prosperity; but he must also change with the fucceffor, if he be of contrary qualities; faile with the tyde of the time, and alter forme and condition, as the Estate or the Estates Master changeth: Otherwise how were it possible, that the most base men, and separate from all imitable qualities, could fo often attaine to honour and riches, but by fuch an observant slavish course? These men having nothing else to value themselves by, but a counterfeit kinde of wondring at other men, and by making them believe that all their vices are vertues, and all their dusty actions crystalline, have yet in all ages prospered equally with the most vertuous, 20 if not exceeded them. For according to MENANDER, Omnis insipiens arrogantia plausibus capitur; Every foole is wonne with his owne pride, and others flattering applause: fo as who foever will live altogether out of himfelfe, and fludy other mens humours, and observe them, shall never be unfortunate; and on the contrary, that man which prizeth truth and vertue (except the season whereinhe liveth be of all these, and of all forts of goodnesse fruitfull) shall never prosper by the possession or profession thereof. It is also a token of a worldly wise man, not to warre or contend in vaine against the nature of times wherein he liveth: for fuch a one is often the author of his owne mifery; but best it were to follow the advice, which the Pope gave the Bishops of that age, out of ovid, while the Arian Herefie raged:

Ovid:rem.am

Whilefury gallops on the way, Let no man furies gallop stay.

And if Cicero (than whom that world begat not a man of more reputed judgement) had followed the counsell of his brother Quintus Posuisset (faith Petranch) in lectulo suo mori potuisset integro candavere sepeliri; He might then have dyed the death of nature, and beene with an untorne and undissevered body buried; for as Petrarch in the same place noteth: Quid stultius quam desperantem (prasertim de effectu) litibus perpetuis implicaris? What more foolish than for him that despaires (especially of the effect) to be in-40 tangled with endlesse contentions? Whosover therefore will set before him MACH I-AVELS two markes to shoote at (to wit) Riches, and Glory, must set on and take off a backe of yron to a weake woodden Bow, that it may fit both the strong and the feeble: for as he that first devised to adde sayles to rowing vessels, did either so proportion them, as being fastened alost, and towards the head of his Mast, he might abide all windes and stormes, or else he sometime or other perished by his owne invention: so that man which prizeth vertue for it selfe, and cannot endure to hoise and strike his sailes, as the divers natures of calmes and stormes require, must cut his failes and his cloth of meane length and breadth, and content himselfe with a flow and lure navigation, (to wit)a meane and free estate. But of this dispute of Fortune, and the rest, or of whatsoever 50 Lords or Gods, imaginary powers, or causes, the wit (or rather foolishnesse) of man hath found out: let us refolve with S. Paul, who hath taught us, that there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him; there are diversities of operations, but God is the same which workethall in all.

Of this Image and Similitude of God, there is much dispute among the Fathers. Schoole-men, and late Writers: Some of the Fathers conceive, that man was made after the Image of God, in respect chiefly of Empire and Dominion, as S. Chrylostome 30 Ambrole, and some others: which S. Ambrose denieth to the woman in these words, At ficut Deus unus ab eo fieret homo unus, & quomodo ex Deo uno omnia, ita ex uno homine omne genus effet super faciemtotius terra: Unus igitur, unum fecit, qui unitatis ejus haberet imaginem : That as God is one, one man might be made by him, and that in what manner all things are of one God, likewise of one man the whole kinde should be upon the face of the whole earth: Therefore hee being one, made one, that should have the Image of his unity. But whereas it is gathered out of the following words of the fame Verlethat man was after the Image of God in respect of rule and power, it is written Dominamini in the plurall number, and let them rule over the fish in the Sea, &c. and therefore cannot the womanbe excluded. Others conceive, that man is faid to be after the Image of God in reto spect of his immortall foule onely, because as God is invisible, so the soule of man is invisible; as God is immortall and incorporall, so is the soule of man immortall and incorporall; and as there is but one God which governeth the world; so but one soule which governeth the body of man; and as God is wholly in every part of the world, so is the foule of man wholly in every part of the body: Animaest tota in toto, & tota in qualibet parte; The foule is wholly in the whole body, and wholly in every part thereof; according to Aristotle: though Chalcidius, and other learned men deny that doctrine; which that it is otherwise than potentially true, all the Aristotelians in the world shall never prove. These and the like arguments doethe Jewes (make faith Tostatus) and these resemblances, betweene the infinite God, and the finite Man.

The Schoole-men resemble the Minde or Soule of Manto God, in this respect especially; because that as in the Minde there are three distinct powers, or faculties (to wit) Memory, Understanding, and Will; and yet all these, being of reall differences, are but one minde : fo in God there are three distinct persons, the Father, Sonne, the holy Ghoft, and yet but one God. They also make the Image and Similatude divers; and againe, they diffinguish betweene Imaginem Dei; and ad Imaginem Dei, and spinne into small threds, with subtile distinctions, many times the plainenesse and sincerity of the Scriptures : their wits being like that strong water, that eateth thorow and dissolveth the purest gold. Victorians also maketh the Image of God to bee substantiall, but not CHAP.2. C.2.

the fimilitude: fed in substantia nomen qualitatis declarativum; A word declaring quality in the substante. Out of which words, and that which followeth, it is inferred, that as the image and similitude doe greatly differ: so the sinfull soule doth not therefore leave to be the image of God; but it hath not his similitude, except it be holy and righteous. S. Augustine also against Adimantus the Manichee affirmeth, that by sinne, the perfection of this image is lost in man; and in his Retractations maintaineth the same opinion, and also affirmeth that the Similitude is more largely taken, than the Image.

But how soever the Schoolemen and others distinguish, or what soever the Fathers conceive, fure I am that S. Paul maketh the fame fense of the image, which Victorinus doth of the similitude, who saith: As wee have borne the image of the earthly, so shall we to beare the image of the heavenly; and it cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, that the words Image and Similitude were used but in one sense, and in this place the better to expresse each other; whatsoever Lombard hath said to the contrary. For God knowes, what a multitude of meanings the wit of man imagineth to himselfe in the Scriptures, which neither Moses, the Prophets, or Apostles, ever conceived. Now as S. Paul useth the word (Image) for both: fo Saint James useth the word (Similitude) for both in these words: Therewith bleffe we God ewen the Father, and therewith curse wee Men, which are made after the similitude of God. How soever therefore S. Augustine seemeth, out of a kind of elegancy in writing, to make fome difference : as where he writteth, Confitemur imaginem in aternitate, similitudinem in moribus inveniri , We confesse that this image is found in 20 eternity, but his similitude in manners, that is, in the spirituall dispositions and qualities of the minde; yet thus he elsewhere speaketh plainly: Quasi vero possit esse image aliqua, in qua similitudo non sit: si enim omnino similis non est, procul dubio nec imago est; As if (faith he) there could be any image, where the similitude is not : no, out of doubt, where there is no likenesse, there is no image. The very words of the Text make this most manifest, as, Let us make man in our image, according to our likenesse : which is, Let us make man in our image, that he may be like us: and in the next Verse following, God himselse makethit plaine; for there he useth the word (Image) onely, as thus: God ereated the man in his image, in the image of God created he him. And to take away all dispute or ambiguity, in the first Verse of the fift Chapter, the word (Similitude) is used againe? by it selfe, as, In the day that God created ADAM, in the likenesse of God made he him. And this similitude S. Paul Colos the third, calleth the Image. Put on (faith he) the new man which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him. And in Syracides it, is written. He made them according to his image. Now if we may believe Saint Paul before Peter Lombard and other Schoolemen, then it is as manifest as words can make it, that the image and similitude is but the same; for S. Paul useth both the words directly in one sense. For they turned the glory of the incorruptible God, to the similitude of the image of a corruptible man.

Zanchius laboureth to prove, that man was formed after the image of God, both in body and minde: Nulla pars in homine qua non fuerit hujusce imaginis particeps; No 40 part in a man (faith he) which was not participating Gods image: for God said, Let us make man according to our owne image. But the foule alone is not man, but the Hypostalis or whole man compounded of body and foule. The body of man (faith he) is the image of the world, and called therefore Microcosmus; but the Idea and exemplar of the world was first in God, so that man, according to his body, must needes be the image of God. Against which opinion of this learned man, his owne objection seemeth to me sufficient, where he alleageth that it may be faid, that Moses spake by the figure Synecdocke, as when a man is called a mortall man, yet is not the whole man mortall, but the body onely: fo when God faid, Let us make man after our image, he meant the foule of man, and not the body of earth and dust: Maledictus qui Deitatem ad hominis lineamenta refert 50 (faith Saint Augus TINE:) Curfed is he that referreth the Deity of God to the lineaments of mans body : Deus enim non est humana forma particeps, neg; corpus humanum divina faith PHILO:)God is not partaker of humane forme, nor humane body of the forme divine The Hebrew word for image, is Telem, which fignifieth a shadow or obscure resemblances In imagine pertransit homo. Man passeth away in a shadow : Let us then know and consider, that God, who is eternall and infinite, hath not any bodily shape or composition; for it is both against his Nature and his Word; an error of the Anthropomorphita, against the very effence and Majesty of God. Surely

Surely Cicero, who was but a Heathen, had yet a more divine understanding than these orosse Heretikes: Ad similitudinem Dei proprins accedebat humana virtus, qu'am sieura. The vertue which is in man (faith he) came neerer the similitude of God, than the figure. For God is a spiritual substance, invisible, and most simple; God is a just God: God is Mercifull; Godis Charity it felfe, and (in a word) Goodnesse it selfe; and none elfe fimply good. And thus much it hath pleafed God himfelfe to teach us, and to make us know of himselfe. What then can be the shadow of such a substance, the image of fuch a nature, or wherein can man be faid to refemble his unexcogitable power and perfectuesse: certainely, not in Dominion alone: for the Devill is faid to be the Prince of Ephone. this World, and the Kingdome of Christ was not thereof, who was the true and perfect Job. 18.36 image of his Father; neither because man hath an immortall soule, and therein the faculties of Memory, Understanding, and Will; for the Devils are also immortall, and participate those faculties, being called Damones, because scientes of Knowledge, and Platin Cravilli Subrilty; neither because we are reasonable creatures, by which we are distinguished from beafts : for who have rebelled against God ! who have made gods of the vilest beafts, of Serpents, of Cats, of Owles, yeaseven of shamefull parts, of lusts and pleafures, but reasonable men : yet doe I not condemne the opinion of Saint Chrysostome and Osvans de Just Ambrole, as touching dominion, but that, in respect thereof, man was in some fort after the image of God, if we take Dominion, such as it ought to be, that is, accompanied owith Justice and Piety: for God did not onely make man a Ruler and Governour over the Fishes of the Sea, the Fowles of Heaven (or of the aire) and over the Beasts of the Field; But God gave unto mana dominion over men, he appointed Kings to governe them, and Judges to judge them in equity. Neither doe I exclude Reason, as it is the ability of Understanding. For I doe not conceive, that Ireneus did therefore call man, the image of God, because he was animal rationale only; but that he understood it better with Sybilla: Imago mea est homo, rectam rationem habens: Man that is endued with right reason is said to resemble God, (that is) by right reason to know and confesse God his Creatour, and the same God to serve, love, and obey : and therefore said S. Angustine (who herein came neerer the Truth) Fecit Deus hominem ad imaginem & similitudinem suam in nomente: God made man, in respect of the intellect, after his owne Image and similitude: and REYNERYUS; Homo, quod habet mentem, factus est ad imaginem Dei; Man was made after Reyndement the Image of God in minde, or in that he had a minde.

Dut Mens is not taken here for anima phylica, according to Aristotle, which is forma, vel natura hominis: The forme or nature of man; but this faculty or gift of God, called Mens, is taken for prima vis animi, the principall sirength of the minde. or soule, cujus actus est perpetua veritatis contemplatio, whose act, exercise, or office is the perpetuall contemplation of truth; and therefore it is also called intellectus divinus, intellectus contemplatious, & anima contemplativa. A divine under standing, and an intellect or minde pumanda. contemplative. Est autem mens nostra (faith Cus a nus) vis comprehendendi, & totum possenel virtuale ex omnibus comprehendendi virtutibus compositum: Our intellectuall minde Idipalizi (faithhe) is a power of comprehending, even the whole, that is in this kinde powerfull, compounded of all the powers of comprehension: unto which Mercurius attributeth so much (if his meaning accompany his words) that he esteemethat to be the very effence of God (which was also the errour of the Manichees, and others) and no otherwise separate from God (faith he) than the light from the Sunne: for this Mens or understanding (faith MER CURIUS) est Deus in hominibus : Is God in men, or rather (and smeps side) which I take to be his meaning) is the image of God in man. For as the Sunne is not of 31 fi the same effence or nature with the divine light, but a body illightned, and an illumination created; so is this Mens or understanding in men, nor of the essence of Gods infinite understanding but a power and faculty of our soules the purest; or the lumen animarationalis, by the true and eternall light illightned. And this Mens others call animam anime, The foule of the foule, or with S. Augustine, the eie of the foule, or receptacle of Sapience and divine knowledge-qua amorem (apiensia sanguam dissent sequisur. Which followers after the love of sapience as her guide (faith Philo) betweene which and reason, betweene which and the minde, called anima, betweene which and that power which the Latines call animus, there is this difference. Reason is that faculty by which we judge and discourse; Anima, by which we live. Hereofit is said, Anima corpus animat, idest, vivisicat; or the Soule is that which doth animate the body, that is, giveth it life . for death is the separation of body and foule; and the same strength (faith Philo) which God the great Director hath in the World, the same hath this Anima, or minde, or foule in man. Animus, is that, by which we will and make election; and to this Bafil agreeth, which called this Mens, or divine understanding, perspicacem anima partem, the perseiving part of the minde, or the light by which the Soule difcerneth: dormientium mens, non anima, sopitur, & in furiosis 10 mens extinguitur, animamanet: In menthat fleepe it is this (mens) or under standing, and not the mind or foule, which refeth, during which time it is but habituall in wife men, & inmad men this (Mens) is extinguished, and not the soule : for mad men doe live, though distract, Therefore this word being often used for the Soule giving life, is attributed abusively to mad men, when we say that they are of a distract minde, in stead of a broken understanding: which word (Mind) weuse also for opinion, as, I am of this minde, or that minde : and sometimes for mens conditions or vertues, as, He is of an honest minde, or, a man of a just minde: sometimes for affection, as, I doe this formy mindes sake; and Arifortle sometimes useth this word (Mens) for the phantasie, which is the strength of the imagination: formerimes for the knowledge of principles, which we have without dif- 20 course: oftentimes for Spirits, Angels and Intelligences: but as it is used in the proper fignification, including both the understanding agent and possible, it is described to bee a pure, simple, substantiallact, not depending upon matter, but having relation to that which is intelligible, as to his first object: or more at large thus; A part or particle of the Soule, whereby it doth understand, not depending upon matter, nor needing any organ, free from paffion comming from without, and apt to be differened, as, eternall from that which is mortall Hereof excellently MERCURIUS: Anima est imago mentis, mens imago Dei. Deus menti praest, mens anima anima corpori . The Soule (meaning that which giveth life) is the Image of this understanding, or Mens, and this (Mens) or understanding is the Image of God. God is President or Ruler over this under standing, this underflanding over the Soule, and this Soule over the body. This division and distinction out of the Platonikes and Peripatetikes, I leave to the Reader to judge of. That, Mens humans hathno need of any organ, Marsilius Ficinus in his ninth Booke of the Soules immortalitylaboureth to prove. Zanchius doth not differ from Ficinus in words: for (faith he) Adfacultatemintelligentemexercendam non eget Mens organo ; tanquam medio, per quodintelligat : quanquam eget objecto in quodintuatur, & ex quo intellectionem concipiat: boc autem objectium sunt phantasmata, seu rerum à sensibus perceptarum simulachra ad phantasiam prolata: To exercise the faculty of understanding the minde of man (faith he)needeth no instrument, as a meane, by which it may understand: but it needeth an object, whereon to looke, and whence to conceive the act of understanding. This object are the phantasmes, 4 or the resemblances of things received from the sense, and carried to the phantasie. But in effect his conclusion seemeth to carry a contrary sense, when hee maketh the Phantasic, in representing the object to the understanding, to be a corporall Organum; neither can it be understood to be an organum of any thing, but of the understanding. And he addeth, that the refemblance of things in mans imagination, are to his understanding and minde, as colours are to the fight: whence it fo followeth, that the imagination or phantafie it felle is to the faculty of understanding, as the eye is to the faculty of seeing; and as this is an ore ganum, fo that Of this question, How the minde in all her actions makethuse of the body, and hath communion with the body, I referre the Reader to a most grave and learned Discourse in the last Reply of M.D. Bilson, late Bishop of Winchester, unto Henry Jacob. at bomeaniscom. Howfoever the Truth be determined, wee must conclude, that it is neither in respect of reason alone, by which we discourse, nor in respect of the minde it selfe by which wee envens agraficeret live, nor in respect of our soules simply, by which we are immortall, that we are made sum atg innite after the Image of God. But most safely may we resemble our selves to God in mente, and in respect of that pure faculty which is never separate from the contemplation and

being added to the nature, effence, and faculties, maketh it altogether to be after the Image of God, whose words are these: Non proptered imago Dei est, quia sui meminit Mens, seq intelligit & diligit (which also was the opinion of Saint Augustine) fed quia potelle meminissed on Mens was meminissed in the Minde (or Mens) was not therefore the Image of God, because it remembreth, understandeth, and loweth it selfe, but be cause it can remember under stand, and love God, who created it. And that this Image may be deformed and made unprofitable, heare BASIL: Homo ad imaginem & similatudinem Des factus est, peccatum verò imaginis hujus pulchritudinem deformavit, & inutilem reddidis. dum animam corruptis concupiscentia affectibus immersit: Man was made after the Image and similitude of GoD, but sinne hath deformed the beauty of this Image, and made it unprofitable by drawing our minds into corrupt concupifcence.

It is not therefore (as aforefaid) by reason of Immortalility, nor in Reason, nor in Dominion, nor in any one of these by it selfe, nor in all these joyned, by any of which or by all which we refemble, or may be called the fludow of God, though by reason and understanding, with the other faculties of the Soule, we are made capable of this print: but chiefly, in respect of the habit of Originall right cousnesse, most perfectly insufed by God into the Minde and Soule of man in his first Creation. For it is not by nature, nor by her liberality, that we were printed with the feale of Gods Image (though Reafon may be faid to be of her gift, which joyned to the foule is a part of the Effentiall Conflio tution of our proper Species) but from the bountifull grace of the Lord of all goodnesses, who breathed life into Earth, and contrived within the Trunke of Duft and Clay, the ini-mitable hability of his own Piety, and Righteousnesse.

So long therefore (for that refemblance which Dominion hath) doe those that are powerfull retaine the Image of God, as according to his Commandements they exercise the Office or Magistracy to which they are called, and sincerely walke in the wayes of Gons 222 God, which in the Scriptures is called, walking with God; and all other men fo long rerainethis Image, as they feare, love and ferve God truly, that is, for the love of God alone, and doe not bruife and deface his Seale by the weight of manifold and voluntarv offences, and obstinate sinnes. For the unjust minde cannot be after the Image of God. to feeing God is Justice it felfe; The bloud-thirsty hath it not; for God is Charity, and Mercy it selfe: Falshood, cunning practice, and ambition, are properties of Sathan; and therefore cannot dwell in one foule, together with Go D: and to be short, there is 2 con 6.14? nolikelihood betweene pure light and blacke darknesse, betweene beauty and deformity, orbetweene righteousnesse and reprobation. And though Nature, according to commonunderstanding, have made us capable by the power of reason, and apt enough to receive this Image of Gods goodnesse, which the sensual soules of beasts cannot perreive; yet were that aptitude naturallmore inclinable to follow and imbrace the falfe and durelesse pleasures of this Stage-play World, than to become the shadow of God by walking after him, had not the exceeding workmanship of Gods Wisedome, and the liberality of his Mercy, formed eyes to our foules, as to our bodies. which, piercing through the impurity of our flesh, behold the highest Heavens, and thence bring Knowledge and Object to the Minde and Soule, to contemplate the eyerduring Glory, and termeleffe Joy, prepared for those, which retaine the Image and similitude of their Creatour, preferving undefiled and unrent the garment of the new man, 2 cor 3 3 which, after the Image of Go pais created in Righteoufnesse, and Holinesse, as faith Saint Paul. Now, whereas it is thought by forme of the Fathers, as by S. Augustine, with whom s. Aminotis S. Ambrofe joyneth, that by finne, the perfection of the Image is lost, and not the Image it less 5 both opinions by this distinction may be well reconciled (to wir) that the Image of God, in man, may be taken two wayes; for either it is confidered, according to o naturall gifts, and confiseth therein: namely, to have a reasonable and understanding nature, &c. and in this fense, the Image of God is more lost by finne, than the very reaionable or understanding nature, &c. is lost, (or sinne doth not abolish and take away. these naturall gifts:) or, the Image of God is considered, according to supernatural! gifts, namely, of Divine Grace and heavenly Glory, which is indeed the perfection and accomplishment of the naturall Image; and this maner of similitude and Image of God wholly blotted out and destroyed by fin.

That man was formed of Earth and Dust did Abraham acknowledge, when in humble 16 scare hee called unto God, to save Sodome: Let not my Lord now be angry, if I speake, I that am but dust and ashes: And, In these Houses of Clay, whose foundation is in the dust, doe our soules inhabite, according to Job. And though our owne eyes doe every-where behold the fudden and refistlesse assaults of Death, and Nature assureth us by never-failing Experience, and Reason by infallible demonstration, that our times upon the Earth have neither certainty nor durability, that our Bodies are but the Anviles of paine and difeales, and our Mindes the Hives of unnumbred cares, forrowes and passions : and that (when we are most glorified) we are but those painted posts, against which Envie and Fortung direct their darts; yet such is the true unhappinesse of our condition, and the darke ignorance which covereth the eyes of our understanding, that we onely prize, pamper, and 24 exalt this Vassall and Slave of death, and forget altogether (or onely remember at our cast-away leisure) the imprisoned immortall Soule, which can neither dye with the Reprobate, nor perish with the mortall parts of vertuous men: seeing Gods justice in the one, and his goodnesse in the other is exercised for evermore, as the ever-living subjects of his reward and punishment. But when is it that we examine this great account ? Never while we have one vanity left us to spend: we plead for Titles, till our breath suile us; digge for Riches, whiles our strength enableth us; exercise malice, while we can revenge; and then when Time hath beaten from us both youth, pleasure, and health, and that Nature it felfe hateth the house of old age, we remember with Job, that we must goe the way For 10,21,617. from whence we shall not returne, and that our bed is made ready for us in the darke; And then it I fay looking over-late into the bottome of our conscience (which Pleasure and Ambition had locked up from us all our lives,) wee behold therein the fearefull Images of our actions past, and withall this terrible Inscription: That God will bring every workeinto

N this frame and carcaffe God breathed the breath of life; and the man was a living Soule: (that is) God gave a body of Earth and of corruptible matter, a Soule spi-I rituall and incorruptible; not that God had any fuch bodily instruments as menuse. but God breathed the Spirit of Life and Immortalitie into man, as hee breatheth his grace daily into fuch as love and feare him. The Spirit of God (faith Elihu in Iob) Job 33 49 hath made mee, and the breath of the Almighty hath given me Life: In qua (ententia (faith RABANUS) vitanda est paupertas sensus carnalis, ne forte putemus Deum, vel manibus corporeis de limo formasse corpus hominis, vel faucibus aut labies suis inspirasse in faciem formati, ut vivere possit & piraculum vita habere: Nam et Propheta cum ait, Manus tua fecerunt me, &c. Tropica hac locutione magis quam propria, (id est) juxta consuetudinem. qua solent homines operari, loquutus est: In which sentence (faith hee) the beggarlinesse of carnall sense is to bee avoided, lest perhaps wee should thinke, either that God with bodile hands made mans body of lime or breathed with jawes or lips upon bis face (being formed) that be might live, and have the Spirit of Life: for the Prophet allowhen he (aith. Thy hands bave made mee, (pake this Tropically, rather than properly (that is) according to the custom which menuse in working. Quantum est periculi his, qui Scripturas sensu corporeo legunt ? In what danger are they that reade the Scriptures in a carnall fense? By this breath was infused into man both life and foule; and therefore this (Soule) the Philosophers call Animam. que vivificat corpus & animat ; Which doth animate, and give life to the body. The infpiration of the Almighty giveth understanding, faith Joz and this spirit, which God breathed into man, which is the reasonable soule of man, returneth agains to God that gave it. as the body returneth unto the Earth, out of which it was taken; according to Ecclesia after: And dust shall returne to the Earth, out of which is was taken, and the spirit shall re- Ecological turn to God that gave it. Neither is this word (Spirit) usually otherwise taken in the Scriptures, than for the foule; as when Stephen cried unto God: Domine, suscipe spiritum 40,7,56, meum : Lord Tefus receive my (pirit: and in S. John, And Jefus bowed his bead and gave foling 300 up the Ghoft, or Spirit; (which was) that his life and foule left his body dead. And that the immortall foule of man differeth from the Soules of beafts, the manner of creation maketh it manifest : for it is written, Let the waters bring forth in abundance every cree. Gen. 126. ping thing, and let the Earth bring forth the living thing, according to his kinde, the beaft of the Earth, &c. But of man it is written, Let us make man in our owne Image, &c. and further, that the Lord breathed in his face the breath of life. Wherefore, as from the Wa- Genary ter and Earth were those creatures brought forth, and thence received life; so shall they againe be dissolved into the same first matter, whence they were taken: but the life of breath everlasting, which God breathed into man, shall according to Ecclesiastes, returne Ecclesiastes againe to God that gave it.

S. V. That manis (as it were) a little World: with a digression touching our mortality.

An, thus compounded and formed by God, was an abiltract or modell, or briefe Storie of the Universall: in whom God concluded the Creation, and worke of the World, and whom hee made the last and most excellent of his Creatures, being internally endued with a divine understanding, by which hee might contemplate and serve his Creatour, after whose image hee was formed, and endued with the powers and faculties of Reason and other abilities, that thereby also hee might governe and rule the World, and all other Gods creatures therein. And whereas God created three forts of living natures, (to wit) Angelicall, Rationall, and Brutall; giving to Angels an intellectuall, and to Beafts a sensuall nature; he vouchsafed unto Man, both the intellectuall of Angels, the fenfitive of Beafts, and the proper rationall belonging untoman: and therefore (faith GREGORY NAZIANZENE,) Homo est utrius, nature 622.175. vinculum, Man is the bond and chaine which tyeth together both natures: and because in Greg Mag. And although, in respect of God, there is no man just, or good, or righteous: for in Angelis deprebensaest stuttitia, Behold, beefound folly in his Angels (faith Job) yet with fuch a kind of difference, as there is betweene the fubstance and the shadow, there may be found a goodnesse in man which God being pleased to accept, hath therefore called man, the image and fimilitude of his owne righteoufnesse. In this also is the little World of man compared, and made more like the univerfall (man being the measure of all things ; Homo est mensura omnium rerum, faith Aristotle and Pythagoras) that the foure Complections refemble the foure Elements, and the feven Ages of man the feven Planets: Whereof our infancie is compared to the Moone, in which we feeme onely to live and grow, as Plants; the fecond Age to Mercurie, wherein we are taught and instructed; our third Age to Venus, the dayes of Love, Defire, and Vanitie; the fourth to the Sunne, the strong, flourishing, and beautifull age of mans life; the fifth to Mars, in which we feeke honour and victorie, and in which our thoughts travaile to ambitious a ends; the fixth Age is ascribed to Jupiter, in which we beginne to take accompt of our times, judge of our selves, and grow to the perfection of our understanding; the last and seventh to Saturne, wherin our dayes are fad and over-cast, and in which we find by deare and lamentable experience, & by the loffe which can never be repaired, that of all our vaine passions and affections past, the forrow only abideth: Our attendants are sickneffes, and variable infirmities, and by how much the more we are accompanied with plentie, by so much the more greedily is our end defired, whom when Time hath made unsociable to others, we become aburthen to our selves : being of no other use, than to hold the riches we have, from our Successors-Inthis time it is, when (as a forefaid) we, for the most part, and never before, prepare for our eternall habitation, which we passe on unto, with many fighes, grones and fad thoughts, and in the end, by the workmanthip of death, finish the sorrowfull businesse of a wretched life, towards which we alwaies travell both fleeping and waking: neither have those beloved companions of honor and riches any power at all to hold us any one day, by the glorious promise of entertainments; but by what crooked path foever we walk, the fame leadeth on directly to the house of death, whose doores lye open at all houres, and to all persons. For if there were any baiting place, or rest, in the course or race of mans life, then according to the doctrine of the Academicks, the fame might also perpetually bee mainrained; but as there is a continuance of motion in naturall living things, and as the fap and invoce, wherein the life of Plants is preferved, doth evermore afcend or descend: fo is it with the life of man, which is alwayes either increasing towards ripenesse and perfection, or declining and decreafing towards rottennesse and dissolution.

Hefe be the miferies which our first Parents brought on all Mankinde, unto whom God in his creation gave a free and unconstrained will, and on whom he bestowed the liberall choice of all things, with one onely prohibition, to try his gratitude and obedience. God fet before him, a mortall and immortall Life, a nature celestiall and terrene, and (indeed) God gave man to himselfe, to bee his owne Guide. his owne Workeman, and his owne Painter, that hee might frame or describe unto himselfe what hee pleased, and make election of his owne forme. God made Entire 11. maninthe beginning (faith SIRACIDES) and left himinthe hands of his owne counsell. Such was the liberalitie of God, and mans felicitie: whereas beafts, and all other creatures reasonlesse, brought with them into the World (faith Lucilius) and that even when they first fell from the bodies of their Dams, the nature, which they could not change : and the supernall Spirits or Angels were from the beginning, or soone after, of that condition, in which they remaine in perpetuall eternitie. But (as aforefaid) God gave unto man all kind of Seeds and Grafts of life (to wit) the vegetative life of Plants, the scnfinall of Beafts, the rationall of Man, and the intellectuall of Angels; whereof which foever he tooke pleasure to plant and cultive, the same should suturely grow in him, and bring forth fruit, agreeable to his owne choice and plantation. This freedome of the first man Adam, and our first Father, was anigmatically described by Asclepius Athemenlis (faith Mirandula) in the performand Fable of Proteus, who was faid, as often as he pleased, to change his shape. To the same end were all those celebrated Metamora phoses among the Pythagorians, and ancient Poets, whereinit was fained, that men were transformed into divers shapes of beasts, thereby to shew the change of mens conditions, from Reason to Brutalitie, from Vertue to Vice, from Mecknessero Crueltie, and from Justice to Oppression. For by the lively Image of other creatures did those Ancients represent the variable passions, and affections of mortall men; as by Serpents were fignified Deceivers; by Lyons, Oppreffors, and cruell men; by Swine, Men given over to luft and fenfualitie; by Wolves, ravening, and greedie Men; which also Saint Matthew resembleth to false prophets, which come to you in sheepes clothing, but in- thaubitse wardly they are ravening Wolves: by the images of stones and stockes, foolish and ignorant Men; by Vipers, ungratefull Men: of which S. Of Gods ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the Universall createdwas exceeding good.

N this worke of Man, God finished the Creation; not that God laboured as a man, and therefore rested: for God commanded, and it was finished, Cui volu. ife est feei se; With whom, to will is to make, faith Beda. Neither did God so rest, that hee left the World made, and the Creatures therein to themselves: for my Father workethto this day (faith Christ) and I worke; but God rested (that is) hee created no new species or kinds of creatures, but (as aforesaid) gave unto man a power generative, and to to the rest of living creatures, and to Plants and Flowers their seeds in themselves; 10 and commanded man to multiply and fill the Earth, and the Earth and Sea to bring forth creatures according to their feverall kinds: all which being finished, God faw that his workes were good; not that he fore-knew not, and comprehended not the beginning and end before they were; for God made every Plant of the field before it was in the Earth; but hee gave to all things which hee had created the name of good, thereby to teach men, that from so good a God there was nothing made, but that which was perfeet good, and from whole simple puritie and from so excellent a cause, there could proceed no impure or imperfect effect. For man having a free will and liberall choice, purchafed by disobedience his owne death and mortalitie, and for the crueltie of mans heart, was the Earth afterward curfed, and all creatures of the first Age destroyed, but 20 the righteous man Noah and his Family, with those creatures which the Arke contayned, reserved by God to replenish the Earth.

Of the Place of Paradise.

§. I That the feate of Paradife is greatly mistaken: and that it is no marvell that men should erre.

Fohn 5.170

Oncerning the first Habitation of man, we reade, that the Lord God plana ted a Garden Eastward in Eden, and there hee put the man whom hee made, GEN. 2.6. Of this seate and place of Paradise, all Ages have held dispute; and the opinions and judgements have beene in effect, as divers, among those that have written upon this part of Genesis, as upon any one place therein, feeming most obscure: some there are, that have conceived the being of the terrestriall Paradise, without all regard of the Worlds Geographie, and without any respect of the East and West, or any consideration of the place where Moses wrote, and 40 from whence he directed (by the quarters of the Heavens) the way how to find out and judge, in what Region of the Worldthis Garden was by God planted, wherein hee was exceeding respective and precise. Others, by being themselves ignorant in the Hebrew, followed the first Interpretation, or trusting to their owne judgements, understood one place for another; and one Errour is so fruitfull, as it begetteth a thoufand Children, if the licentiousnesse thereof bee not timely restrayned. And thirdly, those Writers which gave themselves to follow and imitate others, were in all things fo abservant Sectatours of those Masters, whom they admired and beleeved in, as they thought it fafer to condemne their owne understanding, than to examine theirs. For (faith Vadianus in his Epistle of Paradise) Magnos errores, magnorum viro-50 rum authoritate persuasi, transmittimus; Wee passe over many grosse errours, by the authoritie of great men led and perswaded. And it is true, that many of the Fathers were farre wide from the understanding of this place. I speake it not, that I my selfe dare presume to censure them, for I reverence both their Learning and their Pietie, and yet not bound to follow them any further, than they are guided by truth: for they were men; Et humanum est errare. And to the end that no man should bee proude of himselfe, God hath distributed unto men such a proportion of Knowledge, as the wifest may behold in themselves their owne weakenesse:

Nulli unquam dedit omnia Deus; Godnever gave the knowledge of all things to any one. Saint 2. COLIL 24 Paul confest that he knew not, whether he were taken up into the third heaven in the sless. or out of the flesh; and Christ himselfe acknowledgeth thus much, that neither Men, nor Mauha4.36; Angels knew of the latter day; and therefore, seeing knowledge is infinite, it is God (according to S. Jude) who is only wife. Sapientia ubi invenitur? (faith Joe) but where is Jude Esway. wiledome found? and where is the place of understanding? man knoweth not the price thereof Job 28.12. for it is not found in the Land of the living. And therefore seeing God found folly in his Angels, mens judgements (which inhabite in houses of clay) cannot be without their mitakings: and fo the Fathers, and other learned men, excufable in particulars, especially in those whereupon our falvation dependeth not.

> 6. II. Arecitall of strange opinions touching Paradife.

TOw touching Paradife, first it is to be enquired, whether there were a Paradife. or no : or whether Mofes description were altogether mysticall, and allegoricall ? as Origen, Philo, Fran. Georgius, with others have affirmed; and that under the names of those foure Rivers, Pifon, Gehon, Hidekel, and Perath, the tree of life, and the tree of Knowledge, there were delivered unto us other my steries and significations; as, that by the foure Rivers were meant the foure Cardinall vertues, Justice, Temperance, Fortitude, Bartassemal and Prudence; or (by other)Oyle, Wine, Milke, and Hony. This Allegoricall understan- La 143: ding of Paradise by Origen divulged, was againe by Franciscus Georgius received (saith Sixtus Senensis;) whose frivolous imaginations Sixtus himselfe doth fully and learnedly answer, in the 34. Annoration of his fift Booke, fol. 338 the last Edition.

S. Ambrofe also leaned wholly to the Allegorical Construction, and set Paradise in the third Heaven, and in the vertues of the minde, of in noftro principali, which is, as I conceive it, in mente, or in our foules: to the particulars whereof he alludeth in this fort. By the place or garden of Paradife, was meant the foule or minde; by Adam, Mens, or Understanding; by Eve, the Sense; by the Serpent, Delectation; by the Tree of good and 30 evill, Sapience; and by the rest of the Trees, the vertues of the minde, or in the minde plan- Amb de Penal; ted, or from thence foringing. Notwithstanding all which, upon the first of the Corin. c. 6. hein direct words alloweth both of a celeftial and terreftrial I Paradife; the one into which S. Paul was rapt; the other, into which Adam was put by God. Aug. Chryfamenfis was of opinion, that a Paradife had beene, but that there was not now any marke thereof on the earth the fame being not only defaced, but withall the places now not formuch as existing. To which Luther feemeth to adhere:

The Manichees also understood, that by Paradise was ment the whole Earth; to which opinion, Vadianus inclineth, as I conceive his words, in two feverall places. First, upon this: Fill the earth, Gen. 10. Of which he giveth this judgement. Hos ipfo etiam quod Ao dixit, Replete terram, dominamini universis animantibus subjicite terram, clarissime docet. totam terram extantem & omnigenis (ut tum erat) fructibus consitam, sedem & hortum illum Ada, & posteritatis future fuisse: These words faith he) in which God said, Bring forth fruit and multiply, and fill the earth, and fubdue it, and rule over every creature, doe cleerly shew. that the Universall earth set or filled with all sorts of fruits (as then it was) was the garden and feate of ADAM, and of his future posteritie. And afterward he acknowledgeth the place, out Vale 26, of the Atts Cap 17. Apostolus ex uno sanguine omne genus humanum ideo fattum docet, ut habitarent super universam faciem terra: tota igitur terra Paradi sus ille erat; The Apostle (faith he) teacheth, that God hath made of one bloud all mankinde, to dwell over all the face of the earth: and therefore all the earth (faith he) was that Paradife. Which conjectures I will answer in order. Goropius Beganus differeth not much from this opinion, but yet he acknowledgeth that Adam was first planted by God in one certaine place, and peculiar Garden; which place Goropius findeth neere the River of Acesines, in the confines of India.

Tertullian, Bonaventure, and Durandus, make Paradife under the Equinoctiall; and Bana6326, Postellies, onite contrary, under the North pole: the Chaldwans also for the most part, & all their Sectators, followed the opinion of Origen, or rather Origen theirs, who would either make Paradise a figure, or Sacrament only, or else would have it seated out of this fensible world, or raised into some high and remote Region of the Ayres Strabus, and Rabanus, were both ficke of this vanitie, with origen, and Philo: fo was our venerable Beda, and Peter Comestor, and Moses Barcephas the Syrian, translated by Masius. But as Hopkins fayes of Philo Judam, that hee wondred, Quomalo genio afflatus; By what evill Angell he was blowne up into this errour: fo can I not but greatly marvell at the learned men, who fo groffely and blindely wandred; feeing Moses, and after him the Prophets, do fo plainely describe this place, by the Region in which it was planted, by the kingdomes and provinces bordering it, by the Rivers which watered it, and by the points of the Compasse upon which it lay, in respect of Judæa, or Canaan.

Novionagus also upon Beda, De natura rerum, beleeveth that all the Earth was taken for Paradise, and not any one place. For the whole earth (saith he) hath the same beau- to ty ascribed to Paradise. He addeth, that the Ocean was that fountaine, from whence the foure Rivers, Pifon, Gehon, Tigris, and Euphrates, had their beginning: for he could northinke it possible, that these Rivers of Ganges, Nilus, Tigris, and Euphrates (whereof the one ranne through India, the other through Egypt, and the other through Mefopotamia and Armenia) could rife out of one fountaine, were it not out of the Fountaine of the Ocean.

That there was a true locall Paradise Eastward, in the Countrey of Eden.

→O the first therefore, that such a place there was upon the earth, the words of Moses make it manifest, where it is written, And the Lord God planted a garden Eastward in Eden, and there hee put the man whom hee had made. And how soever the vulgar translation, called Hieromes translation, hath converted this place thus, Plansaverat Dominus Deus Paradisum voluptatis à principio; The Lord God planted a Paradise of pleasure from the beginning; putting the word (pleasure) for Eden, & (from the beginning) for Eastward: it is manifest, that in this place Eden is the proper name of a Region. For what fense hath this translation (faith our Hopkins, in his Treatise of Paradise) that hee planted a garden in pleasure, or that a River went out of pleasure to water the garden? But the seventy Interpreters call it Paradisum Edenis, the Paradise of Eden, and so doth the Chaldæan Paraphrast truely take it for the proper name of a place, and for a Noune appellative; which Region, in respect of the fertilitie of the soyle, of the many beautifull Rivers and goodly Woods, and that the trees (as in the Indies) doe alwayes keepe their leaves, was called Eden, which fignifieth in the Hebrew, pleafantneffe, or delicacie, as the Spaniards call the Country, opposite to the Isle of Cuba, Florida: and this is the mistaking, which may end the dispute, as touching the double sense of the word, that as Florida was a Countrey, so called for the flourishing beauty thereof; so was Eden a Region called pleasure, or delicacy, for its pleasure, or delicacy: and as Florida sigmifieth flourishings so Eden signifieth pleasure: and yet both are the proper names of Countries; for Edenbeing the proper name of a Region (called pleasure in the Hebrew) and 40 Paradife being the choice feate of all that Region, Paradife was truly the Garden of Eden, and truely the Garden of pleasure.

Now, for Eastward, to translate it, from the beginning, it is also contrary to the transflation of the Seventy; to the ancient Greeke Fathers, as Ba fil, Chryfostome, Theodoret, Gregorie; and to the Rabines, as Ramban, Rabbi Salomon, R. Abraham, and Chimchi; and of the Latines, Severinus, Damascenus, &c. who plainly take Eden for the proper name of a Region, and set the word (Éastward) for ab initio: for Damascens owne words are these, Paradisus est locus Dei manibus in Eden ad Orientem mirabiliter consitus ; Paradise is a place, marvellously planted by the hands of God, in Eden, toward the East. And after all these Fathers, Guilhelmus Paristensis, a great learned man, and Sixtus Se- 50 nensis, of later times, doe both understand these words of Eden, and of the East, contrary to the vulgar translation; Parisiensis, as indifferent to both, and Sixtus Senensis, directly against the vulgar: of which these are their owne words: After this I will begin to speake of Paradise terrestriall, which God planted from the beginning, or Eastward &c. Post bæc incipiam loqui de Paradiso terrestri, quem plantasse Deum ab initio vel ad Orientem &c. And then Senensis; Moses enim claristime prodit, Paradisum à Deo consitum invegione terra Orientalis, qua dicitur Heden: Heden autem esse proprium nomen apparet ex quarto capite Gen ubi legimus CHAM babitaffe ad Orientalem plagam Heden; For Moses (faith he) doth show most cleerely, that Paradise was planted of God in a Region of the East Countrie, which is called Heden: but that Heden is a proper name, it appeareth by the fourth Chapter of Genesis, where we reade, that CHAM dwelt on the East border of Heden. PERE-Version RIUS endevoureth to qualifie this translation; for this particle (faith he) ab initio, is referred to all the time of the creation, and not to the very first day; alledging this place of Christ, that although the Divell was said to be a man-flayer from the beginning, ver John 8 447 that was meant but after the fixth day. But furely, as I thinke (referring my felfe to better judgement) the Devill was from the instant of his fall a man-slayer in disposition. though he had not whereon to practife till mans creation. And for conclusion, S. Hierome (if that be his translation) adviseth himselfe better in the end of the third Chapter of Genesis, converting the word (Eden) by (ante) and not (a principio) as, Goddid set a Cherubin before the Garden of Eden; Collocavit Deus ante Paradisum voluptatis Cherubin; and Pererius himselfe acknowledgeth, that this is the true sense of this place, precisely taken, according to the Hebrew. Posuit à parte Orientali horti Heden, Cherubin; Heeset Genazio on the East-side of the Garden of Heden, a Cherubin. BE CANUS affirmeth, that the Hebrew word (Be) fignifieth (with) as well as (in) and fo the Text beareth this fense; That God planted a Garden with pleasure (that is to say) full of pleasure. But Becanus followerh this construction, onely to the end, to finde Paradise upon the River of Acesines: for there he hath heard of the Indian Fig-tree in great aboundance, which he supposeth to be the tree of Knowledge of good and evill, and would therefore draw Paradife to the Fig. tree: which conceit of his I will answer hereafter.

Now, because Paradise was seated by Moses toward the East, thence came the custome of praying towards the East, and not by imitation of the Chaldwans: and therefore all our Churches are built East and West, as to the point where the Sun riseth in March, which is directly over Paradife (faith Damafeenus:) affirming, that we alwayes pray towards the East, as looking towards Paradife, whence we were cast out; and vet the Temple of Solomon had their Priests and Sacrifices, which turned themselves in their fervice and divine ceremonies, alwayes towards the West, thereby to avoide the superstition of the Egyptians and Chaldwans.

CHAP.2. $.3.

But because East and West are but in respect of places; (for although Paradise were East from Judga, yet it was West from Persia) and the serving of God is every where in the worldsthe matter is not great which way we turn our faces, so our hearts stand right, other than this, that we who dwell West from Paradise, and pray turning our selves towards the East, may remember thereby to befeech God, that as by Adams fall wee have loft the Paradife on earth; fo by Christ's death and passion we may be made partakers of the Paradife celeftiall, and the Kingdome of heaven. To conclude, I conceive that there was no other mysterie in adding the word (East) to Eden by Moses, than to shew, that the Region of Eden, in which Paradife was lay Eastward from Judge and Canaan: for the Scriptures alwayes called the people of those Nations, the Sons of the East which inhago bited Arabia, Mesopotamia, Chaldwa, and Persia: of which o vid.

Eurus ad Euroram, Nabataaq; regnarecessit, The East winde with Aurona hatha biding Among th' Arabian, and the Persian Hils, Whom Phobius first salies at his up-rising.

And if it be objected, that Hieremy the Prophet, threatning the destruction of Hierusalem, doth often make mention of Northerne Nations, it is to be noted, that the North is there named, in respect of those nations that followed Nabuchodonozer, and of whom the Streatest part of his Army was compounded; not that Babylon it selfe stood North from Hierufalem, though inclining from the East towards the North.

Now to the difference of this Translation, Peter Comeftor giveth best statisfaction: for houseth the word, From the beginning, that is, from the first part of the World, (a principio). ideft, (faith he) à prima orbis parte; and afterward hee affirmeth, that à principio, and ad Orientem, have the same signification: From the beginning & East ward is all onesa princi-

But to returne to the proofe of this place, and that this Story of Mankind was not Allegoricall, it followeth in the Text of the 2. Chap. & 9. Verfe, in these words: For out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every Tree pleasant to the sight, and good for meat, fo as first it appeared that God created Adam elsewhere, as in the World at large, and then put him into the Garden: and the end why, is exprest: that he might dreffeit and keepe it ; Paradife being a Garden or Orchard filled with Plants, and Trees, of the most excellent kinds, pleafant to behold, and (with all) good for meate: which prove that P_{a-} radife was a terrestriall Garden, garnished with Fruits, delighting both the eye and taste. And to make it more plaine, and to take away all opinion of Allegoricall construction, he affirmeth that it was watered and beautified with a River; expressing also the Region, out of which this River sprang, which he calleth Heden; and that Heden is also a Countrie ncere unto Charan in Mesopotamia, Ezechiel witnesseth.

But to all these Cabalists, which draw the Truthand Storie of the Scriptures into Allegories, Epiphanius answereth in these words: Si Paradisus non est sensibilis, non est etiam fons, sinon est fons, non est flumen, si non est flumen, non sunt quatuor principia, non Pison, 10 non Gehon, non Tigris, nec Euphrates, non est ficus, non folia, non comedit Eva de arbore, non est ADAM, non sunt homines, sed verisas jam fabula est, & omnia ad Allegorias revocantur: If Paradife be not sensible, then there was no fountaine, and then no river, if no river, then no fuch foure heads or branches, and then not any fuch river, as Pison, or Gehon, Tigris, or Euphrates, no such fig. tree or fruit, or leaves, Eve then did not eate of the fruit, neither was there any ADAM, or any man, the truth was but a fable, and all things esteemed are called back into Allegories. Words to the fame effect hath S. Hierome upon DANIEL: Contitefoante orum deliramenta, qui umbras & imagines in veritate sequentes, ipsam conantur evertere veritatem, ut Paradisum & flumina, & arbores putent Allegoria Legibus se debere subruere: vertiatem, ut Lai au jum of jum be filent, who following shadowes and images in the Truth, endevour to 20 Subvert the Truth it selfe, and thinke that they ought to bring Paradise, and the Rivers of the Trees under the Rules of Allegorie. Furthermore, by the continuation and order of the Storie is the place made more manifest. For, God gave Adam free libertie to eate of every Tree of the Garden, (the Tree of knowledge excepted) which Trees Moses in the ninth verse faith that they were good to cat; meaning the fruit which they bare. Befides, God left all beafts to Adam to be named, which he had formerly made; and these beasts were neither in the third Heaven, nor neer the circle of the Moon, nor beafts in imagination: for if all thefe things were Enigmatical or mysticall, the same might also be said of the creation of all things. And Ezechiel, speaking of the glory of the Affyrian Kings, ufeth this speech : All the Trees of Eden, which a were in the Garden of God, envied him; which proveth both Eden, and Paradife therein feated, to be terrestriall: for the Prophets made no imaginary comparisons. But Moses wrote plainly, and in a simple stile, fit for the capacities of ignorant men, and he was more large and precise in the description of Paradise, than in any other place of Scripture; of purpose to take away all scruple from the incredulitie of future ages, whom he knew (out of the gift of Prophecie) to beapt to fabulous inventions, and that if he had not described both the region and the Rivers, and how it stood from Canaan, many of the unbeleeving Ifraelites & others after them, would have misconstrued this Storie of Mankind. And is it likely, there would have beene so often mention made of Paradise in the Scriptures, if the fame had beene an Miopia? For wee finde that the Valley, wherein Sodome and Gomor- 40

And it is manifelt, that Orpheus, Linus, Pindarus, Hefiodus, and Homer, and after him, Ovid, one out of another, and all these together with Pythageras and Plato, and their Secta-

Sectatours, did greatly enrich their inventions, by venting the stolne Treasures of Divine Letters, altered by prophane additions, and difguifed by poetical convertions, as if they had bin conceived out of their owne speculations and contemplations.

But besides all these testimonies, if wee finde what Region Heden or Eden was: if we prove the River that ran out of it, and that the fame afterwards was divided into foure branches; together with the Kingdomes of Havila and Cush, and that all these are Eastward from Canaan, or the Defarts of the Amorites, where Moses wrote: I then conceive that there is no man that will doubt, but that fuch a place there was. And yet I doe not exclude the Allegoricall fense of the Scripture; for as well in this there were many figures of Christ, as in all the old Testament throughout : the Storie being directly true notwithstanding. And to this purpose (faith Saint Augustine) Tres sunt de Paradiso generales sententia : una est eorum, qui tantummodo corporaliter Paradisum intelligi golunt : alia eorum, qui spiritualiter tantium (id est) Ecclesiam: tertia eorum, qui utroq: modo Paradifum accipiunt, (that is) There are three opinions of Paradife: the one of those men, which will have it altogether corporall: a second of those, which conceive it altogether spirituall, and to bee a figure of the Church: the third of those which take it in both senses; which third opinion S. Augustine approveth, and of which Suidas giveth this allowable Augusticianes indocement: Quemadmodum homo sensibilis, & intelligibilis simul conditus erat: sic & hujus sanctissimum nemus, sensibile simul & intelligibile, & duplici specie est praditum; (that Raradius is) As man was created at one time both sensible and intelligible: so was this holy Grove or Garden to be taken both wayes, and endued with a double forme.

Why it should be needfull to intreas diligently of the place of Paradise.

D Ut it may be objected, that it is needleffe, and a kinde of curiofitie to enquire for Bdiligently after this place of Paradife, and that the knowledge thereof is of little or no use. To which I answer, that there is nothing written in the Scripture, but for our instruction; and if the truth of the Storie be necessarie, then by the place proved. o the same is also made more apparent. For if wee should conceive that Paradise were not on the Earth, but lifted up as high as the Moone; or that it were beyond all the Ocean, and inno part of the knowne World, from whence Adam was faid to wade through the Sea, and thence to have come into Judea, (out of doubt) there would be few men in the World, that would give any credit unto it. For what could feeme more vidiculous than the report of fuch a place and befides, what maketh this feate of Paradife fo much difputed and doubted of, but the conceit that Pishon should be Ganges, which watereth the East India, and Gehon, Nilus, which enricheth Egypt, and these two Rivers so farre diflant, as (except all the World were Paradife) thefe streames can no way be comprised therein ?

Secondly, if the birth and workes, and death of our Saviour, were faid to have beene in some such Countrey, of which no man ever heard tell, and that his Miracles had bin performed in the Ayre, or no place certainly knowne: I affure my felfe, that the Christian Religion would have taken but a flender roote in the minds of men: for times and pla-

Thirdly, if we should rely, or give place to the judgement of some Writers upon this place of Genesis (though otherwise for their doctrine in generall, they are worthy of honour and reverence) I say that there is no fable among the Grecians or Egyptians more ridiculous: for who would believe that there were a piece of the World fo fet by it felfe and separated as to hang in the Ayre under the circle of the Moone or who fo doltish to conceive, that from thence the foure Rivers of Ganges, Nilus, Euphrates, and Tygris, should fall downe, and run under all the Ocean, and rife up againe inthis our habitable world, and in those places where they are now found. Which lest any man thinke that I enforce or strain to the work, these are Peter Comestors own words. Est autem locus amanisimus, longo terra & maris tractu à nostra habitabili Zona secretus, a deò elevatus, ut usqual lunarem globum attingat, &c. volumus, Paradisum multo sublimiore positum esseregione, atq; hæc nostra extet terra eoq; fi. eri ut illine per pracipitium delabantur fluvii tanto cum impetu, quantum verbis exprimere non possis ; eoq; impetu impulsi pressiq; sub Oceani vado rapiuntur, underursus prosiliant e bulliantq; in hoc à nobis culto orbe: which have this sense: Furthermore (laith he) we give this for an answer, that Paradise is set in a Region farre raised above this part which wee inhabite; whereby it comes to passe, that from thence these rivers fall downe with such a headlong violence, as words cannot expresse; and with that force so impulsed and prest, they are carried under the deepe Ocean, and doe againe rise and boyle up in this our habitable World: and to this he addeth the opinion of Ephram, which is this. Ephram dicit Paradifum ambire terram, atq; ultra O ceanum ita positum esse suttotum terrarum or bem ab omni circumdet regione, 10 non aliter atq; Luna orbis Lunam cingit; (which is) That Paradise doth compasse or embrace the whole Earth, and is so set beyond the Ocean Sea, as it environeth the whole Orbe of the Earth on every side, as the Orbe of the Moone doth embrace the Moone. To the end therefore that these ridiculous expositions and opinions doe not bring question unto Truth it selfe, or make the same subject to doubts or disputes, it is necessary to discover the true place of Paradise, which God in his wisedome appointed in the very Navell of this our World, and (as Melancthon faies) in parte Terra meliore, in the best part thereof, that from thence, as from a Center, the Univertall might be filled with people and planted; and by knowing this place, we shall the better judge of the beginning of Nations, and of the worlds inhabitation: for neere unto this did the Sons of Noah alfo dispersethemselves after the floud, 20 into all other remote regions and countries. And if it be a generous defire in men, to know from whence their owne forefathers have come, and out of what regions and Nations, it cannot be displeasing to understand the place of our first Ancestor, from whence all the Areames and branches of Mankind have followed and bin deduced. If then it doe appeare by the former, that fuch a place there was as Paradife, and that the knowledge of this place cannot be unprofitable, it followeth in order to examine feverall opinions before remembred, by the Truth it selfe; and to see how they agree with the sense of the Scripture, and with common reason, and afterward to prove directly, and to delineate the Region in which God first planted this delightfull Garden.

J. V. That the Floud hath not utterly defaced the markes of Paradise, nor caused Hils in the Earth.

Nd first, whereas it is supposed by Aug. Chyfamensis, that the Floud hath altered, deformed, or rather annihilated this place, in such forr, as no man can finde any marke or memorie thereof: (of which opinion there were others alfo, ascribing to the Floud the cause of those high Mountaines, which are found on all the Earth over, with many other strange effects) for mine owne opinion, I thinke neither the one nor the other to be true. For although I cannot deny, but that the face 49 of Paradife was after the Floud withered, and growne old, in respect of the first beautie: (for both the ages of men, and the nature of all things Time hath changed) yet if there had been eno figne of any fuch place, or if the foile and feate had not remained, then would not Moses, who wrote of Paradise about 850. yeares after the Floud, have described it so particularly, and the Prophets long after Moses would not have made so often mention thereof. And though the verie Garden it selfe were not then to be found, but that the Floud, and other accidents of time made it one common field and pasture with the Land of Eden, yet the place is still the same, and the Rivers still remaine the fame Rivers. By two of which (never doubted of) to wir, Tygris and Enphrases, we are fure to finde in what longitude Paradife lay; and learning out one of these so Rivers, which afterward doth divide it felfe into foure branches, wee are fure that the partition is at the very border of the Garden it selfe. For it is written, that out of Eden went a River to water the Garden, and from thence it was divided and became into foure heads: Now whether the word in the Latine Translation (Inde) from thence, be referred to Eden it felfe, or to Paradife, yet the division and branching of those rivers must be in the North or South fide of the very Garden (if the rivers run as they doe, North and South) and therfore these rivers yet remaining, & Eden manifestly known, there could be no such defacing by the floud, as is supposed. Furthermore, as there is no likelihood, that the place could be fo altered as future ages knew it not, fo is there no probability, that either these Rivers were turned out of their courses, or new rivers created by the Floud which were not, or that the Floud(as aforefaid) by a violent motion, when it began to decrease, was the cause of high Hils or deep Vallies. For what descent of waters could there be in a Sphericall and round body, wherein there is nor high nor low? feeing that all violent force of waters is either by the strength of wind, by descent from a higher to a lower. or by the ebb or floud of the Sea. But that there was any wind (wherby the Seas are most enraged) it appeareth not rather the contrary is probable for it is written, Therefore God Gen. S. 1) made a wind to passe upon the Earth, and the waters ceased. So as it appeareth not that untill to the waters fank, there was any winde at all, but that God afterward, out of his goodnesse. caused the winde to blow to drye up the abundant slime and mud of the Earth, and make the Land more firm, and to cleanfe the Ayre of thick vapours, and unwholfom mifts: and this we know by experience, that all down-right rains doe evermore diffever the violence of outrageous winds, and beat down, and level the fwelling and mountainous billow of the Sea: for any ebbs and flouds there could be none, when the waters were equal and of one height over all the face of the Earth, and when there were no Indraughs, Bayes, or Gulfes to receive a Floud, or any descent, or violent falling of waters in the round forme of the Earth and Waters, as aforefaid: and therefore it feemeth most agreeable to reason, that the waters rather stood in a quiet calme, than that they moved with any raging or overbearing violence. And for a more direct proofe that the Floud made no fuch destroying alteration, Josephus avoweth that one of those pillars erected by Seth, the third from A. dam, was to be seene in his dayes; which pillars were set up above 1426. yeares before the Floud, counting Seth to be an hundred yeares old at the erection of them; and Foseth himselfe to have lived some fortie or fiftie yeares after Christ: of whom although there be no cause to believe all that he wrote, yet that which he avouched of his owne time. cannot (without great derogation) be called in question. And therefore it may be possible, that some foundation or ruine thereof might then be seene. Now that such pillars were raifed by Seth, all Antiquitie hath avowed. It is also written in Berosus (to whom although I give little credit, yet I cannot condemn him in all) that the citie of Enoch, built 30 by Cain about the mountaines of Libanus, was not defaced by length of time : yea the ruines thereof Annius (who commented upon that invented fragment) faith, were to be feene in his dayes, who lived in the reigne of Ferdinand and Isabella of Castile. And if these his words be not true, then was he exceeding impudent: for, speaking of this citie of Enoch, he concludeth in this fort: Cujus maxima & ingentis molis fundamenta vi Suntur & vocatur ab incolis regionis, Civitas Cain, ut nostri mercatores, & peregrini referunt; The foundation of which huge Masse is now to be seene, and the place is called by the people of that Region, the Citie of Cain, as both our strangers and merchants report. It is also a vowed by Pomponius Mela (to whom I give more credit in these things) that the city of Joppa was built before the Floud, over which Cepha was King: whose name, with his brother Phinew, together with the grounds and principles of their Religion, was found graven upon certaine alters of stone. And it is not impossible, that the ruines of this other citie, called Enoch by Annius, might be seene, though founded in the first Age: but it could not be of the first citie of the world, built by Cain, the place rather than the time denving it.

And to prove directly that the Floud was not the cause of mountaines, but that there were mountaines from the creation, it is written, that the maters of the Floud overflowed by Gen 417 fifteene Cubits the highest Mountains. And Massius Damascenus, speaking of the Floud, Writerh in this maner : Eft supra Mingadam excelsus mons in Armenia (qui Baris appellatur) in quo confugientes multos fermo est diluvii tempore liberatos. And upon Miny ada there is an high Mountaine in Armenia (called Baris) unto which (as it is faid) that many fled in the time of the Deluge, and that they faved themselves thereon. Now although it is contrarie to Gods Word, that any more were faved than eight persons (which Masses doth not avouch, but by report) yet it is a testimonie, that such Mountaines were before the Floud, which were afterwards, and ever fince, knowne by the fame names; &on which Mountaines it is generally received that the Arke rested; but untruely, as I shall prove hereafter. And againe it appeareth, that the Mount sion (though by another name) was knowne before the Floud; on which the Thalmudists report, that many Giants faved themselves also; but, as Annius faith, without all authoritie; either divine or humane. Laftly

Lastly, it appeareth that the Floud did not so turne upside downe the face of the Earth, as thereby it was made past knowledge, after the waters were decreased, by this, that when NOAH sent out the Dove the second time, she returned with an Olive-leafe in her mouth. which she had pluckt, and which (untill the Trees were discovered) she found not: for otherwise she might have found them storing on the water; a manifest proofe, that the Trees were not torne up by the rootes, nor fwam upon the waters, for it is written: folium Oliva, raptum or decerptum, aleafe pluckt, (which is) to take from a Tree, or to teare off. By this it is apparent, (there being nothing written to the contrary) that the Floud made no such alteration, as was supposed, but that the place of Paradise might be seene to succeeding Ages, especially unto Moles, by whom it pleased God to teach the truth of the 19 Worlds Creation, and unto the Prophets which succeeded him: both which Itake for my warrant, and to guide me in this Discovery.

 $\mathfrak{g}.\ V\ I.$ That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some have thought: making the Ocean to beethe fountaine of those foure Rivers.

His conceit of Aug. Chysamensisbeing answered, who onely giveth his opinion for reason, I will in a few words examine that of the Manichees, of Noviomagus, Va. dianus, Goropius, Becanus, and all those that understood, that by Paradise was 20 meant the whole Earth. But in this I shall not trouble the Reader with many words, because by those places of Scripture formerly remembred, this Universalitie will appeare altogether improper. The places which Vadianus alledgeth, Bring forth fruit and multiply, fill the Earth and subdue it, rule over every Creature, &c. with this of the Acts, and hath made of one bloud all Mankinde, to dwell on all the face of the Earth, doe no way prove fuch a generalitie : for the World was made for man, of which he was Lord and Governour, and all things therein were ordained of God for his use. Now although all men were of one and the same fountaine of bloud originally; and Adams posteritie inhabited in process of time over all the face of the earth; yet it disproveth in nothing the particular Garden, affigned to Adam, to dreffe and cultive, in which he lived in so bleffed an estate before his 3 transgression. For if there had beene no other choyce, but that Adam had bin left to the Univerfall; Moses would not then have said, Eastward in Eden, seeing the World hath nor East nor West but respectively. And to what end had the Angell of God beene set to keepe the East-side, and entrance into Paradise after Adams expulsion, if the Univerfall had beene Paradise: for then must Adam have been chased also out of the World. For if all the earth were Paradife, that place can receive no better construction than this, That Adam was driven out of the World into the World, and out of Paradile into Paradile, except we should believe with Metrodorus, that there were infinite Worlds. Which to deny, he thinkes all one, as to affirme, That in so large a field, as the Universall, there should grow but one Thiftle. NOVIOMAGUS upon Beda, feemeth to be led by this, that it was im- 40 possible for those three Rivers, Ganges, Nilus, and Euphrates (which water three portions of the World so far distant) to rise out of one Fountaine, except the Ocean bee taken for the Well, and the World for the Garden.

And it is true, that those foure Rivers, being so understood, there could been conjecture more probable; but it shall plainly appeare, that Pison was falsly taken for Ganges, and Gehon falfly for Nilus, although Ganges be a River by Havilah in India, & Ni-Ins run through Ethiopia. The Seventy write Chus for Ethiopia, and thereby the errors of the Manichees, and the mistakings of Noviomagus, Goropius, & Vadianus, with others, are made manifest. Yet was their conjecture farre more probable, than that of Ephrem, Cyrillus, and Athanasius: That Paradise was seated far beyond the Ocean Sea, and that 50 Adam waded through it, and at last came toward the Country in which hee was created, and was buried at Mount Calvary in Hierusalem. And certainely, though all those of the first Age were of great stature, and so continued many yeares after the Floud, yet Adams shin-bones must have contained a thousand fadome, and much more, if he had foorded the Ocean; but this opinion is so ridiculous, as it needes no argument to dis-6. prove it.

of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Moone: and of others, which make it higher than the middle Region of the Avre.

Hirdly, whereas Beda faith, and as the Schoolemen affirme, Paradife to be a place, altogether removed from the knowledge of men, (locus à cognitione bominum remotissimus) and Barcephas conceived, that Paradise was farrein the Fast, but mounted above the Ocean, and all the Earth, and neere the Orbe of the Moone (which opinion, though the Schoolemen charge Beda withall, vet Pererius layes it off from Beda upon Strabus, and his Master Rabanus:) and whereas Rupertus. in his Geographie of Paradise, doth not much differ from the rest, but findes it seated next or neerest heaven; It may seeme, that all these borrowed this doctrine out of Plato, and Plato out of Socrates: but neither of them (as I conceive) well understood: who (undoubtedly) tooke this place for Heavenit felfe, into which the Soules of the bleffed were carried after death.

True it is, that these Philosophers durst not for seare of the Areopagites (in this and Diog. Laws and many other divine apprehensions) set downe what they believed in plaine termes, e- some specially Plato: though Socrates in the end suffered death, for acknowledging one onely o powerfull God; and therefore did the Devill himselfe doe him that right, as by an Oracle to pronounce him the wifest man. Justine Martyr affirmeth, that Plato had read Justin Mart. the Scriptures; and S. Augustine gave this judgement of him, as his opinion, that (few admad Gen) things changed) he might be counted a Christian. And it seemeth to mee, that both Tertullian and Eusebius conceive, that Socrates, by that place aforefaid, meant the celestiall Paradise, and not this of Eden. Solinus, I grant, reporteth, that there is a place exceeding delightfull and healthfull, upon the top of Mount Atho (called Acrothonos) which being above all Clouds of Raine, or other inconvenience, the people (by reafon of their fo many yeeres) are called Macrobici (that is) Long-lived. A further Argument is used, for proofe of the height of this place, because therein was Enoch pre-Gerved from the violence of the Floud: approved by Isidore, and Peter Lombard: in which place also Tertullian conceived, that the bleffed Soules were preserved till the last judgement; which Irenaus and Justine Martyr also believed. But this opinion was of all Catholique Divines reproved, and in the Florentine Councell damned; of which Saint Augustine more modestly gave this judgement: Sieut certum est, ENOCH and ELIAM nunc vivere : itaubi nunc sunt : an in Paradiso an alibi, incertum est : (that is) As it is certaine that Enoch and Elias doe now live: so where they live, in Paradise or elsewhere, it is uncertaine. But Barcephas gives a third cause, though of all other the weakest. For (faith he)it was necessary that Paradise should be set at such a distance and height, because the foure Rivers (had they not fallen so precipitate) could not have had sufficient force o to have thrust themselves under the great Ocean, and afterward have forced their passage through the earth, and have rifen againe in the farre diftant Regions of India, Egypt, and Armenia.

These strange fancies and dreames have beene answered by divers learned men long fince, and lately by Hopkins, and Pererius, writing upon this subject; of whose arguments I will repeate these few : for to use long discourse against those things, which are both against Scripture and Reason, might rightly be judged a vanity in the Answerer, not much inferior to that of the Inventer.

It is first therefore alledged, that such a place cannot be commodious to live in: for being fet fo neere the Moone, it had beene too neere the Sunne, and other heavenly bodies. Secondly, because it must have beene too joynet a Neighbour to the Element of fire. Thirdly, because the Ayrein that Region is so violently moved, and carried about with fuch fwiftnesse, as nothing in that place can consist or have abiding. Fourthly, because the place betweene the Earth and the Moone (according to Ptolomie and Alfragants) is seventeene times the Diameter of the Earth, which makes in a groffe account about one hundred and twenty thousand miles. Hereupon it must follow, that Paradife, being raised to this height, must have the compasse of the whole earth for a Basis and foundation. But had it beene so raised, it could hardly be hidden from the knowledge, or eyes of men: feeing it would deprive us of the Sunnes light, all the fore-part of the day, being feated in the East, as they suppose. Now, to fortific the former opinions, Toftatus addeth this, that those people which dwell neere those fals of waters, are deafe from their infancy, like those which dwell neere the Catadapa, or over-fals of Nilus. But this I hold as fained. For I have feene in the Indies, far greater water-falls, than those of Nilus, and yet the people dwelling neere them are not deafe at all. Toftatus (the better to Atrengthen himselfe) citeth Basil and Ambrosetogether to which Pererius, Sed ego hac apud Basilium & Ambrosium in corum scriptis, qua nunc extant nusquam me legere memini, But I doe not remember (faith he) that I ever read those things either in Basil or Amerose.

But for the bodies of Enoch and Elias, God hath disposed of them according to his wisdome. Their taking up might be into the celestiall Paradife, for ought we know. For al-in though fleshand bloud, subject to corruption, cannot inherit the Kingdome of heaven, and the feed must rot in the ground before it grow, yet we shall not all die (saith S. Paul) but all shall be changed : which change, in Enoch and Elias, was easie to him that is Almightie-But for the rest, the Scriptures are manifest, that by the Floud all perished on the earth, faving eight persons; and therefore in the terrestriall Paradise they could not be.

For Toffatus his owne opinion, who foared not altogether fo high as the rest, but beleeved that Paradife was raifed above the middle Region of the Aire, and twenty cubits above all Mountaines, that the Floud did not therefore reach it : (which Scotus and other latter Schoole-men also beleeved; for, say they, there were no sinners in Paradise, and therefore no cause to over-whelme it:) this is also contrary to the expresse letter of the Scripture, which directly, and without admitting of any diftinction, teacheth us, that the waters over-flowed all the mountaines under heaven. And were it otherwise, then might we aswell give credit to Massus, Damascenus, & the Thalmudists, who affirme, that there were of the Giants that faved themselves on the Mountaine Baris, and on Sion. But to helpe this, Scotus, being (as the rest of the Schoolemen are) full of distinctions, saith, That the waters stood at Paradise, as they did in the Red Sea, and at Jordan; and as the Floud was not naturall, fo was Paradife faved by miracle. And Thomas Aquinas qualifieth this high conceit with this supposition, That it was not believed, that Paradise was so seated, as Beda and others seeme to affirme in words, but by Hyperbole and comparatively, for the delicacie and beautie fo resembled. But this I dare avow of all those Schoole-men, that though they were exceeding witty, yet they better teach all their Followers to shift, than to resolve by their distinctions. Wherefore not to stay long in answering this opinion of Tostatus, I confesse that it is written, that the Mountaines of Olympus, Atho, and Atlas, over-reach and furmount all windes and clouds, and that (notwithstanding) there is found on the heads of the Hils both springs and fruits; and the Pagan Priests, sacrificing on these mountaine tops, do not find the ashes (remaining of their facrifices) blowne thence, nor thence washt off by raines, when they returne: yet experience hath resolved us, that these reports are fabulous, and Pliny himselfe (who was not sparing in the report of wonders) avoweth the contrary. But were it granted, yet the height of these Mountaines is farre under the supposed place of Paradise; and on 4 these selfe Hils the ayre is so thin (faith S. Augustine, whom herein I mistrust) that it is not sufficient to beare up the body of a bird, having therein no feeling of her wings, or any sensible resistance of ayre to mount her selfe by.

Hose which come neerer unto Reason, finde Paradise under the Aquinottial line, as Tertullian, Bonaventure, and Durandus: judging, that thereunder st might be found most pleasure, and the greatest fertility of soile : but against it Thomas Aquinas objecteth the distemperate heat, which he supposeth to be in all places so directly under the Sunne; but this is (non causa pro causa,) for although Paradise could not be under the Line, because Eden is farre from it, in which Paradise was, and because there is no part of Euphrates, Tigris, or Ganges under it, (Ganges being one of the foure rivers, as they suppose) yer this conceit of diffemper, (being but an old opinion) is found to be very untrue, though for the conjecture not to bee condemned, confidering the age when those Fathers wrote, grounded chiefly on this: that whereas it appeared, that every Countrie, as it lay by degrees neerer the Tropick, and so toward the Aguinostiall, did so much the more exceede in heat; It was therefore a reasonable conjecture, that those Countries which were situated directly under it, were of a distemper uninhabitable: but it seemeth that Tertullian conceived better, and so did Avicense, for they both thought them habitable enough; and though (perchance) in those dayes it might be thought a fantasticall opinion (as all are which goe against the vulgar) yet we now find, that if there be any place upon the earth of that nature. beautie, and delight that Paradife had, the fame must be found within that supposed uninhabitable burnt Zone, or within the Tropicks, and neerest to the line it selfe. For hereof experience hath informed Reason, and Time hath made those things apparent; which were hidden and could not by any contemplation be discovered. Indeed it hath fo pleased God to provide for all livingcreatures, wherewith he hath filled the world. that fuch inconveniences which we contemplate a farre off, are found by triall and the witnesse of mens travailes, to be so qualified, as there is no portion of the earth made in vaine, or as a fruitleffelump to fashion out the rest. For God himselfe (faith I s A Y) that 1994 19 formed the earth and made it, he that prepared it, he created it not in vaine, he formed it to be inhabited. Now we finde that these hortest Regions of the world, seated under the Aguinottial line, or neere it, are so refreshed with a daily gale of Easternely winde (which the Spaniards call the Brize) that doth evermore blow strongest in the heate of the day, as the downe-right beames of the Sunne cannot fo much mafter it, that there is any inconvenience or diftemperate heat found thereby. Secondly, the nights are fo cold. fresh, and equall, by reason of the entire interposition of the earth, as (for those places which my felfe have feene, neere the Line and under it) I know no other part of the world of better, or equall temper: Onely there are some tracks, which by accident of high Mountaines are barr'd from this ayre and fresh wind, and some few sandy parts without trees, which are not therefore so well inhabited as the rest; and such difference of foiles we finde also in all other parts of the world. But (for the greatest part) those Regions have formany goodly Rivers, Fountaines, and little Brookes, abundance of high Cedars, and other stately trees, casting shade, so many forts of delicate fruits ever bearing, and at all times beautified with bloffome and fruit both greene and ripe, as it may of all other parts be best compared to the Paradise of Eden: the boughes and branches are never unclothed and left naked, their fap creepeth not under ground into the root. fearing the injury of the frost neither doth Pomona at any time despise her withered Husband Vertumnus, in his winter quarters and old age. Therefore are these Countries called Terra vitiofa, Vicious Countries: for Nature being liberallto all without labour. necessitie imposing no industrie or travell, idlenesse bringeth forth no other fruits than vaine thoughts, and licentious pleasures. So that to conclude this part, Tertullian and those of his opinion, were not deceived in the nature of the place: but Aquinas, who missiliked this opinion, and followed a worse. And (to say the truth) all the Schoolesmen were groffe in this particular.

6. IX Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Calosyria, there is a Country in Babylon once of this name, as is provedent of E & A. 37 and E z E K. 27.

Hele opinions answered, and the region of Eden not found in any of those imaginary worlds, nor under Torrida Zona; it followeth that now we discover and find out the feat thereof, for in it was Paradife by God planted. The difficultie of which fearch resteth chiefly in this, That as all Nations have often changed names with b their Masters; so are most of these places, by Moses remembred, forgotten by those names of all Historian and Geographers, as well ancient as moderne.

Besides, we find that the Assyrians, Babylonians, Medes and Persians (Cyrus onely and a few other excepted) sought to extinguish the Hebrewes. The Grecians hated both their Nation and their Religion; and the Romanes despised once to remember them in any of their Stories. And as those three Monarchies succeeded each other: so did they transforme the names of all those principall Places and Cities in the East: and after them, the. Turke hath fought (what he could) to extinguish in all things; the ancient memorie of those people; which he hath subjected and inthralleds

Now besides those notable markes, Euphrates and Tigris, the better to finde the way which leadeth to the Country of Eden, we are to take for guides these two considerations (to wit) That it lay Eastward from Canaan and Judga; and that it was of all other the most beautifull and fertile. First then in respect of situation, the next Country to Judaa Eastward was Arabia Petraa; but in this Region was Moses himselfe when he wrote: and the next unto it Eastward also was Arabia the Defart, both which in respect of the infertility could not be Eden; neither have any of the Arabians any fuch Rivers, as are exprest to runne out of it: So as it followeth of necessitie, that Eden must be Eastward, and beyond both Arabia Petraa, and Deferta. But because Eden is by Moses named by it self, and by the fertility, & the rivers only described, we must seeke it in other Scrip- to tures, and where it is by the additions of the neighbour Nations better described. In the Prophet Isay I find it coupled and accompanied with other adjacent Countries, in these words, spoken in the person of Senacherib by RABSAKEH: Have the gods of the Nations delivered them, which my Fathers have destroyed, as Gosan, and Haran, & Re-SEPH, and the children of EDEN, which were at Telassar? and in Ezechiel, where he pro-

Caparive [33.] phecieth against the Tyrians: They of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the merchants of Sheaba, Ashur, and Chilmad, were they merchants, &c. But to avoid confusion, we must understand that there were two Edens, one of which the Prophet Amos remembreth, where he divideth Syria into three Provinces, whereof, the first he maketh Syria Damascene, or Decapolitan: the second part is that Valley 20 called Avenis, otherwife Convallis, or the tract of Chamath, where Asyria is joyned to Arabia the Defart, & where Ptolomie placeth the City of Averia: & the third is knowne by the name of Domus Edenis, or Calofyria, otherwise Vallis cava, or the bollow Valley, because the mountaines of Libanus and Antilibanus, take all the length of it on both sides, and border it : for Coele in Greeke is Cava in Latine. But this is not that Eden, which we seeke : neither doth this Province lye East from Canaan, but North, and so joyneth unto it, as it could not be unknowne to the Hebrewes. Yet, because there is a little Citie therein called Paradise, the Jewes believed this Calosyria to be the same which Moses describeth. For the same cause doth Hopkins in his Treatise of Paradise reprehend Beroaldus, in that he confoundeth this Eden, with the other Eden of Paradife, though, to 30 give Beroldus his right, I conceive that he led the way to Hopkins, and to all other later Writers, saving, That he fayled in distinguishing these two Regions, both called Eden: and that he altogether mif-understood two of the source Rivers (to wit) Pison and Gehon, as shall appeare hereafter. Now to finde out Eden, which (as Moses teachethus) lay Eastward from the Defarts, where he wrote, after he had passed the Red Sea; we must consider where those other Countries are found, which the Prophet I say and Exechiel joyneth with it. For (faith E s A I A H) Gosan, Haran, and Re-Ezech 27,023. feph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telassar. Also Ezechiel joyneth Haran with Eden, who together with those of Sheba, Ashur, and Chilmad, were the Merchants that traded with the City of Tyre, which was then (faith EZECHIEL) the Mart of 4 the people for many Isles. And it hath ever beene the custome, that the Persians conveyed their Merchandise to Babylon, and to those Cities upon Euphrates, and Tigris, and from thence transported them into Syria, now Soria, and to the Port of the Mediter. rane Sea: as in ancient times to the Citie of Tyre, afterward to Tripoly, and now to Aleppo, from whence they imbarque them at the Port of Alexandretta, in the Bay of Isicus, now Lajazzo. Ezechiel in the description of the magnificence of Tyre, and of the exceeding trade that it had with all the Nations of the East, as the only Marttowne of that part of the world, reciteth both the people, with whom they had commerce, and also what commodities every Countrie yeelded: and having counted the severall People and Countries, he addeth the particular trade, which each of them ex- 50 ercifed: They were thy merchants (faith the Prophet) in all forts of things, in rayments of blue filke, and of broydered workes, fine linnen corrall, and pearle: and afterwards speaking of the Merchants of Sheba and Raamab, and what kinds they traded, he hath these words: The merchants of Sheba, & Raamah were thy merchants, they occupied in thy Faires, with the chiefe of all Spices, and with all precious stones and gold. Now these be indeed the riches which Persia & Arabia Falix yeeld: and because Sheba & Raamah are those parts of Arabia, which border the Sea, called the Perfian Gulfe, therefore did those Nations both vent fuch Spice, sweet Gummes, and Pearles, as their owne Goungries yeelded:

and (withall) having trade with their Neighbours of India, had from them also all forts of spices, and plenty of gold. The better to convey these commodities to that great Mart of Tyre the Shebans or Arabians entred by the mouth of Tigris, and from the Cirie of Terredon (built or enlarged by Nebuchodono Tor, now called Ballara) thence fenr up all these rich merchandises by boat to Babylon, from whence by the body of Euphrares as farre as it bended Westward, and afterward by a brauch thereof, which reaches be within three dayes journey of Aleppo, and then over Land they past to Tyre, as they did afterward to Tripoly, (formerly Hieropolis) and thence to Alexandretta, as aforefaid. Now the Merchants of Canneh, which Exechiel joyneth with Eden, inhabited farre up the River, and received this trade from Arabia and India, besides those proper commodities which themselves had and which they received out of Persia which bordered them. Saint Hierome understandeth by Canneh, Seleucia, which is feated upon Euphrates, where it breaketh into foure heads, and which tooke that name from Selencus who made thereof a magnificent City. Hierofolymitanus thinkes it to be Ctefiphon: but Ctefiphon is feated downe low upon Tigris, and Canneh cannot be on that fide. I meane on the East-side of Tigris; for then were it out of the Valley of Shinar. Plinie pla-Plinie 0.25 ceth the Schenita upon Euphrates, where the fame beginneth to be foordable, which is toward the border of Syria, after it leaveth to be the bound of Arabia the Defart, and where the River of Euphrates reflecteth from the Defart of Palmirena: for these people of Canneh (afterward Schenita) inhabited both borders of Euphrates, fretching themselves, from their owne Citie of Canneth in Shinar Westward along the bankes of Euphrates, as farre as the City of Thapfacus, where Ptolomy appointed the Foords of Euphrates: which also agreeth with the description of the Schemta by Strabo, whose words are these: Mercatoribus ex Syria Seleuciam & Babyloniam euntibus, iter est per Schenitas . The Merchants which travaile from Syria to Seleucia and Babylon, take their war by the Schenites. Therefore those which take Canneh for Charran, doe much mistake it. For Genas, 363 Charran to which Abraham came from Ur in Chaldae (called by God) frandeth alfo in Mesopotamia, not upon Euphrates it selfe, but upon the River of Chaboras, which falleth into Euphrates : and the Merchants of Charran are distinctly named with those of Canneh in Exechiel (as) They of Haran, & Canneh, and Eden, the merchants of Sheba, Albur and Chilmad were thy merchants. Wherefore Charran, which is fometime called Charreand Haran, and Aran, is but the fame Charran of Mesopotamia; and when it is written Aran then it is taken for the region of Mesopotamia: or Aran fluviorum, the Greeke word (Melopotamia) importing a country betweene rivers: for Melos in Greeke, is Medius in Latine, and Potamos, fluvius; and when it is written Haran or Aran, it is then taken for the City it selfe, to which Abraham came from Ur (as aforesaid.) For Strabe in the description of Arabia, giveth that tract of land from the borders of Coelosyria to the edge of Mesoporamia, to the Schenita, who also inhabited on both sides of Euphrares, and were in after-ages accounted of these Arabians which inhabite Batanea, & the North part of the Defarts, stretching themselves toward the unhabited solitude of Palmirena, which lyeth betweene Syria, and Arabia the Defart. So as these of Canneh lay in the very highway from Babylon to Tyre, and were neighbours (indifferent) to Charran and to Eden: and therefore they are by the Prophet Exechiel coupled together, They of Haran, and Cannels, & Eden, &c. But S. Hierom made a good interpretation of Cannels, or Chalne. by Seleucia: for Seleucia was anciently called Chalanne (witnesse Appear,) and so Rabanus Maurus calleth it in his Commentaries upon Genesis; the name by time and mixture of languages being changed from Chalne or Canneh, to Chalanne : of which name there are two other Cities, standing in Triangle with Seleucia, and almost the next unto it, (as) Thelbe-canne, and Mann-canne, the one a little to the West of Seleucia, and the other o opposite unto it; where these rivers of Tigris and Euphrates are ready to joyne. Therefore, which of these the ancient Canne was, (being all three within the bound of the valley Shinar) it is uncertaine: but it is a note as well of the importance of the place, as of the certaine seate thereof, that so many other cities did retaine a part of the name in so many ages after. Neither is it unlikely, that these additions of Thelbe and Mann to the word Canne, were but to make difference betweenethe Halt and the West, or the greater and the lesse Canne, or betweene Canne the old and the new: which additions to distinguish cities by are ordinary in all the Regions of the World. Now of the other city joyned with Eden, as Haran or Charran, S. Hierom on the Judici

Judges speaketh thereof in these words: Cumq; reverterentur, pervenerunt ad Charran, qua est in medio itinere contra Ninevem, undecimo die When they returned, they came to Charran (which is the mid-way against Nineve) the eleventh day.

This city is by the Martyr Stephen named Charran (speaking to the high Priest:) Tee Men, Brethren, and Fathers, hearken: The God of glory appeared to our Father ABRAHAM, while he was in Mesopotamia, before be dwelt in Charran. But the seateof this city is not doubted of: for it is not onely remembred in many Scriptures, but, withall, exceeding famous for the death and overthrow of Crassus the Romane, who for his unsatiable greedinesse was called Gurges avaritia; The gulfe of avarice. Whereof Lucan.

With Roman bloud th' Affrian Carre he defil'd.

But this city Canne or Chalne is made manifest by Moses himselfe, where it is written of NIMROD: And the beginning of his Kingdomes was Babel, and Erech, and Acad, and Chalne, in the land of Sinaar or Shinar: where Mofes sheweth the first composition of the Babylonian Empire, and what cities and people were fubject unto Nimred, all which lay in the faid Valley of Shinar, or neere it; and this Valley of Shinar is that Tract afterwards called Babylonia and Chaldæa, into which also Eden stretcheth it selfe. Chaldæa, Babylonia, Sinaar, idem funt (faith Comestor.) Three names of one Country: which Region of Babylonia tooke name of the Tower Babel; and the Tower, of the confusion of tongues. And that Shinar was Babylonia, it is proved in the eleventh chapter of Genefis, in these words : And as they went from the East, they found a Plaine in the Land of Shinar, and there they abode : in which Plaine Babylon was built (as aforesaid.)

Now Shinar being Babylonia, and Canneh, in the first beginning of Nimrods greatneffe, and before he had subdued any strange, or far-off Nations being one part of his Dominion, and also named by Moses to be in Shinar, it proveth that Canneh joyneth to Babylonia; which also Ezechiel coupleth with Eden, and (further) affirmeth that those of Eden were also the Merchants which traded with the Tyrians: & Esay in the threates of Senacherib against Jerusalem (with other Nations that Senacharib vaunted that his Fathers had deftroyed) nameth the children of Eden which were at Tel affar. But be-3 fore I conclude where Eden it selfe lyeth, it is necessary to describe those other Countries, which Ezechiel joyneth therewith, in the places before remembred, as, those of Sheba and Raamah. It is written in Genesis the tenth: Moreover the sonnes of HAM were Cush, Gc. And the sonnes of Cush were Seba, and Havilah, and Sabtah, and RAAMAH, &c. And the sonnes of RAAMAH were SHEBA, &c. and anon after; Cush begat NIMROD: foas Sheba was the grand-child of Cufh, and Nimrod the fonne of Cufh, whose elder brother was Sebah: though some there are that conceive to the contrary, that Nimrod was the elder in valour and understanding, though not in time and precedence of birth; who inhabited that part of Shinar, where Babel was built, afterwards Babylonia His brother Raamah or Regma tooke that part adjoyning to Shinar, toward 41 the Sea fide and Perfian gulfe (called afterwards Raama and Sheba, by the Father and his Sonnes, which possessed it.) For (faith Eze CHIEL) the merchants of Raamah and Sheba were thy merchants, they occupied in thy Paires with the chiefe of all spices, and all precious ftones, and gold. So as Sheba was that Tract of Country, which parteth Arabia Deferta from Arabia Fælix, and which joyneth to the Sea where Tigris and Euphrates fall out, & render themselves to the Ocean. This part, and the confining Country, Strabo calleth Catabria, where the best Myrrhe and Frankincense is gathered; which people have an interchange or trade with Elana, lying on the East fide of the Persian gulfe. By this it appeareth who were the Shebeans, spoken of by Ezechiel, and said to have beene the Merchants of Tyre, for gold, spices, and precious stones of which they had not onely 50 plenty of their owne, but were also furnished from that part of India (called Elana, according to Strabo) for exchange of their Aromatiques, and other proper commodities. For, as Strabo reporteth out of Eratosthenes: În Persica ora înitio Infula est, in qua multi & pretiosi uniones gignantur : in aliis vero, clari & perlucidi lapilli. ERATOSTHENES (faith Strabo) affirmeth, that in the beginning of the Persianguife, there is an Island, in which there are many precious pearles bred; and in other, very cleare and shining stones. Now, the difference betweene Sheba, the sonne of Raamah, and Seba, the sonne of Culh, is in this, That Sebais written with the Hebrew (Samech;) and Sheba with (Schiz:)

but what soever the difference may be in the Hebrew Orthography, their Countries and Habitations are divers. For Sheba is that which bordereth the Perfian Sea, and Saba (whence the Queene of Saba) neighboured the Red Sea; and so that place of the 72. Plalme, expounded Reges Arabum & Saba, hath in the Hebrew this fenie: Reges Sheba & Saba.

The Shebans, Exechiel nameth together with the Edenites, because they inhabited upon the Out-let of the same River, upon which the Edenites were seated : and so those of Sheba, towards the Sea-coast, and upon it, past up the Countrey, by Tigris and Euphrates, being joyned in one maine streame, and so through the Region of Eden, which Tigris boundeth, thereby the better to convey their merchandise toward Tyre. And as 10 rhe Cities of Charran, and Canneh, border Eden on the West and North-west : so doth Sheba on the South, and Chilmad on the North-east: Chilmad being a Region of the higher Media, as appeareth in the Chaldwan Paraphrast; which Countrey by the Geographers is called Coromitena, (L) placed by exchange for (R.) which change the Hebrewes also oftenuse.

Thus much of those Countries which border Eden, and who altogether traded with the Tyrians : of which, the chiefe were the Edenites, inhabiting Telassar: for these Senacherib vaunted, that his Fathers had destroyed; and this place of Telassar lay most convenient, both to receive the Trade from Sheba & Arabia, and also to convey it over into Syria, and to Tyrus. Now to make these things the more plaine, we must remember, that before the death of Senacherib, many parts of the Babylonian Empire fell from his obe-

For it appeareth both in Esay the 37. and in the second of Kings, by the threates of Rabfache, the while the Army of Affyrialay before Jerusalem, that the Cities of Gofan, Haran, Refeph, and the Edenites at Telassar, had resisted the Assyrians, though by them (in a fort) mastered and recovered. Have the gods of the Nations delivered Esty 37. Walls them, whom my Fathers have destroyed as Gofan, and Haran, Refeph of the children of Eden. which were at Telassar? But it appeared manifestly after Senacheribs death, that these Nations formerly contending, were then freed from the others subjection: for Elar-30 Haddon held Affyria, and Merodach Baladan, Babylonia. And after that the Army of Se. 2 King 19:35: nacherib, commanded by Rabsache which lay before Jerusalem (Ezechias then reigning) while Senacherib was in Egypt, was by the Angell of God destroyed; the King Elay 39.1. of Babel fent to Ezechias, both to congratulate the recovery of his health, and his vi- E/Ay 37.381 ctory obtained over the Affyrians. After which overthrow, Senacherib himselfe was flaine by his owne fonnes in the Temple of his Idols, Efar-Haddon fucceeding him in Assyria. To the Babylonian Ambassadours sent by Merodach, Ezechias shewed all his Esay 39-23 treasures, aswell proper as consecrate, which invited the kings of Babylon afterward to undertaketheir conquest and subversion. So as, the suspition of warre encreasing betweene Babylon and Affyria, the Edenites which inhabited the borders of Shinar towards the North, and towards Affyria, were imployed to beare off the incursions of the Affyrians; and their Garrison-place was at Telassar: and the very word (Telassar) faith Junius, fignifying as much, as a bulwarke against the Assyrians. This place Hierofolymitanus takes for Resem, others for Seleucia: but this Telassar is the same, which Am. Marcellinus in the History of Julian (whom he followed in the enterprize of Persia) calleth Thilutha in stead of Telassar, who describeth the exceeding strength thereof in his 24. Booke: it is seated in an Island of Euphrates upon a steepe and unassaultable Rocke, in so much as the Emperour Julian durst not attempt it; and therefore it was a convenient place for a Garrison against the Assyrians, being also a passage out of Mesopotamia into Babylonia, and in which the Edenites of the Countrey adjoyning were o lodged to defend the fame. This place Ptolomy calleth Teridata, having Refeph (which After abia) he calleth Resepha) on the left hand; and Canneh, (which he calleth Thelbe-canne) on the right hand; not farre from whence is also found the City of Mann-canne upon Tigris; and all these seated together, as Esay and Ezechiel have sorted them. But the understanding of these places is the more difficult, because Assyria (which the Chaldwans call Atturia) and Mesopotamia, were so often confounded: the one taken for the other by interchange of Dominion. Assyria & Mesopotamia in Babylonia nomen transserunt (faith NIGER,) Affria and Mesopotamia tooke the name of Babylonia. Lastly, it appeareth by comog Asia those adjacent Regions by the Prophets named, in what patt of the World Edenis feated, as, by Charran or Heran in Mesopotamia: also by Canneh and Reseph, according to the opinion of Vatablus, who in these words translateth this place: Plantaverat autem JEHOVAH Deus hortum in Eden, ab Oriente; The Lord God planted a Garden in Eden, Eastward: that is (faith he in his Annotations) Jusserat nasci arbores in Eden, Regione Orientali, in finibus Arabia & Mesopotamia; He commanded Trees to grow in Eden, an Easterne Region in the borders of Arabia and Mesopotamia.

Of divers other testimonies of the Land of Eden; and that this is the Eden of Paradise.

Nd for a more particular pointing out of this Eden, it feemes by the two Epifiles of the Nestorian Christians, that inhabit Mesopotamia, which Epistles in the yeare 1552 they fent to the Pope about the confirming of their Patriarch,& Andraas Masius hath published them, translated out of Syriac into Latine. By these Epistles (I say) it seemes we may have some farther light for the proofe of that, which we have faid about the Region of Eden in those parts. For in them both there is mention of the Island of Eden in the River Tigris, or at least, Tigris in both these Epistlesis called the River of Eden. This Island, as Masius in his Preface to these Epistles saith, is commonly called GoZoria (as it were, the Island, by an eminency.) It hath (faith he) ten miles in circuit, and was sometimes walled round about, which name of the Island 20 Edenmay (doubtlesse) remaine to this day 5 though in the rest of the Region so called, this name be swallowed up, with the fame of those flourishing Kingdomes of Mesopotamia, Affyria, Babylonia, and Chaldra. This Island of Eden hath up the River, and not farre beyond it, the City of Hasan-Cepha, otherwise Fortis Petra: below it, it hath Mofal or Mosel, from which (as in that which followeth it shall appeare out of Massus) it is not above twelve miles distant. Neither is it to trouble us, that Mosal or Mosel, by Marius Niger is remembred among the Cities higher up Tigris, in these words. Juxia autem Tigrim, Civitates sunt Dorbeta prope Taurum montem, que nunc Mosel dicitur; magna sane, &c. (that is) By Tigris are these Cities, Dorbeta neere unto mount Taurus (which is now called Mosel) which is a great one, &c. This opinion of Niger, displacing 30 Mosel, and making it to be Dorbeta (Isay) needs not here to trouble us: seeing for this matter, the testimony of Masius, informed by the Christians that dwelt there (the Seat of whose Patriach it is) ought to be of credit, avowing that this Mosal (or Mozal) is in the Confines of Mcsopotamia and Affyria, seated upon Tigris, and in the neighbour-hood of Nineve; and that it is the famous Seleucia Parthorum. The Nestorian Christians in their former Epistle, call it Attur, in these words : Ex amnibus Civitatibus & pagis qua funt circum Civitatem Mosal (boc est) Attur in vicinia Nineves, Of all the Cities and Townes which are about the Citie of Mozal (that is) Attur in the neighbur-hood of Nineve. As also Niger acknowledgeth Ctefiphon, a City thereabout to be called Affur, (which is the fame as Attur, after the Dialect of those Nations, which change Shinto T.) Neither is it 4 much that he should mistake Ctefiphon, (which is not farre off Seleucia) for Seleucia, to be Assur. By this then we may come somewhat neere the end of our purpose. For the Ile of Eden, which lieth in the breft of Tigris, is but twelve miles from Mofal, & that ancient City, which Ptolomy and Tacitus call Ninus, and the Scriptures Nineve; Phi-Loftratus, and Simeon Sethi, Mosula, and John Lean, Mosal, others Mosse, (though it be not the same with Mosal) is set but a little higher upon the same River of Tigris, neere Mosal: so that we are like to finde this Ile of Eden hereabout. For the sarte Andreas Mafius, which placeth it above Mosal, makes it to be below Hasan-cepha, which is upon the fame River of Tigris.

The onely difficulty is this, that some perhaps may thinke, that the words of the Nestorians in both their Epistles, speake not of any Ilein Tigris, called the Ile of Eden, but of an Ile in Tigris, a River of Eden. But this fense of their words in my opinion seemeth the more unprobable. And yet if this were the meaning here, we have a testimonie from the Learned of those parts, that not onely Euphrates, but also Tigris was a River of Eden, and that the name of Eden in those parts is not yet quite worne out, though the Region hath been subject to the same change, that all other Kingdomes of the world have beene, and hath by conquest and corruption of other Languages, received new and differing names. For the South part of Eden, which stretcheth over Euphrates, was after the floud called Shinar, and then of the Tower of Babel, Babylonia; and the North part of Eden is that Tract of Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Armenia, which imbraceth both the bankes of Tigris betweene Mount Taurus, and Seleucia. And of this Region of Eden that ancient Athicus maketh mention, (not that latter Athicus, Disciple of Gallinicus, otherwise by Plutarch and Athenaus called Istri, who lived in Egypt in the Reigne of Philadelphus; but another of a farre higher and remote time) the fame being made Latine out of the Greeke by Saint Hierome. And though by corruption of the ancient Copie it be written in Aethicus, Adonis for Edenis; yet Adonis being a River of Phanicia, cannot be understood to be the Region named by Athicus. For Athicus makes ita Countrey, and not a River, and joyneth it with Mesopotamia and Athiopia, calling to the land of Chus Aethiopia, after the Vulgar, and Septuagint. And lastly, the River which watereth the Regions, (faith Aethicus) falleth into the Gulfe of Persia: which River he called Armodius, for Tigris; Tigris being but a name imposed for the swiftneffe thereof. And out of Armenia both Tigris and Euphrates have their originall: for out of Eden came a River, or Rivers, to water the Garden, both which Rivers (to wit) Tipris and Euphrates, come out of Armenia, and both of them traverse Mesopotamia. Regions first of all knowne by the name of Eden for their beautie and fertilitie. And it is very probable, that Eden contained also some part of Armenia; and the excellent fer? tilitie thereof in divers places, is not unworthy the name of Eden. For in some part o thereof (faith Strabo) the leaves are alway green, & therefore therein a perpetuall Spring. Also Stephanus deurbibus, mentioneth the Citie of Adana upon Euphrates: and the. name of Eden was in use in Amos time, though he speake not of Eden in the East, but of Eden in Caloffria. But to the end I may not burden the Readers patience with too long a Discourse, it may suffice to know, that Euphrates and Tigris (once joyned together: and afterward separate) are two of those foure heads, into which these Rivers which are faid to water the Garden of Paradife, were divided: whose courses being knowne. Eden (out of which they are faid to come) cannot be unknowne. Now that Hiddekel and Perath were Tigris and Euphrates, it is agreed by all: for the Seventie and all others. convert Perath by Euphrates : & Hiddekel Tigrim omnes exponunt : & all men understand To Hiddekelby Tigris (faith Vatablus.) And because that which I have faid of the Ile of Eden shall not be subject to the censure of selfe-invention, I have heere-under fer downer the words out of the two generall Epiffles of the Nefterians, as Mas ius (ad verbum). hathconverted them into Latine. The occasion of those Letters and Supplications to the Pope, were, that the Nestorian Christians, which inhabit Mesopotamia, Asyria, Persia. Babylonia, and have to this day (at least in Queen Maries time they had) fifteene Churches in one Cirie called Selencia Parthorum, or Mosel upon the River of Tigris; having no sufficient authoritie to choose themselves a Patriarch (which cannot be done without foure or three Metropolitane Bishops at least) sent to the Bishop of Rome, in the yeare of Christ 1552. (as afore-said) a Petition to obtaine allowance unto such an Election as themselves had made: having three hundred yeare before that upon the like defect. fent one Marius thither to be confirmed; and in this negotiation they made knowne to the Bishop of Rome the state of the Christian Church in those parts: for upon the death of their Patriarch (who of a covetous defire to enrich himselfe had forborne to institute Metropolitane Bishops, when the places fell voide) they all assembled them-Selves together to consult of the Church-government. And because all the Patriarchs for an hundred yeares had beene of one House and Family to the prejudice of the Church, and that there yet remained one Bishop of the same Stocke and Kindred, who aspired to the same dignitie which his Predecessors had held, the rest of the Professors refused to allow him. Upon which occasion, and for the choice of a Governour more fufficient, the Teachers in all the Churches affembled themselves. The words of the generall Epistle to the Pope are these about the middle of the said Epistle. Verum nos non acceptavimus neq; proclamavimus ipsum, sed subito convenimus ex omnibus locis Orientalibus, & ex omnibus Civitatibus & Pagis qua sunt circum Civitatem Mosel (hoc est) Attur, in vicinia Nineves, ex Babylonia, ex Charra, ex Arbella, ex Insula qua est in medio Tigris fluminis Eden ex Tauris Persia, ex Nisibi, &c. which is: But we did neither accept of this man neither pronounced him : but suddenly we assembled our selves out of all parts of the East, and out of all the Cities and Villages which are about Mosel (or Attur) neighbouring Nineve, or out of Babylon, Carrha, Arbella, and out of the Iland which lyeth in the middle of Ti-gris, a River of Eden, or rather, out of the Ile of Eden, which lyeth in the River Tigris. And in a second Epistle at the same time sent, they use these words: Neq; supersimit apudnos Metropolita, quorum est ordinare Catholicum, sed soli pauci, Episcopi, Episcopus Arbela, Episcopus Salmasti, Episcopus Adurbeigan; en evestigio convenimus in Insulam, qua est intra Iigrim slumen, Eden, secimus q, compactum internos, &c. (which is) Neither are there remaining among us any Metropolitan Bishops, to whom it belongs to ordaine a Patribere remaining among us any Metropolitan Bishops, to whom it belongs to ordaine a Patriber or but onely a sew Bishops, as the Bishop of Arbela, the Bishop of Salmassus, and the Bishop of Adurbeigan. but lo, we assembled speedily in the Iland Eden, which is in Tigris, and agreed betweene our selves, &c.

Now this Iland of Eden Masius describeth with other places; which being well conceived, the Nestorian Epistles, and the state of the Church may be in those parts (faith he) the better understood. And after he hath distinguished the foure forts of Christians in those parts of the World, and in the South part of Africa, which hee calleth Nesterians, Jacobites, Maronita, and Cophti, he goeth on in these words: Mox audita illius morte, concurrisse aiebant tumultuario in illam quam modò dixi Tigris Insulam, qua duodecim circiter passuum millibus supra Mosal posita, decem ferè millia passuum suo ambitu continet, muris undiq, cineta, & apancis aliis quam Christianis hominibus habitata: which is, Now bearing of the death of the Patriarch, (as those that came to Rome reported) they ran sumultwoully together into that Iland of Tigris or Eden before spoken of, which Iland is situated about twelve miles above Mofal, containing very neere ten miles in compasse, and every 20 where invironed with a wall, inhabited by few other menthan Christians. And afterward he maketh a recapitulation of the Christian Churches; among the rest hee addeth the Ile of Eden by the name of Geferta, Infula Tigris: five Geferta. Furthermore, describing the Citie of Hosan-cepha, or Fortis Petra, he placeth it supra pradictam Tigru Insulam rupi aspera impositam; Above the aforesaid Iland of Tigris, being seated on a steepe Rocke Of this Iland of Geserta, Andrew Thevet maketh mention in his tenth Booke of his generall Cosmographie in these words : Geserta ou Gestre est au milieu de la Riviere du Tigre. & pense que c'est une terre des plus fertiles de toute l'Asie; Geserta or Gesire is in the middle of Tigris, the Soyle the most fertile of all Asia.

By this we see that the ancient name of Eden liveth, and of that Eden which lyeth Eastward from Arabia Petraa, and the Desart where Moses wrote, and that Eden which bordereth Charran according to Ezechiel, and that Eden which is seated according to the affertion of the said Prophet, & joyned with those Nations of Reseph, Canneh, and Charran, and the rest which traded with the Tyrians, and is found at this day in the parting of the two Regions of Assignment and Babylonia, where the Edenites in Thelassa were garrisoned to resist the Assignment, whose displantation Senacherib vaunted of (as above written;) and lastly, the same Eden, which embraceth Tigris, and looketh on Euphrates, two of the knowne Rivers of those foure, which are by all men ascribed to Paradise.

Of the difficultie in the Text, which seemeth to make the foure Rivers to rise from one streams.

It it may be objected, that it is written in the Text, That a River went out of Eden, and not Rivers in the plurall; which scruple Matthew Beroaldus hath thus answered in his Chronologie: The Latine Translation, saith hee, hath these words: Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis ad irrigandum Paradisum, qui inde dividebatur in quatuor capita: Qua verba melius consentient cum rei narratione, & ejus dem explicatione, si it a reddantur. Et fluvius erat egrediens ex Edene, (hoc est) fluvii procedebant ex Edene regione ad rigandum pomarium; & inde dividebatur, & erat in quatuor capita: which is, And River went out of the place of pleasure to water Paradise, and thence was divided into foure heads: Which words (saith Beroaldus) doe better agree with the narration and explication of the place, if they be thus translated: And a River was going forth of Eden (that is) Rivers went forth, and ran out of the Region of Eden to water the Orchard; and from thence it was divided, and they became four heads. The Tigurine differs from the Vulgar or Latine; for it converts it thus: Et sluvius egrediebatur de delicisi; And a River went out of pleasure, in stead of Eden; and the Latine addeth the word logus, or place, Et sluvius egrediebatur deloco voluptatis; And a River went out of the place of pleasure: and so the word (place) may rightly be referred to Eden, which was (of all other) a Region most delightfull and fertile; and so also the word (inde) and thence, was divided, hath reference to the Country of Eden, and not to the Garden it selfer

And for the word (River) for Rivers, it is usuall among the Hebrewes: for it is written: Let the Earth bud forth the bud of the Herbe that feedeth Seede, the fruitfull Tree, &c. Gental Here the Hebrew useth the Singular for the Plurall, Herbe and Tree, for Herbes and Trees; and againe, We cate of the fruit of the Tree, in stead of (Trees:) And thirdly, the man and his wife hid themselves from the presence of God; In medio ligni Paradis; In the middle of the tree of the Garden, for (Trees.) And of this opinion is David Kimeth, and Vatablus, who upon this place of Genesis say, that the Hebrewes doe often put the Singular for the Plurall, as illud, for unumquodq; illorum, and he giveth an instance in this question it selfe, as, A River (for Rivers) went out of Eden.

And this answer out of divers of the Learned, may, not without good reason, bee given to the objection, That Moses speaketh but of one River, from which the heads should divide themselves. Howbeit I deny not, but with as good (and perhaps better) reason, we may expound the four heads, to be four notable passages into samous Countries. And so we may take the word (River) Verse the tenth for one River, (to wit) Euphrates, as this name comprehendeth all the branches thereof. For this River, (after he is pass the place, where we suppose Paradise to have beene, divides it selse, and we get long yeeldeth soure notable passages into severall Countries, though not all the way downess thereof, this is no where in the Text) where it is noted, that following the River downward, there is conveiance into the Countries named in the Text, though part of the way to one of the Countries (to wit, to Assyria) were up Tigris.

To this end the Text speaking of Hiddekel, as it riseth from the River of Eden, doth not fav it compasseth or washeth the whole Region of Assyria, (as it had used this phrase of Pison and Gehon) but that it runneth toward Assyria. The first branch Pison, is Nahar-malcha, (by interpretation) Bafilius, or flumen regium, which runneth into Tigris under Apamia; whence ariseth the name of Pasi-tigris, (as it were) Piso-tigris. This leadeth to the Land of Havila or Susiana. The fecond branch Gehon, is that which o in Historians is Nabarfares or Narragas; for Nahar-ragas: both which names signific flumen derivatum (a River derived,) also Acracanus, quasi Ranosus, by reason of the froggie Fennes which it maketh: this Gehon leadeth to the first seate of Chus, about the borders of Chaldaa and Arabia, and it is lost at length in the Lakes of Chaldaa. The third branch Hiddekel, may be expounded the upper streame of Pison, or Basilius which runneth into Hiddekel, properly so called (that is, into Tigris) above Seleucia, where it sheweth a passage up Tigris into Assyria: where, because at length it is called Hiddekel or Tigris, having before no knowne proper name, the Text in this place callethit Hiddekel from the beginning. The fourth Perath, or Euphrates, fo called perexcellentiam, being the body of the River Euphrates, which runneth through Babylon & Otris. But, be it a River or Rivers, that come out of Eden, feeing that Tigris and Euphrates are noted in the Text, there can be no doubt, but that Paradife was not farre from these Rivers: for that Perath in Moses is Euphrates, there can be no question; and (indeede) as plaine it is that Hiddekel is Tigris. For Hiddekel goeth (faith Mofes) Eastward towards Affur, as we find, that Tigris is the River of Affyria proprie dicta, whose thiefe City was Nineve, as in Genesis the tenth it is written: That out of that Land(to wit) Babylonia, Nimrod went into Affur, and builded Nineve, which was the chiefe City of Affyria.

And as for the kind of speech here used in the Text, speaking of sourcheads thought the heads of Rivers be (properly) their Fountaines, yet here are they to be understood, the heads of Rivers be (properly) their fountaines, yet here are they to be understood, to be spoken of the beginning of their division from the sirft streame. Caput squa (saith ULFIANUS) illude est, unde aqua no scitur, siex fonte na scatur, fons, siex stumine, yet existen, prima initia, &c. If the beginning of the water be out of a Fountaine, then is the Fountaine taken for the head: if out of a Lake, then the Lake; and if from a maine River any branch be separate and divided, then where that branch doth suff bound it selse with new bankes, there is that part of the River, where the branch for saketh the maine streame, called the head of the River.

Of the strange fertilitie and happinesse of the Babylonian Soile, as it is certaine that Eden was such.

T may also be demanded, whether this Region of Eden, by us described, be of fuch fertilitie and beautie, as Eden the feate of Paradife was: which, if it be denied, Then must we also consider, that there was no part of the Earth, that retained that fertilitie and pleasure, that it had before the curse : neither can we ascribe the same fruitfulnesse to any part of the Earth, nor the same vertue to any plant thereon growing, that they had before the floud; and therefore this Region of Edenmay be now no to fuch flourishing Countrey, as it was when it was first created in his perfection. Yet Hood cliadis. this I finde written of it: First, in Herodotus, who was an eye-witnesse, and speaketh of the very place it selfe; for the Ile of Eden is but twelve miles or thereabout from Nineve, and so from Mosal. Ex Euphrate extens in Tigrim, alterum flumen, juxta quod Urbs Ninus sita erat. Hæc regio, omnium quas nos vidimus, optima est, &c. Where Euphrates runneth out into Tigris, not farre from the place where Ninus is feated. This Region of all that we have seene, is most excellent : and he addeth afterward; Cereris autem fruit procreando adeo ferax est, ut nunquam non fere ducenta reddat, &c. (that is) It is so fruitfull in bringing forth Corne, that it yeeleth two hundred fold: The leaves of Wheate and Barley being almost foure fingers broad. As for the beight of Millet and Sesame, they are 20 even in length like unto Trees; which although I know to be true, yet I forbeare to speake bereof, well knowing, that those things which are reported of this fruitfulnesse, will seeme very incredible to those, which never were in the Country of Babylon. They have commonly in all the Country Palme Trees growing of their owne accord, the most of them bearing fruit, out of which they make both Meates, and Wine, and Honey, ordering them as the Figge Trees.

Thus farre Herodotus. To this Palme-tree, so much admired in the East India, Strabo and Niger adde a fourth excellency, which is, that it yeeldeth bread; Ex quibus panem, & mel, o vinum, & acetum conficient , Of which these people make Bread, Wine, Honey, and Vineger. But Anto. nius the Eremite findeth a fift commodity, not inferior to any of those foure, which is, that? from this selfe-same Tree there is drawne a kinde of fine Flaxe, of which people make their garments, and with which in East India they prepare the cordage for their ships. And that this is true, Athanassus in the life of Antonius the Eremite, confesseth, saying: That hereceived a Garment made thereof from the Eremite himselfe, which he brought with him out of this Region. So therefore those Trees, which the East Indies so highly esteeme and so much admire (as indeed the Earth yeeldeth no Plant comparable to this) those Trees (I say) are in this upper Babylon, or Region of Eden, as common as any Trees of the Field. Sunt etiam (faith STRABO) passim per omnem Regionem Palma sua sponte nascentes; There are of Palmes over all the whole Region, growing of their own accord. Of this place Quintus Curtius maketh this report: Euntibus à parte leva A. rabia (odorum fertilitate nobilis) regio campestris interest inter Tigrim & Euphratem, access tam ubere & pingui solo, ut à pasture pelli pecora dicantur, ne satietas perimat; (that is) As you travaile on the left hand of Arabia (famous for plentie of sweets Odours) there lyetha Champaine Countrey placed betweene Tigris and Euphrates, and so fruitfull and fat a soile, that they are (aid to drive their Cattell from pasture, left they should perish by fatiety. Bis in anno segetes Babylonii secant; The Babylonians cut their Cornetwice ayeare (faith Niger.) And as Countries generally are more fruitfull to the Southward, than in the Northerne parts: fo we may judge the excellency of this by that report which Strabo maketh of the South parts of America, which is the North border of Eden, or a part thereof. His words be these in the Latine: Tota enim hac regio frugibus & arboribus as bundat mansuetis, itemq; semper virentibus; This Region aboundet hwith pleasant fruits, & Trees alwayes greene: which witneffeth a perpetuall Spring, not found elsewhere butin the Indies onely, by reason of the Sunnes neighbourhood, the life and stirrer up of Nature in a perpetuall activity. In briefe, so great is the fertility of the ground, that the people are constrained twice to mow downe their Corne fields, and a third time to eate them up with Sheepe: which husbandry the Spaniards wanting in the Valley of Mexico, for the first forty yeares, could not make our kind of Wheate beare feed, but it grew up as high as the Trees, and was fruitlesse. Besides, those fields are altogether without weedes (faith Pling) who addeth this fingularitie to that foyle, That the fecond years the Pling Not bill. very stubble (or rather falling downe of the seedes againe) yeeldeth them a harvest of 68.8.27 corne without any further labour : his words are these, Ubertatis tanta sunt, ut sequenti anno (bonte restibilis fiat seges.

> 6. XIII. Of the River Pison, and the land of Havilah.

Fter the discoverie of Eden, and the testimonies of the fertilitie thereof, it restets to prove that Pison and Gehon are branches of Tigres and Euphrates: For that the knowledge and certaintie of these two Rivers should trouble so many wise men, ir is strange to me, seeing necessitie it selfe (Tigris and Euphrates being knowne) findeth them out: for Euphrates, or Tigris, or both, be that River or Rivers of Eden, which was ter Paradife; which river or rivers Mofes witneffeth afterward divided into foure heads. whereof the one is called Pifon, the other Gehon &c. Could there be a stranger fancie in the world, than when we find both thefe (namely) Tigris and Euphrates in Affyria and Mesopotamia, to seeke the other two in India and Egypt, making the one Ganges, and the other Nilus! Two rivers as farre distant as any of fame knowne or discovered in the world: the Scriptures making it so plain, that these Rivers were divided into source branches, and with the Scriptures, Nature, Reason, and Experience bearing witnesse. There is no errour, which hath not some slipperie and bad foundation, or some appearance of probabilitie, refembling truth, which when men (who studie to be singular) finde out. straining reason according to their fancies) they then publish to the world matter of contention and jangling; not doubting but in the variable deformitie of mens minds, to find some partakers or sectators, the better by their helpe to nurse and cherish such

But this mistaking (and first for the River of Fifon) seemeth to have growne out of the not-diffinguishing of that Region in India, called Havilah, from Havilah which adjovneth to Babylonia, afterward known by the name of Susiana. For Havilah upon Tigris to tooke name from Havilah the Jonne of Cush; and Havilah in India, from Havilah the fonne of Tottan; the one remembred by Moses in the description of Paridise, the other Genzonia where Moses setteth downe the generations of Noah, and his sonnes after the Floud. For the fonnes of Cush were Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, and Raamah; and the fonnes of Tottan were Ophir, and Havilah &c. of which latter (to wit) of Ophir and Havilah the fonnes of Jostan, that Iland of Ophir, (whence Salomon had gold) and Havilah adjoyning, had 10.29 their names. Now because Ganges is a great and a famous river of the East India, and Havilah a Country of the fame, and is fituated upon Ganges, hence it came that Ganges was taken for Pifon, which river is faid by Mofes to water the land of Havilah. Or per- 2.256 haps it was supposed that those foure rivers named by Moses, must of necessitie be foure of the greatest in the world; whence (supposing that Ganges was the next great and famous river after Tigris and Euphrates) they chose out this River to make one of the foure. And yet certainly there is another River, whom in these respects they should rather have chosen than Ganges: for the River Indus on this fide India, for beauty, for necreneffe, and for ability, giveth no way place to Ganges, but exceedeth it in all. And how can any reasonable man conceive, that Ganges can be one of the source heads, seeing Indus commeth betweene it and Tigris? and betweene Tigris and Indus is all that large Empire of Persia, confisting of many Kingdomes. And againe, farther towards the East, and beyond Indus, are all those ample Dominions of India intra Gangem, which lie betweenethose two proud Rivers of Indus and Ganges, now called the Kingdome of Mogor. So as if Indus be not accounted for any of the foure, because it is removed from Tigris by all the breadth of Persia, then how much lesse Ganges, which falleth into the Ocean, little leffe than fortie degrees to the Eastward of Indus? Surely, who loever readeth the Storie of Alexander, shall finde, that there is no River in Asia, that can exceede Indus. For Hydashis was of that breadth and depth, as Alexander thereon in great Gallies transported himselfe, and the greatest part of his armie, and in sayling downe that branch of Indus, found it so large and deepe, and by reason thereof so great a billow, as it endangered his whole Fleet, which was ready to be fwallowed up therein: Hyda-Dis (as aforefaid) being but one of many branches of ludus, comparable to it, and as great as it, having befides this, the Rivers of Coas, of Suaftus, Acefines, Adris (otherwife) Hirotis, Hispalis, and Zaradus, all which make but one Indus, and by it are swallowed up with all their Children and companious, which being all incorporated and made one streame, it crosseth athwart Asia, and then at Cambaia visiteth the Ocean Sea.

Gen. 2 15.

Bur because Pison, which compasseth Havilah, as also Gehon, which watereth Cush, must fome-where be joyned with the rest in one body, or at least be found to proceede out of the same Country of Eden, out of which the other two heads doe proceede; out of doubt they cannot either the one or the other, be Ganges, or Nilus: for Nilus rifeth in the uttermost of the South, and runneth Northward into the Mediterran Sea; and the River Ganges riseth out of the Mountaine Imaus, or (as others will have it) Caucasus, to which divides the Northren Scythia from India, & runneth from North to South into the Indian Ocean. And as for Perath and Hiddekel (that is, Euphrates and Tigris) the one of them is begotten in Armenia, neere Georgiana or Iberia, the other is not farre off in the fame Armenia, by the Gorgiean Mountaines; fo as Ganges, who onely travaileth in her owne India, and Nilus through Athiopia and Egypt, never faw the land of Eden, or joyned themselves in one channell, either with themselves, or with either of the other ; and therefore could not at any time from thence be separated, or divided into source heads or branches, according to Moses.

Gen. 2. V.12.

Therefore the River Pilon, which enricheth Havilah, is the fame which by joyning it selfe with Tigris, was therefore called Pig-tigris, or Pifo-tigris, of Pifon and Tigris, which 20 River watereth that Havilab, which Havilab the sonne of Culh gave name unto, and not Havilah of India, so called of Havilah the Sonne of Jottan, who inhabited with his brother Ophir in the East. And this Havilah of the Culhites had also Gold, Bdellium, and the Onyx stone. This Bdellium is a Tree of the bignesse of an Olive, whereof Arabia hath great plenty, which yeeldeth a certaine Gum sweet to smell to, but bitter in taste, called also Bdellium. The Hebrewes take the Load-stone for Bdellium. Beroaldus affirmeth, that Bdela in Hebrew fignifieth Pearle: fo doth Eugubinus; and Hierome calls it Oleaster: be it what it will, a tree bearing Gum or Pearle: Havilah or Susiana hath plenty of both. Now this Countrie of Susiana or Havilah stretcheth it selfe towards the North as far as the Altars of Hercules, and from thence imbraceth all the Tract of Land 30 Southward, as farre as the Persian Gulfe, on the East side thereof : from which East side had the Shebans (which traded with the City of Tyre according to Ezekiel) their great plenty of gold; which Strabo also wirnefleth, as was shewed before. The Greekes had a conceit, that Pison was Danubius : the Rabbins take it for Nilus.

Aben-EZra (faith Hopkins) out of Rabbi Saadia, translateth Pifen into Nilus: But Nilus findeth the same impossibility that Ganges doth : and Danubius hath the Sea of Hellespont and all Asia the lesse betweene it and Tigris. Now Pison, which runnerh through Hawildh or Susiana, doth to this day retaine some signe of this name; for where it and Tigris embraceth each other under the Citie of Apamia, there doe they agree of a joynt and compounded name, and are called Pifo tigris. And it is strange unto me, that from p fo great antiquitie there should be found remaining any resembling sound of the first name: for Babylon it selfe, which dwelleth so neere these Rivers, is by some writers knowne by the name of Bandas, as, by Postellus: by Castaldus, of Balduch: by Barius, of Bagdad; and of Boughedor, by Andrew Thever; and yet all those that have lately feene it, call it Bagdet. To this River of Pifon, Ptolomie indeede with many others give the name of Basilius or Regius, and Gehon they terme Mahar-sares, and Marsias, and Baarsares. So is Euphrates, neere the Spring and Fountaine, by Strabo and Plinie called Pixirates: by Junius, Puckperah, out of the Hebrew (that is) The profusion, or comming forth of Euphrates: where it breaketh through, the Mountaine Taurus, it takes the name of omy ra. Plutarch calls it Medus and Zaranda: the Hebrewes Parath, (faith Ar. Montanus:) 50 Pagninus, Perath: Josephus, Phorab; Eusebius, ZoZimus: Ammianus, Chalymicus: Gifilanus, and Colinatius terme it, Cobar: which Ezechiel calleth Chebar; but this is but a branch of Euphrates. The Affirians know it by the name of Armalchar, or Nahor Malcha: but now commonly it is called Frat.

Afice tab.4.

The same confusion of names hath Tigris, as Diglito, and Diglath, Seilax, and Sollax: of the Hebrewesit was called Hiddekel: now of the inhabitants Tegil.

But Mercer upon Genesis conceiveth rightly of these Rivers: for Euphrates and Tigris (faith he) streame into soure branches; two of which keepetheir ancient names, and the other two are called Pison and Gehon. The reason, why these two rivers joyned in one (below Apamia) lose their names and are called Pisteries, and the memorie of Euphrates extinguished, is, because the best part of Euphrates running through the channell of Gehon, finketh into the Lakes of Chaldren not farre from Ur, the Citie of Abraham and fall not intirely into the Perfian Sea, as Tigris, accompanied with Pifon doth.

This errour that Pilon was Ganges, was first broched by Josephus, (whose fields. though they be fertile, yet are they exceeding full of weedes) and other men(who take his authoritie to be fufficient in matter of description, whereupon depended no other important consequence) were not curious in the examination thereof. For Epiphanius. Augustine, and Hierome, take this for currant; whereof it followed, that as Pison was transported into the East India, to find out Havilah: so was Gehon drawne into Africas to compasse Æthiopia. But if Havilah, whereof Moses speaketh in the description of Paradife, befound to be a Region, adjoying to Babylon on the one fide, and Cuffi (which is falfly interpreted Æthiopia) fastened to it on the other side, we shall not need then to worke wonders (that is) to impose upon menthe transportation of rivers from one end of the world to the other, which (among other uses) were made to transport men Now it was in the Valley of Shinar, where culb the some of Ham first sate downer with his fonnes Shebah, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Nimrod, &c. and of Havilah, the fonne of Culb, did that Region take name, which Pison compasseth; and the land (called Cust) which Gehon watereth, tookename of Cush himselfe. For as the sonnes of Jostan Ophin and Havilah, feated themselves as neere together as they could in India, so did the sons of Culb in Shinar, or Babylonia, where Nimrod built Babel: for Havilab or Chavilab was first Chusea of Cush; then Chusa, Susa, and Susana.

From this Havilah unto the Defarts of Sur, did the Ifraelites and Amalekites poffeffe all the interjacent Countries: for Saul fmote the Amalekires from Havilah to Sur: 1 Samis 5. which Sur, the Chaldwan Paraphrast converteth Hagra, and Hagra bordereth the red Sea, But this was not meant from Sur upon the Red Sea, to Havilah in the East India: for Sanl was no fuch travailer or Conquerour, and therefore Havilah must be found neerer home, where the fonnes of Ismael inhabited, and which countrie Saul wasted: for Amalec and the Amalekites possest that necke of Countrie, betweene the Persian Sea, and the Red Sea; Havilah being the extreme of the one towards the East, and Sur of the other, towards Egypt and the West, leaving that great body of Arabia falix towards the South, and they spread themselves with the Midianites and Edumæans, from the East part, or backefide of the Holie Land, to the bankes of Euphrates; compri-fing the best part of Arabia Petraa and Deserta.

Of the River Gehon and the Land of Cush, and of the ill translating of Athiopia, for Cush, 2 Chino N. 21.16.

TOw, as Havilali in the East India drew Pilon so farre out of his way thither, so I say did Cush (being by the Seventie translated Æthiopia) force Gehon into Africa. For Cushbeing taken for Æthiopia by the Greekes, whom the Latines followed, Gehon consequently was esteemed for Nilus. But Æthiopians are as much as blackeor burnt faces, whose proper Countrie called Thebaides, lyeth to the Southward seemore of of all Egypt. And although there be many other Regions of Æthiopians, and farre this point, South in Africa, yet those of Thebaides are those so often remembred in the Egyptian 67.5.14. stories, and out of which Nation they had many times their Kings of Egypt: all which Athiopians are very neere, or else directly under the Equinochall line, which is very far from that land inhabited by the Chusites; who are neither black of colour, nor in any fortneighbouring Torrida Zona. But this translation of the Septuagint, Pererius doth qualifie in this manner: There are (faith he) two Æthiopia's, the East, and the West: and this division he findeth in Strabo, out of Homer. Now because there is no colour to make Chus Æthiopia in Africa, Pererius will make Chush and the land of the Chusites (which is Arabia Petras, and a part of Arabia the Happy, with the Region of Madian) to be the East Æthiopia.

Now if it be granted, that Chushand the land of the Chusites be that tract from Sur to Havilah, according to the Scriptures: Habitavit Is MAII ab Havilah ufg; Sur, qua refricit Genzia) Ægyptum

Agyptum introcuntibus Affyrios; Ismael dwelt from Havilah unto Sur, that is, towards Egypt, as thou goest toward Affyria. The same sufficeth to prove that Gehon cannot be Nilus, but a River which watereth Cush, and not Æthiopia. But this place of Scripture, Habitavit Ismael, &c. hath this sense: Ismael dwelt from Havilah, which is the way of Affyria, or the Countrey bordering Affyria; and Sur, which lyeth toward Egypt, which is as much to fay, as, The iffues of Ismael (whereof there were twelve Princes) whom God had promifed to make a great people, inhabited allthose Regions betweene the border of Egypt and Assyria. And that they were (according to the Word of God) fo increased and multiplyed, it well appeared, when Zearab the Chusite, which others call Tharantha, brought an Armie of ten hun- 10 dred thousand against Asa King of Juda. Which Armie came not out of Æthiopia beyond Egypt; for that had bin a strange progresse for such a multitude, as ten hundred thousand, having so mightie a King as the King of Egypt, betweene Pa-Læstina and Æthiopia. But these were the Chusites, Amalekites, Madianites, Ismaelites, and Arabians. For it is written, that after Afa (strengthened by God) had defeated this world of an Armie, he in following his victory tooke some of the Cities of King Zearah round about, as Gerar. Now that Gerar is a Citie of the Æthiopians, it cannot be suspected: for these be the wordes of the Scripture disproving it: And ABRAHAM departed thence toward the South Countrey, and dwelt betweene Cadesh and Sur, and sojourned in Gerar: Now Sur is that part, upon which Moses and the Israelites 20 first set their feete after they passed the Red Sca, where the Amalekites in Rephidim set on them, supposing that they had beene wearie, and unable to resist. Againe, in the Rory of Isaac it is written: Wherefore Is A A C went to A B I M E L E C H, and the Philistims unto Gerar: and I am sure Abimelech and the Philistims were no Æthiopians. And lastly, Moses himselfe, where he describeth the bounds of Canaan, hath these words: Then the border of the Canaanites was from Sydon, as thou commest to Gerar: for Sydon was the frontier of Canaan towards the North, and Gerar by Gazah towards the South But indeed, how foever Pererius doth with an honest excuse salve his translation of Chus for Æthiopia, yet it appeareth plainely, that the Septuagint and Josephus did altogether misunderstand this place. And first, for Homers East and West Æthiopia, 30 they are both found elsewhere: For Plinie in his fift Eooke and eight Chapter, citeth Homer for an Authour of these two Æthiopia's. But the East Æthiopia is that which compasseth Nilus to the South of Egypt, and is the South border thereof; now a part of the Empire of the Abysfines, under Prester John; And the West Æthiopia is that, which joyneth it selfe with the River Niger, which we call Senega & Gambra : tor thereabout are these Æthiopians called Perorsi, Daratites, with divers other names, which Plinie numbreth. But all thefe are in Affrica, and beyond the Defarts thereof, faith Plinie out of Homer, Agrippa, and Juba: which Regions indeede (I meane that of Niger, and that of Prester John; and the Troglodytes) lye due East and West. But as for Cush and the Region of the Ismaelites, &c. they are extended direct. Iv North from that Æthiopia, which is beyond Egypt. Now, that Fofephus was exceeding groffe herein, it appeareth by that fiction, which he hath of Moles when he Served Pharao, in the warres against the Æthiopians : for in that (to make Chus, Æthiopia) he transporteth Madian by miracle over the Red Sea, and beyond all Egypt, and setteth it in Æthiopia, as shall be shewed more at large in the Chapter of the Worlds Plantation. Againe, that Gehon was improperly translated Nilus, Pererius confesseth, and layeth it rather to the corruption of the Greeke Copie, than otherwise And whereas the Septuagint have converted this place of the Prophet Hieremie; And what hast thou now to doe in the way of Egypt, to drinke the water of Nilus ? Quid tibi vis in via Egypti, ut bibas aquam Gebon? to this faith Pererius, profecto Hebraice ibi non est vox Gehon, sed Sicher, qua significat nigrum & turbidum; Truely (faith Pererius) the word Gehon in this place, is not found in the Hebrew, but Sichor, which fignifieth blacke and troubled water. Ex.2.21.6.2.

Furthermore, this is a manifest and unanswerable argument, that Chus was ill taken for Æthiopia. Moses married the daughter of Jethro, Prince and Priest of Madian, whom both the Greeke and Latine call a Madianite, and not Ethiopiffam, as (with Josephus) the Geneva converts it, though it helpe it a litle with a marginall note. Now it is without dispute, that Zipporah was of the Country of Madian, which is that part of

Arabia Petraa, bordering the Red Sea; for it is written in the fecond of Exodus; that Mos Es fled from Pharao into the Land of Madian, and fat downe by a Well, or and perfect againe in the third of Exodus; When Moses kept the sheepe of JETHRO his father in law, Version Priest of Madian, &c. Indeede, these foure nations are every where mixt in the Scriprures, because they dwell confusedly together (to wit) the Madianites, the Ismaelites, the Amalekites and the Chusites, which were all in one generall word, Arabians, and in the Scriptures fometimes called by one of these names, and sometimes by another; as in Gen. 27. v. 25. 27. & 28. that Joseph was fold to the Ismaelites; and in the same Chapter v. 26. it is written, that the Madianites fold Joseph to Potiphar, Pharao's Steward. The Genevians, in a marginal note (to avoid this confounding of the Nations) fave that Moles wrote according to their opinion, who tooke the Madianites and Ismaelites to be all one. But Moles wrote not after any mans opinion; he wrote the truth, and these were all Arabians: & so in this very place it appeareth by their merchandise, which they brought with them, when they bought Joseph: for their Camels were loden with Spicery, and Gen. 37. 25 Balme, and Myrrhe, which are the trades of Arabia fælix: from whence chiefly, and from the East India, all the World is ferved with Myrrhe and Frankincense; and their fpices they received from the East fide of the Arabian Gulfe, as aforesaid. And in the 39. Chav.it is faid: That Potiphar bought Joseph of the Ismaelites; which the Chaldwan Paraphrast in the same place calleth Arabians. Now, to make this the more mainfest, it is Vessas written in the fixt of Judges, That when Ifrael had fowne, then came up the Madianites. and the Amalekites, and they of the East, and came upon them: they of the East, were Vol3: Arabians of the Defart; fo as where before in the buying of Joseph, the Madianites and the Ismaelites were confused, here the Madianites and Amalekites are made one nation. For in the profecution of the Story of Gedeon, the Madianites onely are named, as com- cap.7, prehending both Nations; and in the eight Chapter, v. 24. these Nations are all called Timaelites, and neither Madianites nor Amalekites. As when Gedeon defired, that every man would give him the golden eare-rings, which they had taken after the victory apainst Zebah and Zalmunna, Kings of Arabia, amounting to 1700. shekles of gold, it is written: For they had golden eare rings, because they were Ismaelites. And these Ismae cs. v. 24: elites were a great and valiant Nation, and ever in action of warre. Manus ejus contra Guacage omnes, or manus omnium contra eum; His hand (faith God of Ismael) shall be against all men, and every mans hand against him. Of these Ismaelites come the Mahometan Arabians, though fome Writers thinke Mahomet to be of the Schenita. And these Ismaelites. which inhabite chiefly in Cedar, and the Defarts of Sur and Pharan (faith Josephus) use poyfon upon their Arrowes, as the Indians doe. Towards the South-east are the Madianites, and Chusites: and beyond them, towards the Desarts of Arabia, the Amalekites; and all are one Nation, and all Arabians. Lastly, the ill translation of Æthiopia for Chus, is among other places, made most apparent, in the second of Chronicles, in these words. So the Lord stirred up against JEHORAM 2010,21,25. the first of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine the Athiopians; so Hierom reades it: the Geneva translation hath it, which were besides the Æthiopians. Now how farre it is off betweene the Philistines and the Negro's or the Æthiopians, every man that looketh in a Map may judge. For the Philiftines and Arabians doe mixe and iovne with the Land of the Chufites, and are diffant from Æthiopia about two and thirtie, or three and thirtie degrees, and therefore not their next neighbours, but all Egypt, and the Defart of Sur and Pharan, are between them. So as this place of the second of chronicles, should have beene translated in these words: So the Lord stirred up against Jehoram, the spirits of the Philistins, and the Arabians, which confine and border upon the Chusites, Who indeed are their next neighbours. * Nulla superest dubitatio quin Libiopia in Sacris "Steuch Eno literis sit Arabia propinqua There remaineth no doubt (faith Steuchius) but Æthiopia in gubin Gen. 6,24 the Scriptures is taken for that Countrey, which joyneth to Arabia.

Now, may we thinke, is it probable, or possible, that Moles could be ignorant of Ni-No he knew it, no living man so well, and therefore would never have named Gehon for Nilus, or Nilus, for Gehon- Surely, if Moles had meant Nilus, when hee named Gehon, he would have called the River (into which he was cast upon Reeds, and preserved by God, working compassion in the Daughter of Pharas)a River of Egypt, where-Egota: in he was borne and bred, and wrought fo many miracles. Befides, the River of Nilus is often named in the Scriptures, but never by the name of Gehon. And if Mofes had told the Ifraelites, that Nilus had beene a River of Paradife, they might justly have thought, that he had derided them: for they had lived there all dayes of their lives, and found no fuch Paradife at all nor any memory, or speech thereof; except we shall believe the Paradise of Hesperides, where (faith Plinie) there was nothing found in his time, but wilde Olives in stead of golden Apples. But Nilus is twice called Sichor, once in Isay, and once in the Prophet Jeremie; and yet in those places it is not said to be a River of Athiopia, but of Egypt. For in a word, the Israelites had never any communion or affaires with the Æthiopians, nor any intelligence, or trade, beyond Egypt, to the South; but the Enemies which they had on the South, and East parts, were these Nations of the Chufites, Philiftines, Ifmaelits, Amalekites and Madianites: who being often governed to by many little Kings, or Reguli, were diffinguished in names, according to the Fathers or heads of those Nations; but in one generall name were all Arabians. On the North fide of Canaan, they were afflicted with the Coelofyrians, with the Magogians, Tubalines, and others their adherents, and thirdly within themselves, the Nations, which remained of the ancient Canaanites, held the strongest Cities upon the Sea-coast (as Tyre, Sidon, Acon, Gaza, and many others: yea, Jerufalem it selfe was with-held from Ifrael (from the dayes of Moses, even unto the time of David) by the Jebusites.

That which now remaineth of most difficultie, is, that it doth not appeare, that any part of Gehon watereth that part of Arabia the stony, which the Chusites inhabited in the times of the Kings of Israell: and in this Defart it was that Matt. Beroaldus loft himselfe, in feeking out Paradife: for he was driven (to my understanding) to create two Rivers, and call them Gehon, and Pifon; to the end that the one might water Chus, and theother Havilah; for I find none such in rerum natura, as he hath described: by which Rivers

he also includeth within Paradise, even Arabia the Defart.

And as he well proved that Pifon was not Ganges, nor Gehon, Nilus; fo where to find them else-where it feemeth he knew not. Certainely this River of Gehon, which he maketh to fall into the Mediterran at Gaza, and whose Springs he findeth farre East in Arabia, is but imaginary: for the Current by Gaza is but a small streame, rising betweene it and the Red Sea, whose head from Gaza it selfe is little more than twentie English miles, as shall appeare hereafter. But questionlesse, hence it comes that many were mis-19 taken. They all confidered of the habitations of the Chusites, as they were planted when the state of Israel stood, and when it flourished, being then their neere Neighbours, and never looked backe to the first seates and plantation of Chus. For after the Floud, Chus and his Children never refted, till they found the Valley of Shinar, in which, and neere which himselfe, with his sonnes, first inhabited. Havilab tooke the River-side of Tigris chiefly on the East, which after his owne name he called Havilah, (now Susiana:) Raamah, and Sheba farther downe the River, in the entrance of Arabia foelix. N I M R O D feated himselfe in the best of the Valley, where he built Babel, whereof that Region had afterwards the name of Babylonia. Chus himlelfe and his brother Mizraim first kept upon Gehon, which falleth into the Lakes of Chaldra, and in processe of time, and as as their people increased, they drew themselves more Westerly towards the Red or Arabian Sea: from whence Mizraim past over into Egypt, in which Tract the Chustes remained for many yeeres after. Now because there could be no such River sound in Arabia the stonic, which they might entitle Gebon, they translated Chus, Athiopia; and Gehon, Nilus. And if we doe examine this mistaking by example, we shall the better perceive it as it was. For let us suppose, that Brute, or whosoever else that first peopled this Iland, had arrived upon the River of Thames, and called the Iland at ter his name Britannia, it might be faid that Thames or Tems was a River that watered Britannia: and when afterwards in processe of time, the same Brite had also difcovered and conquered Scotland which he also intituled by the same name of Brian-5. mia, after ages might conclude that Scotland was no part thereof, because the River of Tems is not found therein. Or let us suppose that Europa, the Daughter of the King Herotline 4. Of Tyre in Phanicia, gave the name to Europe, according to Herodotus, and that the first discoverers thereof arrived in the mouth of the River in Thrace, which then watered as much of Europe, as he first discovered, shall we in like fort resolve that France, Spaine, and Italie, &c. are no parts of Europe, because that River is not found in them, or any of them ! in like manner was it faid by Moses in his description of Gehon, that it watered the whole Land of Chus; but not the whole Land which the Chalites should or might in future time conquer, people, and inhabit, seeing in after-ages they became Lords of many Nations, and they might (perchance) have beene Masters in time, (as the Saracens, which came of them, were) of a great part of the world. For, though the Babylonian Empire, which tooke beginning in Nimrod the some of Chus, confisted at the first but of soure Cities, (to wit) Babel, Erech, A. cad, and chalne; yet we find, that his Successours within a few yeares after, commanded all the whole World in effect: and the fame of Babel confirmed the memorie of Chusea. For of this Tower of Confusion did all that Land take the name of Babylonia: and the greatnesse of that Empire, founded by Nimroda yonger sonne, obscured the name and nation of his father Culb in those parts untill they crept farther off, and in places not yet entituled, and farther from the Babylonian Empire, where the Chusites retained their names, which also they fastned to the Soile and Territorie by themselves afterwards inhabited and held. And we may not thinke, that Chus or any of his, could in hafte creepe through those defart Regions, which the length of 130 yeares after the Floud had (as it were) fortified with Thickets, and permitted every Bush and Bryar, Reede and Tree to joyne thermselves (as it were) into one maine body and Forrest. For if we looke with indgement and reason into the Worlds plantation, we shall finde, that every Family seated themselves as neare together as possible they could; and though necessitie enforced them after they grew full of people, to spread themselves, and creepe out of Shinar or Babylonia, yet did they it with this advice, as that they might at all times refort and fuccourone another by River, the fields being then (without all doubt) impaffable. So Nimred, who out of wit and strength usurped dominion over the rest, sate downe in the very confluence of all those Rivers, which watered Paradise : for thither it was to which the greatest troupes of Noahs children repayred; and from the same place whence Mankind had his beginning from thence had they againe their increase. The first Fatherof Men Adam, had therein his former habitation. The second Father of Mankind Noab, began from thence his dispersion.

Now as Nimred the youngest, yet strongest, made his choice of Babel (as aforefaid) which both Tigris and Euphrates cleansed and enriched; so did Havilah place to himselfe upon Pifo-Tigris: Rasmah and his sonne Sheba farther downe upon the fame River, on the Sea-coast of Arabia: Chus himselfe upon Gebon, the fairest branch of Euphrates. And when they began to spread themselves farther off, yet they alwayes fastened themselves to the Rivers sides: for Ninive, Charran, Resept, Cannet, Urin Chaldaa, and the other first-peopled Cities, were all founded upon these navigable Rivers, or their branches, by which the one might give fuccour and affiftance to the other.

&XV. A conclusion by way of repetition of something spoken of before.

Dut now to conclude this dispute, it appeares that ome by the testimonies of the Scriptures, that Paradise was a place created by God, and a part of this our Earth and habitable World, seated in the lower part of the Region of Eden, afterward called Aram fluviorum, or Mesopotamia, which taketh into it also a portion of Shinar and Armenia: this Region standing in the most excellent temper of all other, (to wit) 35. degrees from the Aquinoctiall, and 55. from the North-pole: in which climate the most excellent Wines, Fruits, Oyle, Graine of all forts, are to this day found in abundance. And there is nothing that better proveth the excellency of this faid foile and temper, than the abundant growing of the Palme-trees, without the care and labour of 50 man. For wherein foever the Earth, Nature, and the Sunne can most vaunt, that they have excelled, yet shall this Plant be the greatest wonder of all their workes: this Tree alone giveth unto man whatsoever his life beggeth at Natures hand. And though it may be faid, that these Trees are found both in the East and West Indies, which Gountries are also blessed with a perpetual Spring and Summer, yet, lay downe by those pleasures and benefits the fearefull and dangerous Thunders and Lightnings, the horrible and frequent Earthquakes, the dangerous diseases, the multitude of venimous Beasts and Wormes, with other inconveniences; and then there will be found no comparison betweene one and the other.

Whatother excellencies this Garden of Paradise had, before God (for mans ingratitude and crueltie) curfed the Earth, we cannot judge; but I may fafely thinke, that by how much Adam exceeded all living men in perfection, by being the immediate workemanship of God, by so much did that chosen and particular Garden exceede all parts of the Univerfall World, in which God had planted (that is) made to grow the Trees of Life, of Knowldge; Plants onely proper, and becomming the Paradife, and Garden

The fumme of all this is; That whereas the eyes of men in this Scripture have beene dimme-fighted (some of them finding Paradise beyond our knowne World: some, above the middle Region of the Ayre: some, elevated neere the Moone: others, as 10 farre South as the Line, or as farre North as the Pole, &c.) I hope that the reader will be fufficiently fatisfied, that these were but like Castles in the Aire, and in mens fancies, vainely imagined. For it was Eastward in Eden (faith Moses) Eastward, in respect of Judæa, that God planted this Garden; which Eden we find in the Prophets where it was, and whereof the name (in some part) remaineth to this day. A River went out of Edento water this Garden, and from thence divided it felfe into foure branches; and we find that both Tigris and Euphrates swimming through Eden, doe joyne in one, and afterward taking wayes apart, doe water Chus and Havilah, according to Moses, the true feats of Chus and his Sonnes then being in the Valley of Shinar, in which Nimrod built Babel. That Pison was Ganges, the Scripture, Reason, and experience teach the 20 contrary: for that which was never joyned, cannot be divided; Ganges, which inhabiteth India, cannot be a branch of the Rivers of Eden. That Gehon was Nilus, the fame distance maketh the same impossibilitie; and this river is a greater stranger to Tigris and Euphrates, than Ganges is: for although there are betweene Tigris and Ganges above foure thousand miles, yet they both rise in the same quarter of the World; but Nilus is begotten in the Mountaines of the Moone, almost as farre off as the Cape of good hope, and falleth into the Mediterran Sea: and Euphrates distilleth out of the Mountaines of Armenia, and falleth into the Gulfe of Persia: the one riseth in the South, and travaileth North: the other riseth in the North, and runneth South, threescore and three degrees the one from the other. In this leafe following, I have added a Chorographicall de-30 scription of this terrestrial Paradise, that the Reader may thereby the better conceive the preceding Discourse; and this is the reward I looke for, that my labour may but receive an allowance suspended, untill such time as this description of mine be reproved by a better.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the two chiefe Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

6. I.

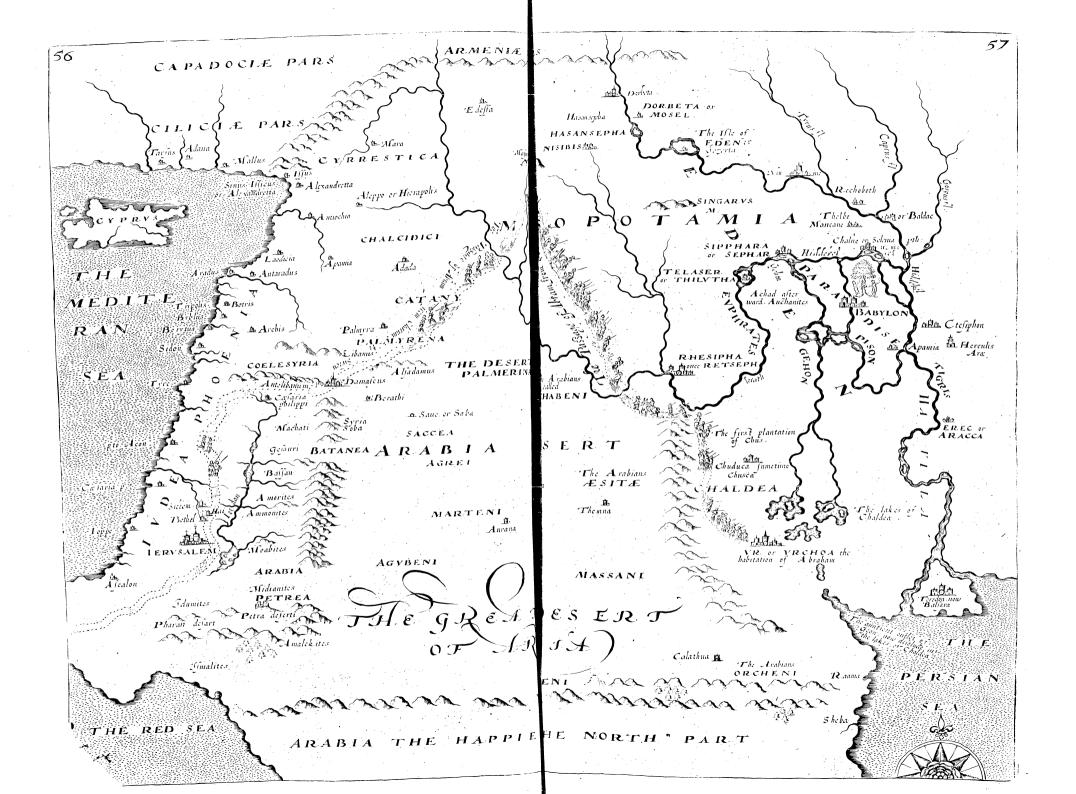

That the tree of Life was a materiall tree: and in what sense it is to be taken that man by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made subject to death.

Or eating the forbidden fruit of the tree of Knowledge was Adam driven out of Paradife, in exilium vita temporalis, into the banishment of temporal life, faith Beda. That these Trees of Life and Knowledge were material Trees (though Figures of the Law and of the Gospell) it is not doubted by the most religious and learned Writers: although the wirs of men, which are so volatile, as nothing can fixe them, and fo flipperie, as nothing can fasten them, have in this also delive-s red to the World, an imaginarie doctrine. The Tree of Life (fay the Hebrewes) hath a plurall construction, and is to be understood, Lignum vitarum, The Tree of lives, because the fruit thereof had a propertie, to preserve both the growing, sensitive, & rationall life of man; and not only (but for Adams transgression) had prolonged his owne dayes, but also given a durefull continuance to all posteritie; and that, so long, as a body compounded of Elements could last. And although it is hard to thinke, that flesh and bloud could be immortall, but that it must once perish and rot, by the unchanged Law of God imposed on his creatures,

Man(notwithstanding) should have enjoyed thereby a long, healthfull, and ungreived life: after which (according to the opinion of most Divines) he should have bin tranflated, as Enoch was. And as before the Floud, the dayes of men had the long measure of eight hundred or nine hundred yeares; and soone after the floud, of two hundred yeares and upwards, even to five hundred: foif Adam had not disobeyed Gods first and easie Commandement, the lives of men on Earth might have continued double, treble: or quadruple to any of the longest times of the first age, as many learned men have conceived. Chryfostome, Rupertus, Tostatus, and others were of beleefe, that (but for Adams falland transgression) Adam and his Posteritie had been immortall. But such is the infinite Wisedome of Godas he foresaw that the earth could not have contained Mankind; or elfe, that millions of foules must have bin ungenerated, and have had no being, if the first number, wherewith the Earth was replenished, had abode thereon for ever: and therefore that of Chrysoftome must be understood of immortalitie of bodies. which should have bin translated and glorified.

But of what kind or Species this Tree of Life was, no man hath taken on him to teach: in which respect many have conceived, that the same was not materiall, but a meere Allegorie, taking their strength out of Salomon, where Wisedome is compared to the Tree of Life, and from other places, where also Christ is called the Tree of Life: and Out of the Apocalypsis, I will give to him that overcommeth, to eate of the Tree of Life which Apocala; is in the Paradise of God. But to this place Saint Augustines answer may suffice, (which is) That the one doth not exclude the other, but that, as there was a terreftriall Paradife. fothere was a celestiall. For although Agar and Sara were Figures of the Old, and New Teffament, yet to thinke that they were not Women, and the Maide and Wife of Abraham were meere foolishnesse. And so in this place the sense of the Scripture is manifest. For Godbrought out of the earth every Tree faire to the fight, and sweete to take : the Tree also of Life in the midst of the Garden : which sheweth, that among the trees, which the Earth by Gods commandement produced, the rree of Life was one, and that the fruit thereof was also to be eaten. The report of this Tree was also brought to the ancient Poets: for as from the indigested matter or Chaos, Hesiodus, Homer, Ovid, and others. ofteale the invention of the created World; so from the Garden of Paradise they tooke the Plat-forme of the Orchard of Alcinous, and another of the Hesperides: and from the Tree of Life, their Nettar and Ambrofia; for Nettar, according to Suidas, fignifieth making young, and Ambrosia, immortalitie; and therefore said to be the meate and drinke of the gods.

Of Becanus his opinion, that the Tree of knowledge was Ficus Indica.

TOw for the Tree of Knowledge of good and evill, some men have presumed farther, especially Goropius Becanus, who giveth himselfe the honour to have found out the kind of this Tree, which none of the Writers of former times could ever gheffe at, whereat Goropius much marvaileth. But as he had an inventive braine, so there never lived any man, that believed better thereof, and of himselfe. Surely, how foever his opinion may be valued, yet he usurpeth the praise due to others, at least if the invention beat that price at which he fetteth it. For Moses Bar-Cephas fastened on this conjecture above fixe hundred yeeres before Becanus was borne: and Bar-Cephas himselfe referreth the invention to an antiquitie more remote, citing for his Author Philoxenus Maburgeniis, and others, whose very words Goropius useth, both conterning the Tree, and the reasons wherewith he would induce other men to that beliefe. For Moses Bar-Cephas in this Treatise of Paradise (the first Part and fol. 48.) faith, That the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica, The Indian Fig. Tree; of which the Breatest plentie (faith Becanus) are found upon the bankes of Acesines, one of the Rivers which falleth into Indus, where Alexander built his Fleete of Gallies, in or neere the Kingdome of Porus.

This Tree beareth a fruit of the bignesse of a great Peaze, or (as Plinie reporteth) some - Plinie reporteth) fome - Plinie reporteth) what bigger; and that it is a tree, fe semper ferens; alwaies planting it felfe; that it spreadethit felfe so farre abroade, as that a troope of horsemen may hide themselves under it. Strabo faith, that it hath branches bending downewards, and leaves no leffethan a thield. Like capa

Aristobulus

Aristobulus affirmeth, that fiftie Horsemen may shadow themselves under one of these Trees. One sicritus ray seth this number to four hundred. This tree (faith Theophrastus) exceeded all other in bignesse, which also Plinie & Onesicritus confirme: to the trunke of which, these Authors give such a magnitude, as I shame to repeate. But it may be, they all speake by an ill-understood report. For this Indian Fig-tree is not so rare a plant, as Becanus conceiveth, who because he found it no where else, would needes draw the Garden of Paradise to the Tree, and set it by the river Acesines. But many parts of the world have them, and I my felfe have seene twenty thousand of them in one Valley, not farre from Paria in America. They grow in moift grounds, and in this manner: After they are first shotup some twentie or thirtie foot in length (some more, 10 fome leffe, according to the foile) they spread a very large top, having no bough nor twigge in the trunke or stemme: for from the utmost end of the head branches there is fueth out a gummy juyce, which hangeth downeward like a cord or finew, and within a few moneths reacheth the ground; which it no fooner toucheth but it taketh roote, and then being filled both from the top boughes, and from his owne proper roote, this cord maketh it felfe a Tree exceeding haftily. From the utmost boughes of these young Trees there fall agains the like cords, which in one years and leffe (in that World of a perpetuall Spring) become also trees of the bignesse of the neather part of a Lance, and as straight as art or nature can make any thing, casting such a shade, and making fuch a kind of Grove, as no other Tree in the world can doe. Now, one of these Trees 20 confidered with all his young ones, may (indeed) fhrowd foure hundred or foure thoufand Horsemen, if they please; for they cover whole Vallies of ground where these Trees grow neare the Sea-banke, as they doe by thousands in the inner parts of Trinidado. The cordes which fall downe over the bankes into the Sea flooting alway downeward to finde roote under water, are in those Seas of the Indies, where Ovfters breede, intangled in their beds, so as by pulling up one of these cordes out of the Sea, I have feene five hundred Oy fters hanging in a heape thereon; whereof the report came, that Ovsters grew on Trees in India. But that they beare any such huge leaves, or any fuch delicate fruit, I could never finde, and yet I have travailed a dozen miles together under them: but to returne to Goropius Becanus. This Tree (faith he) was good for meate and pleasing to the fight, as the Tree of knowledge of good and evill is described to be.

Secondly, this Tree having so huge a trunke (as the former Authors report, and Becamus believeth) it was in this Tree that Adam and Eve hid themselves from the presence of God; for no other tree (faith he) could contain them. But first it is certaine. that this Tree hath no extraordinarie magnitude as touching the trunke or stemme, for among ten thousand of them it is hard to finde any one bigger than the rest, and these are all but of a meane fize. Secondly, the words of Moses translated, in medio ligni, are by all the Interpreters understood in the plurall number (that is) in the middelt of the Trees. But his third argument (or rather the argument of Moles Bar-Cephas, word for A word) is. That when Adam and Eve found themselves naked, they made them breeches of Fig-leaves; which proveth (indeed) that either the tree it selfe was a Fig-tree, or that a Fig-tree grew neare it: because Adam being possest with shame, did not run up & downe the Garden to seeke out leaves to cover him, but found them in the place it selfe; and these leaves of all other were most commodious by reason of their largenesse; which Plinie avowethin these words; Latitudo foliorum pelta effigiem Amazonia habet; The breadth of the leaves hath the shape of Amazonian shield: which also Theophrass confirmeth; the forme of which Targets Virgil toucheth:

Virg. Acral. 1 494

Ducit Amazoni dum lunat is agmina peltis PENTHESILAEA furens. The Amazons with Crescent-formed shield PENTHESILAE A leades into the field.

Here Becanus defireth to be beleeved, or rather threatneth us all that reade him, to give credit to this his borrowed discoverie, using this confident (or rather cholericke) speech: Discrit tamimpudenter obstinatus, si hac à nobis de ficu has ex antiquis scriptoribus cum Mo I s I s narratione comparet ut audeat dicere aliam arborem inveniri posse, qua cum illa magis quadret? Who will be so impudently obstinate, if he compare these things which we have reported of this Fig-tree, and out of ancient Writers delivered, with the narration of Moses as to dare to avow, that any other Tree canbe found, which doth more properly and fiver, or agree therewith? But for my felfe, because I neither find this Tree, forting in body in largenesse of leaves, nor in fruit to this report, I rather incline to the opinion of Phila: That the Earth never brought forth any of these trees neither before nor after; but I leave every man to his owne beliefe, for the matter is of no great weight as touching his kinde: onely thereby, and by the easie Commandement by God given to Adam, to forbeare to feedethereon, it pleased God to make triall of his obedience: Prohibita, non Augustide Civili propter aliud, quam ad commendandum pura ac simplicis Obedientia bonum; Being forbidto den, not for any other respect than thereby to commend the goodnesse of pure and simple Obe-

Of BECANUS his not unwitty allegorizing of the story of his Ficus Indica.

Ut in this I must doe Becamus right, that he hath very wittily allegorized this Tree, allowing his supposition of the Tree it selfe to be true. The effects whereof, because his discourses are exceeding ample, I have gathered in these few words. As this Tree (faith he) so did Man grow straight and upright towards God. untill fuch time as he had transgressed and broken the Commandement of his Creator : and then like unto the boughes of this tree, he began to bend downeward, and stooped toward the earth, which all the rest of Adams posteritie after him have done, rooting themselves therein, and fastning themselves to this corrupt world. The exceeding umbragiousnesse of this tree, he compareth to the darke and shadowed life of man, through which the Sunne of justice being not able to pierce, wee have all remained in the shadow of death, till it pleased Christ to climbe the tree of the Crosse for our enlightning and redemption. The little fruite which it beareth, and which is hard to find among for many large leaves, may be compared (faith he) to the little vertue, and unperceived knowledge among so large vanities, which obscure and shadow it over. And as this fruit is exceeding fweet, and delicate to the tafte and palare: fo are the delights and pleasures of the world most pleasing, while they dure. But as all those things which are most mellistuous, are soonest changed into choler and bitternesse: so are our vanities and pleasures converted into the bitterest forrowes and repentances. That the leaves are so exceeding large, the fruit (for such leaves) exceeding little, in this, by comparifon we behold (faith he) the many cares and great labours of worldly men, their follicitude, their outward shewes, and publike oftentation, their apparent pride and large vanities; and if we feeke for the fruit, which ought to be their vertuous and pious actions, we find it of the bignesse of the smallest peaze; glorie, to all the world apparent: goodnesse, to all the world invisible. And furthermore, as the leaves, body and boughes of this Tree, by fo much exceede all other Plants, as the greatest men of power and worldly abilitie furpassethe meanest: so is the little fruit of such men, and such trees. rather fitting and becomming the unworthieft Shrub, and humbleft Bryar, or the poorest and basest Man, than such a flourishing statelinesse, and magnitude. Lastly, whereas Adam, after he had disobeyed God, and heheld his owne nakednesse and shame, sought for leaves to cover himselfe withall: this may serve to put us in minde of his and our finnes, as often as we put on our garments, to cover and adorne our rotten and mortall bodies: to pamper and maintaine which, we use so many uncharitable and cruell practices in this world.

Of the name of the tree of Knowledge of good and evill: with some other notes touching the storie of ADAM's sinne.

TOw, as touching the fense of this tree of Knowledge of good and evill, and what operation the fruit thereof had, and as touching the propertie of the Tree it felfe, Moses Bar-Cephas an ancient Syrian Doctor (translated by Mafius) giveth this judgement: That the fruit of this Tree had no fuch vertue or qualitic, 60

as that by the tasting thereof, there was any such knowledge created in Adam, as if he had beene ignorant before ; but as Junius also noteth : Arbor scientia boni & mali(idesi) experientia boni & mali ab eventu; The Tree of knowledge of good and evill (that is) the experience of good and evill by the event. For thus much we may conceive, that Adam being made(according to the Hebrew phrase) by the workmanship of Gods owne hand, in greater perfection than ever any man was produced by generation, being (as it were) the created Plant, out of whose seed, all men living, have growne up; and having received immortalitie from the breath or spirit of God; he could not (for these respects) be ignorant, that the disobeying of Gods commandement was the fearefullest evill, and the observation of his precepts the happiest good. But as men in perfect health do(not-10 withstanding) conceive, that sicknesse is grievous, and yet in no such degree of torment, as by the suffering & experience in themselves they afterwards witnesse: so was it with Adam, who could not be ignorant of the punishments, due to neglect and disobedience; and yet felt by the proofe thereof in himselfe, another terror than he had fore-thought, or could imagine. For looking into the glaffe of his owne guiltie foule, he beheld therin the horror of Gods judgements, to as he then knew, he feelingly knew, and had triall of the late good, which could not be prized, and of the new purchased evill, which could not be exprest. He then saw himselfe naked both in body and mind; that is, deprived of Gods grace and former felicitie: and therefore was this tree called the tree of Knowledge, and not because the fruit thereof had any such operation, by any selfe qualitie or a effect: for the same phrase is used in many places of the Scriptures, and names are given to Signes and Sacraments, as to acts performed, and things done. In fuch fort, as this tree was called the tree of Knowledge, because of the event, as is aforesaid: so was the Well of contention therefore called Efek, and the Well of hatred Sitnath, because the Heardsmen of Isaac and Gerar contended for them: and the heape of Stones called the heape of witnesse, betweene Jacob and Laban; not that the stones bare witnesse, but for a memorie of the covenant. So Jacob called the house of God Bethel; and Hagar, the Well in the Defart, Viventis, & videntis.

But Adam being both betrayed and mastered by his affections, ambitious of a farther knowledge than he had perceived in himfelfe, and looking but flightly (as all his iffues doe) into the miseries and forrowes incident, and greatly affecting the supposed glory which he might obtaine by tafting the fruit forbidden, he was transported and blowne forward, by the gentle winde of pleafing perswasions, unawares; his progession being ftrengthened by the subtile arguments of Sathan, who laboured to poison mankind in the very root, which he moistned with the liquor of the same ambition, by which himselfe

But what meanes did the Divell find out, or what instruments did his owne subtilty present him, as fittest and aptest to worke this mischiefe by even the unquiet vanity of the woman; fo as by Adams harkning to the voyce of his wife, contrarie to the expresse commandement of the living God, Mankind by that her incantation became the subject of labour, forrow, and death: the woman being given to man for a comforter and companion, but not for a counsellor. But because thou hast obeyed the voyce of thy wife &c. (faid God himselfe) Cursed is the earth for thy sake, in sorrow shalt thou eate of it all thy life. It is also to be noted, by whom the woman was tempted, even by the most ugly and unworthy of all beafts, into whom the Divell entred and perswaded.

Secondly, what was the motive of her disobedience: even a defire to know what was most unsitting her knowledge; an affection which hathever since remained in all the posteritie of her sexe. Thirdly, what was it that moved the man to yeeld to her perswasions : even the same cause which hath moved all men fince to the like consent; namely, an unwillingnesse to grieve her and make her sad, lest she should pine and be overcome with forrow. But if Adam in the state of perfection, and Salomon the sonne of David, Gods chosen servant, and himselfe a man endued with the greatest wisedome, did both of them disobey their Creator, by the perswasion and for the love they bare to a woman, it is not fo wonderfull as lamentable, that other men in fucceeding ages have beene allured to fo many inconvenient and wicked practices, by the persuasions of their wives, or other beloved darlings, who cover over and shadow many malicious purposes with a counterfeit passion of dissimulate forrow and unquiernesse.

CHAP. V.

Of divers memorable things betweene the fall of ADAM, and the Floud of NOAH.

of the cause and the revenge of CAINs sinne: and of his going out from God. He same Pride and Ambition which began in Angels, and afterward possess Adam, Cain also inherited: for Cain (envious of the acceptation of his Brothers Prayer and Sacrifice) flew him, making himselfe the first Manflayer, and his Brother the first Martyr: the revenge of which unnaturall Murther, although it pleafed God to mitigate, when Cain cryed out that his punishment was greater than he could beare. For the same offence chiefely (wher with the Sonnes of Adam, as it were, urged and provoked God) hee destroyed all Mankinde, but Noah and his Family: for it is written, The Earth also was corrupt before God: of which Gensonity? inthe same place Moses giveth a reason; for saith he, The Earth was filled with cruelty: and anon after, God himselfe made the cause knowneunto Noah, saying; An end of all flesh is come beforeme, for the Earth is filled with cruelty through them, and behold, I will destroy them with the Earth, or from the Earth. Neither was this cruelty meant to have beene in taking away the lives of menonely, but in all forts of Injustice and Oppression. After this Murther of ABEL, CAIN went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, towards the East-side of Eden: in which words, The going out of Cain from the presence of the Lord, is not to be understood after the literall sense, God being wholly inall parts of the World: Totus in calo est, totus interra, non alternistemporibus, sed urumq; simul; God (faith S. Augustine) is wholly in Heaven, and wholly in Earth, not by Augustine. interchanged times, but all at once; And that this is true, David witnesseth: If I be in Heaven Del 12.2.19 faith David) thou art there; in Hell, thou art there also. But what is meant thereby: Exitt Plata39.81. facie Dei (faith Chrysostome) Cain went out from the presence of the Lord (that is) chyofin ewas left of God, disfavoured and bereaved of his protection.

His word Nod or Naid, S. Hierome and many others understand to signific wan- normal Help dring or uncertaine habitation: vexation or agitation, faith Junius; but the Seventy convert it otherwise, and take Nod for the proper name of a Countrey, and so doth fosephus. But it seemeth to me, that Cain was rather a Vagabond or Wande- Josephia ag er in his cogitations, than any thing else, and that his thoughts and conscience had no quiet or rest, in regard of the Murther committed, justly searing (by his owne words) the likeviolence: And who seever findet h me (faith CAIN) shall stay me. Now that Nod or Naid Gen4.14. was a Region wherein Cain inhabited, appeareth by the word (dwelt) for dwelling fignifieth an abiding: and we call those people Wanderers and Vagabonds that have no dwelling place. And to make this dwelling and abiding more manifest, Moses teacheth in Genale. what part of the Earth this his habitation was, which he affirmeth towards the East-side of Eden. Secondly, it is faid by Moses, that after Cain departed from the presence or fayour of God, he built a City, and called it by the name of his first-borne, Enoch; which heweth that he feared to wander, and rather fought to fortifie himfelfe against revenge. Cyrillus faith, that Cain and Abel were figures of Christ, and of the Jewes; and that as Cain after that he had flaine Abel unjustly, had thence-forth no certaine abiding in the World: fo the Jewes after they had crucified the Sonne of God, became Runnagates: and it is true, that the Jewes had never fince any certaine Estate, Common-weale, or Prince of their owne upon the Earth. Now this Land of Nod, Junius taketh to be in Arabia Deferta, a Region of Nomades, but Arabia the Defart is not Eastward, or on the East Part of Eden, neither are these Nomades any particular People or Nation. For all these, awhat part of the World foever, which in old time lived by Pastorage, and sed (as we call it in Ireland) upon white meate, without tilling of the ground, are called by the Greekes Nomades, and by the Latines Pastores vagi, as the Northren Tartarians, the Getulians, and Numidians in Africa, the ancient Brittans, and the Northren Irish: yea, fuch were the Inhabitants of Italy it felfe, till fuch time as Italus (who gave them that name) taught them the Husbandry of tillage, used at this day. But the Region Eastward from Eden is that part of Affyria, called by Ptolomy Calena, which also might be denved of Carena, the country of Cain. And that Cain inhabited in those parts, it may begathered by the first possession of his Father Adam; for thus it is written, Genes. There. fore the Lord God fent him forth from the Garden of Edento till the Earth whence he was taken: and in the Verse following: Thus he cast out man, &c. and at the East side of the Gar. w den of Eden be fet the Cherubins: which sheweth that the entry into Paradise was from the East, by which entrance Adam was cast out, and therefore inhabiting on that sideof Paradife which was Eastward, according to the Text. Cain also in the same Region fought his dwelling place. Now, if the word Nod or Naid doe fignifie profugue, that is a fugitive, we can give no longer time to this uncertaine habitation of Cain, than till he built the City of Enoch, the first of the World, which he inclosed, either for his own defence. or (as fosephus writeth) to oppresse others thereby. So as for mine own opinion, I am refolved with the Septuagint, that Nod was the proper name of a Region; and for the word (Vagabond) which Cain useth of himselfe, it seemeth by the perclose of the same Verse. that (Vagabond) is therin understood for such an one as travelleth in fear of revengement: for who foever findeth me (faith CAIN) shall flay me; or else (Vagabond) is taken for a man without protection, and cast out from the favour of God.

And because these Henochians, so called of the City of Henoch, were the first societie & civill affembly of all other, it is likely that the fame of these people (either for cruelty, strength, or other actions) lived in the memory of Noah and his Sonnes: so that after the Floud(as there were of all forts of natures, some vertuously, some impiously dispofed, and every active mind fetting before it whom to follow or imitate) those people, which delighted in cruelty and oppression, tooke on them their names whose natures they most liked and allowed; of whom these Henochians were not the least. Perchance the place it felfe where Henoch stood before the Floud, and whereof the Monuments might remain (as the Pillars or the foundation of Joppe did) gave occasion to the Plan ters of that place to call themselves by the same name: for of those Henochians there Qualidicaliquid were many Nations in the borders of Pontus, & Colchis in Iberia, Segdiana, & Bactria: in hoc magno orbe of the same name many Mountaines, as those which are otherwise called Coraxici. And mutatur, nova ur-bium fundamenta feeing that it is hard to finde out the truth of these things, which the most aged Time jacinatur, nova hath covered over or defaced, we may (according to the counsel of Place) exceedingly re-Gentium assing joyce, and therewith fatisfie our felves, if of fo great annd almost worn-out Antiquity, bus prioribus) pris of the eldest peoples names & nations, there remain any print or foot-steps to Posterity

In * Pliny P. Mela, Strabo, Valerius Flaccus, Lucan, Stephanus, wee finde those He nochei described, though diversly written; as in Pliny, sometimes Heniochi, in Mela Enio. chi, in Flaccus Heniochi, in Lucan Enochii, all which inhabit upon the Sea Euxinus, but yet none of these are on the East-side of Eden, or (according to Moses words) East ward from Eden. For Moses in all places where he describeth any Region, was so exceeding precife, as fometime he useth the word East or South without borrowing or addition, at o ther times with a borrowing, as Eastward or Southward, or towards the East or South In the place of Genesis the eleventh, hee writeth the word (East) simply and directly. And as they went from the East, they found a Plainein the Land of Shinar; but in this of Cain he addeth the word (towards) as, in the Land of Nod towards the East fide of Eden; which may bee taken, as inclining fome one point or two either to the North or to the South of the East.

But as we may conjecture that these Nations took ename of Henoch the City of Cain. or of the Region wherein it stood, when the same was repeopled after the Floud: soit is probable that these Henochis of Colchis, & other parts adjoyning, were not the first o that name, after the Sons of Neab began to fill the World againe: because, had this He nochthe City of Cain stood in any of these parts, it had then bin seated North. & not East or Eastward from Eden. But as Pliny findeth their habitation towards Pontus, so after wards he goeth on Eastward, till he track them or trace them out to their original. Forh Ptolsab. Afie. 3. calleth these of Colchis, (now Mengrelia) Sanni Heniochi , Ptolomy, Zani ; beyond which an hundred and fifty mile Eastward he findeth another Nation of them about Iberia and Albania; and beyond these he againe discovereth a third Nation, from whence all the rest rooke beginning, which inhabited on the West side of the Mountains of Paro-panisus: berweene them and the great River of Oxus, which bordereth Bactria on the North fide: and these Henochii are due East from the Region of Eden, and Eastward from the very Garden it selfe.

And although we cannot be affured that these Henochii tooke name from the memory of the City of Enoch directly; yet because they inhabited due East from Paradise, and afterwards spred themselves Westward (as all Noahs Sons did that came into Shinar) the conjecture is farre more probable, than that of Annius the Frier, who fets Henoch in Phoenicia, quite contrary to Moses word: Phoenicia from all parts of Eden being directly West.

And befides these severall Nations of the Henochii, Stephanus findeth a Region called stephacorti Henochia, and the fame also in the East, with divers Mountains about Bactria and Sogdiana, of the fame name. Only the Grecians (according to their fabulous inventions of all things else) out of the word (Heniochi) which fignifieth Carts or Coach-men, make these Nat. Comes call Nations to have forung from the Waggoners of Caffor and Pollux (to wit) Amphires and leth them Rhetean Telebius, who attended them in the enterprise of Jason into Colchis. To which it is answered, that we are first to consider, That of Cain (because he was the Parent of an impious Race) Moses useth no ample declaration; and so it best agreeth with his divine Reason, seeing that he containeth the whole Story of the first Race, which wasted by the least account, 1656. yeares, in five short Chapters. Yet thus much may every man borrow of his owne weakest reason, That seeing it pleased God to bestow on the first generations of mens lives so long a measure, as 800 and 900. yeares, that in fuch a space Cain had not want of leifure and means to build many such Cities as Henoch, be the capacity answering to what other of the World soever: for in what Age of Cains life he built it, the Scriptures are filent: as of whose times, and the times of his Issues Moses had the least care. And, as it was faid of Cain, that he built a City: so it was faid of Noah, that his three Sons peopled all the World, but in both, the processe of time required to be understood: which advice seeing Moses useth where the space lesse requireth it, as knowing that he writ the Scriptures to reasonable men, we may eafily understand, that such was his meaning also in all reports of like nature. For in making but a difference betweene the Birth of Abel, and Oblation of Cain, he spake it in this fort, Fuit autempost dies multos or a fine dierum (that is) in processe of time, it came to paffethat CAIN brought an Oblation. And therefore it is in like fort to be understood of Cain, that many yeares fore-gone, and when his people were increased the built the City 2 King 6 of Enoch or Henoch.

And where it is written, as of Cain, that he built Enoch, so of Solomon, that hee built the Temple of Jerusalem; yet it is well knowne of Solomon, that he employed in that Worke, 150000 Labourers: for this phrase or speech is common with our selves to say, The King invaded, when he caused an invasion to be made: & he built, when he commanded fuch a building. And therefore feeing we find that Mofes had no regard to the ages, to the birth, or to the death of any of Cains Issues, it is not to be marvelled at, why he also passeth paffeth over in a word the building of Enoch, without addition of any circumstance: for of Cain, Moses writeth in this manner: CAIN also knew his Wife, who conceived and bare HENOCH, and he built a Citie, and called the name of the Citie after the name of his some HENOCH. And to HENOCH was borne IRAD, and IRAD begat MEHUJAEL, and MEHU-IAEL begat Methusael, and Methusael Lamech.

Now of Seth, Moses writeth farre otherwise, and in this manner. And SETH lived an hundred and five yeares, and begat Enoch, and Seth lived after he begat Enoch 807. yeare, and begat Sonnes and Daughters: fo as all the dayes of Strh were 912. yeares, and he dred: as for the yeares & times of the wicked, they were not numbred in libro viventium, faith Cyril. But in Seth was the Church of God established, from whom Christ descended, as touching his manhood: and therefore this way and worke Moses walked in, and finished it with care, passing over the Reprobate Generation (as aforesaid.) Of the Line of Adam by Cain, Moses remembreth but eight Generations, reckoning Adam for one; and of the Line of Adam by Seth ten, counting Adam also therein, as followeth:

I. ADAM.

3 4	Cain. Henosh: Irad. Mehniael	7 8	Lamech, who by 5 2 Ada had Jubal & Tubal, & 3 by Silla, Tubal-	Enosh. Çainan	8 9	Henoch: Methusalem. Lamech, and
5	Mebujael. Metbulael.		by Silla, Tubal-	Mahaleel. Fared.	10	Noah.

These be the Generations of Adam by Cain, which the Scriptures mention: but Jose phus giveth unto Lamech threescore and seventeene Sonnes and Daughters, by his two Wives Ada and Silla: and to the fethree fonnes of Lamech, Mofes afcribeth the Invention of Pastorage, of Musique, and the working in Metall; for it seemeth that Jubal first gathered together, and made familiar those beasts which formerly were untamed, and brought Gen.4.20, 17,22. them into Heards and Droves: Tubal invented Musicke, and Tubalcain the working in Braffe and Iron: the one being addicted to Husbandry, the other was Mechanicall, the third given to Idleness and Pleasure. In whom began these three meaner degrees of Shepheards, Handy-crafts-men, and Musicians. And in the Issues of Seth began the Services of God, Divinity, Prophecy, and Astronomy: the Children of the one beheld the Heavens, the other the Earth.

§. IV.
Of the diversities in the Ages of the Patriarchs when they begat their Children.

Second scruple hath beene made, How it came to passe that the Patriarchs begat their Children at fo divers Ages, as Cainan or Cenan at feventy yeares, Mahaleel and Enoch at threescore and five yeares, whereas Jared begat not any of his a untill he was 162. yeares old: Methusalem begat at 187. Lamech at 182. and Noahat 500 yeares. Now this difference hath bin the more enforced, because it cannot be conjectured, that either Jared, Methusalem or Lamech abstained from Marriage out of the religion of Abstinence, seeing that Enoch, who was translated by God for his singular Sanctities, begat children before he was threefcore and ten yeares old.

The apparent difference hereof ariseth in this, that Moses did not number the Generations before the Floud precifely, according to the first begotten and eldest somes of the Patriarchs, but he drew downe the Line of Noah from Seth, and afterward from Noah to Abraham, by their true Ancestors, were they elder or younger, as he found them: for it is likely that Henoch was not the eldeft of Jared, nor Lamech the first-borne of Ma-5 thusalem, nor Noah of Lamech; neither is there any thing knowne to the contrary, but that Noah might have had many Sonnes before Shem, Ham, and Japhet, though these three were only named, and furviving, & which by God were referved to be the Fathers of Mankind after the Floud; and therefore when we finde Mahaleel to be begorten by Kenan at threescore and ten yeares, who was the first Sonne of Kenan, and then reckon that Methusalem begat Lamech in the 187. year of his life, the difference seemeth strange, where Lamech is taken for the eldeft. But Moses rejecteth all the other sonnes of Meshufalem but Lamech only, because he was the Father of Noah as aforesaid. Of this

But as Moses counted the Generations of the first Age, and so to Abraham, and the children of the promise after him; so doth Saint Matthew recite the Geneology of Christ. norby the eldeft fonnes, but from those whom God had chosen and bleffed, without refibect of the first-borne, who have hereby the prerogative in Estates, worldly and transitory only; and therefore the Evangelist nameth Isaac, and not Ismael, though Ismael were Matical first in time : so doth he take Jacob the younger, and not Esau the elder; neither is Christ derived from any of the three eldest Patriarchs, Reuben, Simeon, or Levi, but from Juda a fourth Brother, and so from David a younger sonne of Jessai, and lastly, we find, that the kingdome it selfe of Juda was not given to the Heir in Nature, but to the Heire of Grace, 1 Kington namely Salomon.

6. V. Of the long lives of the Patriarchs, and some of late memory.

He third Objection is, that the great difference of yeares betweene those of the first Age, whereof some of them had well neere seene a thousand yeares, makes it disputable, whether the account of times were of the same measure as in after-Ages, feeing, that foone after the Floud, men lived not a third part of that time, and in fuc-

They that have hereon resolved that those yeares were but Lunary years, (to wit) of a Sal Polifica? Monethorthereabouts, or Egyptian yeares, are easily consuted. For whereas Seth begat Macrob Satura Enosh in the yeare of his life an hundred and five; if those years be taken but for Moneths, Plindrages. then had Seth lived but eight yeares, and one Moneth when he begat Enolh: and if the time of Enosh have the same allowance, when he begat Kenan, then could Enosh at that time have beene but fix yeares and forty eight weeks old; and fo it may be gathered of the rest, excepting only Adam, who was created perfect in his kind, as were the Trees in their kinde, bearing fruit and feed. But this were too ridiculous to imagine. For to give an ability of Generation at fixe, seven or eight years, agreeth with the short lives of the Pigmies, and not with the constitutions of our first Fathers, who being descended from Adam, the workmanship of Gods hands, and begotten and borne in the strong youth of the World. and length of dayes and ability of body agreeable. Againe, if we allow this idle conceit of the Lunary yeares, then there would follow this extremity, that those which lived longeft, and upwards of nine hundred yeares, had by that account but the time of fourescore and ten and odd yeares, which were not only leffe by farre than the Patriarchs lived after the Floud, but short of many mens lives in this decrepit Age of the World, wherein mamy exceed fourescore, and some a hundred yeares. Further (if need be) to disprove this reckoning, whereas it is written, Gen. 25. That Abraham dyed in a good Age, an old man, and of great yeares: all which (if the former account were of Lunary yeares) makes but seventeene and an halfe of our yeares.

And if wee seeke for a cause of this long life in Nature, then is it reasonable, that the fiftman, created in highest perfection, should also beget children of equal strength or littlediffering: for of the first and purest feed there must of necessity spring up the fairest and fruitfullest plants. Secondly, the Earth it felf was then much lesse corrupt, which yeeldedher increase, and brought forth fruit and food for man, without any fuch mixture of harmefull quality, as fince that time the Curse of God, for the cruelty of mans heart, brought on it and Mankinde: Neither had the Waters of the Floud infused such an impurity, as thereby the naturall and powerfull operation of all Plants, Herbes, and Fruits upon the Earth received a qualification and harmefull change. And as all things under the Sunne have one time of strength, and another of weakenesse, a youth and beautie, and then age and deformity: so time it selfe (under the deathfull shade of whose wings all things decay and wither) hath wasted and worne out that lively vertue of Nature in Man, and Beafts, and Plants; yea, the Heavens themselves, being of a most pure and Plants; clenfed matter, shall waxe old as a garment; and then much more the power generative in inferiour Creatures, who by the ordinance of God receive operative Vertue from the fuperiour.

But besides the old age of the World, how farre doth our education and simplicity of living differ from that old time: the tender bringing up of Children, first fed and nourished with the Milke of a strange Dugge; an unnaturall curiosity having taught all Women (but the Beggar) to finde out Nurses, which necessity only ought to commend unto them: The hasty Marriages in tender yeares, wherein, Nature being but yet green and growing, we rent from her and replant her branches, while her felfe hath not yet any root sufficient to maintaine her owne top; and such halfe-ripe seedes (for the most part) in their growing up wither in the bud, and waxe old even in their Infancy. But above all things the exceeding luxuriousnesse of this gluttonous Age, wherein we presse Nature with over-weighty burdens, and finding her ftrength defective, we take the worke out of her hands, and commit it to the artificiall helpe of ftrong Waters, hot Spices, and pro-10 voking Sawces; of which Lucan hath these elegant Verses:

Plin.1.7.6-19.

The Egyptians affirme, that the longest time of mans life is a hundred yeares, because the heart in a perfect body waxeth and groweth to strength fifty yeares, and afterwards by the same degree decayeth and withereth. Epigenes findeth in his Philosophy, that the life of man may reach to the period of an hundred and twenty yeares, and Berosus to a hundred and seventeene yeares. These opinions Pliny repeateth and reproveth, producing many examples to the contrary. In the last taxation, number and review of the eighth region of Italy, there were found in the Roll (faith Pliny) foure and fifty persons of an hundred yeares of age: feven and fifty of an hundred and ten: two, of an hundred and five and twenty: foure, of an hundred and thirty: as many that were an hundred & five & thirty, or a hundred and feven and thirty yeares old: & laft of all, three men of an hundred and forty: and this fearch was made in the times of Vespasian the Father and the Son.

The simple dyet and temperate life of the Essans gave them long account of many years: so did it to the Secretaries of Egyptian Ceremonies, to the Persians Magicians & Josandia Brachmans. The Greeks affirme out of Homer, that Neftor lived three Ages, & Tirestas six, Sybilla three hundred years, Endymion of the lesse Asia, little less: Also Masanista of Numidia lived very long, & Dando of Illyria. Among the kings of Arcadia many lived three hundred yeares (faith Ephorus.) Hellanicus affirmeth of the Epeians, that someof them live full two hundred years; and fo doth Diodorus Siculus of the Egyptians: & that these reports are not fabulous, Josephus bringeth many witnesses with himselfe, as Manthon, Berofus, Mochus Estius, Hieronymus, Agyptius, Hecataus, Ephorus, and others. And Anthony Fume, an Historian of good reputation reporteth, that in the yeare 1570 there was an Indian presented to Solyman, Generall of the Turkes Army, who had out-lived three hundred years. I my felfknew the old Countess of Desmond of Inchiquin in Munfter, who lived in the yeare 1589. & many yeares fince, who was marryed in Edward the Fourths time, and held her Joynture from all the Earles of Defmond fince then; and that this is true, all the Noblemen and Gentlemen of Munster can witnesse: Strozzius Cicogna, out of Torquemada Maffaus, and the like Authors, telleth of some that have not onely far exceeded the terme prescribed by Epigenes; but been repaired from the withered estate of decrepit Age to fresh Youth. But for length of life, if we note but the difference betweene the ability of men in those dayes wherein Galen the Physician lived, it may easily prove unto us what Reeds we are in respect of those Cedars of the first Age. For Galett did ordinarily let bloud fix pound weight, whereas we (for the most part) from at fix our ces. But to conclude this part, there are three things (not counting Confeditions) which are the naturall causes of a long and healthfull life; (to wit) strong Parents, a pure and thin Ayre, and temperate use of dyet, pleasure, and rest: for those which are built of rotten timber, or mouldring stone, cannot stand long upright; on Ayre we feed alwayes and in every instant, and on meates but at times: and yet the heavie load of abundances wherewith we oppresse and overcharge Nature, maketh her to fink unawares in the midway; and therefore with a good constitution, a pure Ayre, and a temperate use of those things which nature wanteth, are the onely friends and companions of a long life.

Of the Patriarchs delivering their knowledge by Tradition: and that Enoch writ before the Floud.

Fourth scruple hath been made, How the certaine knowledge of the Creation came to Moses, seeing there was no Story thereof written; and if any such had beene, yet it is conceived, that all memory of Antiquity perished in the Uni-

But if we confider the curiofity and policy of elder ages, we shall find that knowledge was the greatest treasure that men sought for, and which they also covered and hid from the vulgar fort, as Jewels of inestimable price, fearing the irreverent construction of the ignorant and irreligious: fo as whatfoever was attained unto concerning God, and his working in nature, the same was not left to publike dispute, but delivered over by heart and tradition from wife mento a posterity equally zealous; Ex animo in animum fine li- Dion Arcope teris medio intercedente verbo: From minde to minde without Letters, by way of Tradition or word of mouth. And it was thought by Efdras, origen, and Hilarius, (as Mirandula con-Folias. ceiveth) that Moses did not onely upon the Mount receive the Law from God, but withall. secretiorem & veram legis enarrationem: a more secret and true explanation of the Law: which (faith he, out of the fame Authors,) he delivered by mouth to Jofuah, and Jofuah to the Elders : For to teach these mysteries, which he called secretiona, to the rude multitude, were no other quam dare santtum canibus & inter porcos spargere Margaritas; than to give holy things to Dogges, and to cast Pearles before Swine. In succeeding times this understanding and wisedome began to be written in Ciphers, and Characters, and Letters bearing the forme of beafts, birds, and other creatures; and to be taught onely to fuch as served in their Temples, and to their Kings and Priests. Of the first the Cabala of the Iewes was animitation: the invention of the other is ascribed to Zoroaster, Mercurius, Cadmus, and others; but falfely.

This Cabala importer a Law, received by tradition and unwritten. Cabala in Hebrew Cabala of Vicentia is receptio in Latine, and a receiving in English. And this custome was also held by the Theologicana Druids and Bards of our ancient Brittans, and of later times by the Irish Chroniclers cal- Mirana to fol. led Rimers. If then fuch as would feem wifeft in the use of reason, will not acknowledge, that the story of the Creation, or beginning of all things, was written by inspiration, the to holy Ghost guiding the hand of Moses; yet it is manifest, that the knowledge thereof might by tradition (then used) be delivered unto him by a more certaine presumption. than any or all the testimonies which prophane antiquity had preserved and left to their fucceffors: which their wife men (as they terme them) did lay up and defend from the injury of the time and other hazzards. For, leaving to remember that Adam instructed Seth, and Seth his children and succeffors, which cannot be doubted of, it is manifest. that Methufalem lived together with Adam himselfe two hundred forty and three yeares. and Noah with Methusalem no leffe than five hundred yeares; and before Noah died, Abraham was fifty and eight yeares old-from whence this knowledge by an eafie and ordinary way might come to Ifrael, and fo to Mofes.

But befides this tradition, it is questionlesse, that the use of letters was found out in the very infancy of the world, proved by those prophecies written on pillars of stone and bricke by Enoch: of which Josephus affirmeth, that one of them remained even in his Foliage time (meaning belike some ruine or foundation thereof) which pillars by others are afcribed to Seth. But of these prophecies of Enoch, Saint Jude testifieth; and some part Jude prophecies of his Bookes (which contained the course of the Starres, their names and motions) were afterward found in Arabia swelling, in the Dominion of the Queene of Saba (saith o- Origen-Homit. rigen) of which Tertullian affirmeth, that he had seene and read some whole Pages. It is not therefore strange, that Moses came to the knowledge of the Creation, and story of the first Age, seeing he might receive it both by tradition and letters, had not the spirit of God instructed and inspired him as it did: which also his many and strange miracles (performed before he wrote the Scriptures) make more manifest.

Origen. Hol. 28. ment in Evang. Gelaf.dift.15.

Now for the Bookes of Enoch, how foever fome men make mention of them, fure I am that Tertullian, Origen, Augustine, Beda, Procopius, Gazeus, (with others) cite them in their writings: although Medina, for an argument to prove them unwritten traditions, alledgeth that Pope Gelasius among other the Apochryphall Scriptures (which he rejecteth)named not these of Enoch; but that whatsoever was remembred out of them, the fame was delivered by Tradition from the Jewes. But I rather thinke with Pererius, that fuch a Book there was, & that the same was corrupted after the death of the Apostle's, and to many things added thereunto by Heretikes, who took occasion upon the antiquity therof, and out of that place of Michael contending with the Devill about the body of Mofes, to frame and add thereunto many inventions of their owne. One of the greatest arguments against these Bookes, is, that neither Philo nor Josephus (the most diligent searchers of Antiquity) make mention thereof. But against it I will set this opinion of Saint Augustine, Scripsisse quidem nonnulla divina Enoch, illum septimum ab Adam, negare non possumus: That Enoch the seventh from Adam, did write divers divine things, we cannot deny. Now his writings which came afterwards to light, were suspected because of the antiquity, and of fables of Giants, supposed to be begotten of Angels, and others; and by so much the more, because no such Book was found amongst those Canonicall Scriptures, kept by the 20 diligence of the Hebrew Priests in Armario Judaico (faith Tertullian) who yet affirmeth that this Book might be preferved by Noah. Surely, that Enoch wrote the prophecies remembred by Jude, no man can deny; how they were delivered to posterity, I know not; whether by the Jewes Cabala, or by what other means, the fame is but mans conjecture. And (certainely) by the knowledge ascribed to Noah of the motions of the Heavens, and of the natures and conjunctions of the Starres; and afterwards to some of his sonnes, to Zoroaster, and then to Abraham, it is very probable that Noah had seene and might preferve this Book. For it is not likely, that so exquisite knowledge therin(as these men had) was fuddenly invented and found out, but left by Seth to Enoch, and by Enoch to Noah, as hath beene faid before. And therefore if letters and arts were knowne from the time of Seth to Enoch, and that Noah lived with Methusalem, who lived with Adam, and Abraham lived with Noah it is not strange (I say) to conceive how Moses came to the knowledge of the first Age, be it by letters, or by Cabala and tradition, had the undoubted word of God need of any other proofe than felfe-authority.

TOw let us confider the relation of Moses, who nameth seven descents of Cains children: and of Adam by Seth ten; Seth being given by God in stead of Abel: and of Seth was Enosh begotten, in whose time men began to professe Religion, and to offer facrifice in publique. For although Adam instructed his children in the knowledge of God their Creator, as appeared by the facrifice offered by Cain and Abel; yet it seemeth that after the birth of Enosh, men began publiquely to call on the name of the Lord, that is, they ferved and prayfed God by Communion and in publique manner, or calling upon the name of the Lord; and thereby were the sonnes of God or the godly distinguished from the wicked. From the birth of Enosh the sonne of Seth, to the time of Henoch the sonne of Jared, there is nothing remembred by Moses, but their owner births, the birthes of their fonnes, the length of their lives, and deaths. But of Henoch it is written. That he walked with God, and he was no more seene: for God tooke himaway. By that, that hee walked with God, was meant, that he was a just and upright man, and that he feared, loved, and obeyed God. For the same phrase Moses useth of Noah Noah was a just and upright man in his time, and Noah walked with God. The Seventy convert it, Enoch placuit Deo; Enoch pleased God. And although Aben-Ezra and others understand this place, (tulit eum Deus) scilicet, mortuus est; God tooke him away, (that is) hee dyed, which (indeede) agreeth both with the phrase of the Scripture, and with our manner of speech to this day, to say, God tooke him away, when he dyed; yet the difference which Mofes maketh betweene the piety of Henoch, and the rest of the Pa-rriarchs, and by omitting the word (death) which he useth to all else, makes it manifests that Henoch was not dissolved as the rest. Forto all the rest of the Patriarchs, Moses yferh these words, And he dyed; but of Henoch he spake otherwise, saying onely, He mas missing, or he was not seene, Et non inveniebatur (faith the Apostle to the Hebrewes) quia Deus eum transtulit; Andhe was not found, for the Lord tooke him away. In the same place it is expressly added, that he (am not death.

But whether this taking away of Henoch were not with the same kinde of changing. which S. Paul promifeth, when he faith, that when the end shall come, wee shall not all dye, i courses but all shall be changed, I leave it to the learned Divines.

After Henoch, Moses passeth over to Methusalem and Lamech, remembring (as of the rest) the times of their birth and death: saving that Lamech prophesied of his some Noah, faying, This same shall comfort us concerning our worke, and sorrow of our hands, as Gens. 292 touching the earth which the Lord hath curfed. Of Noah, Mofes writeth more amply than of any of the rest of Adams children by Seth, being the last of the ten generations of the Genesa first Age, whom God (with his Family) preserved, because he was an upright man in his time, and feared God.

But of the warre, peace, government, and policy of those strong and mighty men, so able both in body and wit, there is no memory remaining: whose stories if they had bin preserved, and what else was then performed in that newnesse of the World, there could nothing of more delight have been left to posterity. For the exceeding long lives ofmen (who to their strength of body and naturall wits, had the experience added of 800, and 900. yeares) how much of necessity must the same adde of wisedome and undertakings : Likely it is, that their workes excelled all whatfoever can be told of aftertimes, especially in respect of this old age of the World, when we no sooner begin to know, but we begin to die; according to HIPPOCRATES: Vita brevis, ars longa, tempus aphone preceps; (which is) Life is short, art is long, and time is headlong. And that those people of the first age performed many things worthy admiration, it may be gathered out of these words of Moses; These were mighty men, which in old time were men of renowne, Gensal But these men of renowne (whom the Scripture afterwards calleth Giants, both for strength of body, and cruelty of mind) trusted so much to their owne abilities, as they forgat altogether the piety of Seth, and the waies wherein Henoch walked : for all the ima- vergs quations of their hearts were evil, only evill, and continually evill. And this wickednesse was not only found in the issues of Cairs, but it was then univerfall, when the children and sons of God(or of the godly) were corrupted & mif-led by their idolatrous wives, the daughters of Cain, or of those other men, loving themselves and the world only.

That these fonnes of God were Angels, which being taken with the beauty of women, Gm 600 accompanied them and begat Giants, some of the Fathers supposed; namely, Lactantim, and Eusebius, missled by Josephus: of whom I cannot doubt, but that they afterward changed their former opinions. And of this mistaking many Writers have taken great advantage, and have troubled themselves with large answers, and very needlesse; the question being uncapable of dispute, especially since S. Chrysoftome and S. Augustine have answered it largely long agoe. For that good and godly men were honoured with the title of Gods children, it doth every where appeare in the Scripture; and on the contrary, to thinke that Angels, who (as Christ witnesseth) behold the face of God; (that is) alwaies attend his commandements, should after a separation from the rest which fell with Lucifer, for fake the glorious presence of their Creatour, and become Incubi, or Succubia contrary both to Nature and Grace, were more than madnesse to imagine.

That the Giants by Moses so called were indeede men of buge bodies: as also divers in later times.

F thefe Giants which Mofes calleth mighty men, Goropius Becanus an Antuer-Pian (who thought his owne wit more Gigantical I than the bodies of Nimrod or Hercules) hath written a large discourse, intituled Gigantomachia, and strayned his braines to prove, that there were never any fuch men: his reasons (whosoever defires to losetime) he may finde them in the Treatises before named. It is true that Cyrillus reproves the Grecian Poets for their monstrous fictions: who affirme shamelessy Than

That the Giants have in elder times not onely cast up Mountaines upon Mountaines, but removed Ilands out of the Sea, with like fooleries. And for that invention of casting up Hils, and making warre with the gods, no doubt but that the fame was borrowed out of the story of Nimrod, as before remembred; and even out of this Scripture: That the Sons of God faw the Daughters of Men, of whom the first Giants were begotten, was that conceit taken of orpheus and Hesiodus. That Giants were the sons of the Heaven and the Farth; meaning by the Heavens the fonnes of God, and by the Earth the daughters of Men: which verses of orpheus are by John Cassam (who hath written a witty discourse of this fubject) thus changed into Latine:

From the Earth, and from thy bloud, O heaven, they came, Whom thereupon the gods did Giants name.

But what will not Opiniators and felfe-beleeving men dispute of, and make doubt of, if they cannot conceive that there were in the first Age such kind of men; and of which there have beene in all times fince; feeing the Scriptures avow the one manifestly, and common experience the other?

And for that superlative strayning of words, and the meaning of them, that the name of Giants was given to Oppressors and Tyrants, and not to strength of body and eminent. stature: such men might with better reasoncall them Oppressors, because they were Giants: and therefore had ability to oppresse, than fay, That they were called Giants only. because Oppressors. For first, Moses himselfe calleth them mighty men; which sheweth a strength surpassing others: and afterwards men of renowne, (that is) of great undertaking and adventerous action. And if the same stature of body, and ability had not been found among divers Nations after the generall floud, then might this place of Moles have more willingly hearkened to a dispute, and yeelded to interpretation.

But befides all these famous Giants found in prophane Histories (which I wil reserve to accompany the Giants of Albion, in the story of Britanie) the Scriptures doe cleerly and without all allegoricall construction avow, That, besides Nimrod, there were found of these Giants in the time of Abraham, of Moses, of Josuah, and of David; namely, the Rephaims in Afteroth; the Zuzzi or Zanzummims in Ham, and the Émims which dwelt anciently in the Land of Moab: whom Moles (for stature) compareth with the Anakims which dweltin Hebron; for they also were taken for giants as the Anakims. Like wife where Moles speaketh of the Land of Ammon he useth these words: That allows taken for a land of Giants for Giants dwelt therein afore-times: & whom the Ammonites call Zanzummims: a people that was great, and many, and tall as the Anakims. And these Giants called Rephaims in Afteroth and Karnaim, and the Zuzæi or Zanzummims, Chedorlaoma king of Elam overthrew, affifted by other kings his affociates. Alfothe Prophet Anni found among the Ammonies men of giant-like stature, whom he compareth to the Cea dar, and whose strength to the Okes: and the Prophet Baruc H, These were the Giants famous from the beginning, that were of 60 great stature and 60 expert in warre. Particularly ! is written of og, king of Bafan, that his bed of yron was nine cubits long, and foure at bits broad : for only og king of Basan remained of the remnant of the Giants, who commanded the Kingdome of Basan, source hundred yeares after the Expedition of Chedor-Lapmer. Moreover, those Discoverers and Searchers of the Land of Promise (sent by Man les from Cadesbarne in Paran) made report at their returne of the great stature of those people in generall, and especially of the sonnes of Anak, in these words: All the people which we faw in it are men of great stature : for there we faw Giants, the sons of Anak, which come of the Giants, so that we seemed in our fights like Graffe-hoppers, and so we were inther fight (that is) the Searchers found in their owne judgements a marvellous difference betweene the Anakims and themselves: insomuch that the Israelites were so stricken with feare, as they rather fought and defired to return again into Egypt, and were more willing to endure their former flavery, than to fall by the strokes of those fearefull Nations Furthermore, the Scriptures, put us out of doubt, that Goliah the Philistine of Gath, was 1

shekles of brasse: the shaft of his speare was like a Weavers beame, and his speare-head weighed fix hundred shekles of yron. Also in Samuel there is mention of another 60 of another Goliah, furnamed Getheus, because he was of Gath: and of three other Giants; of which the first was slain by Jonathan, Davids Nephew, who had twelve fingers, and 1 chron 2017. as many toes:a man of great stature, and his fingers were by fixes, even foure & twenty.

Also that Sampson was of surpassing strength, no man doubteth, who tore a Lion as it Juditate. had been a Kid, and after flue thirty of the Philistines, and (after that) a thousand more of them with a Jaw-bone of an Asse: And lastly, he tooke the gates of Azzah, and the two Posts, and lifted them away with the barres, and put them upon his shoulders, and carried them to the top of the Mountaine before Ebron. If then it be approved by every judgement, that both Nature and the Heavens waxe old, and that the great age of Time o hath (with it felfe) infeebled and almost worne out the vertue of all things, then, I say, That as in all other kindes the Earth (before that Sinne had increased the cuire and corruption) brought forth her young ones more ftrong and beautifull, than it did in afterages: so also those Giants, those mighty men, and men of renowne, as far exceeded the proportion, nature, and strength of those Giants, remembred by Moses of his own time. and after him their fucceffours, as the ordinary proportion of all men in generall, foone after the floud and in times farre off, exceeded the bulkes and bodies of men which are now borne in the withered quarter and Winter of the World. If therefore Giants were common in the third and fourth age, much more in the first slourishing youth and newnefle of the world.

But the wickednesse (especially incruelty and oppression) of these men was such, as God therfore by the floud gave end to all flesh, but to the just Noah and his Family. And God repented him that he had made man: which S. Augustine thus expoundeth; Neg; enim Gone. sicut hominem ita Deum facti sui panitet, cujus est de omnibus omnino rebus tam sixa senten. De Civil Dela Control Senten de S tia, quam certa prescientia. Sed sinon ni atur Scriptura talibus verbis; non se quodammodo familiarius insinuabit omni generi hominum, quibus vult esse consultum: ut et perterreat superbientes, & excitet negligentes, & exerceat querentes, & alat intelligentes, God faitly he) doth not repent him of any thing which he hath done (as menufe to doe) : but if the Scripture did not use those words or the like, it should not (in a sort) insinuate it selfe familiarly to all forts of men, for whom it would provide: that it might terrifie the proud, firreup the negligent, exercise the searchers of the truth, and nourish those that under stand

CHAP. VI.

Of idolatrous corruptions, quickly rifing, and hardly at length vanishing in the world: and of the Reliques of Truth touching these ancient times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends;

S. I. That in old corruptions we may finde some signes of more ancient truth.

Ere before wee proceede any further, the occasion offereth it selfe for us to Ere before wee proceede any further, the occasion offered it lene for us to confider how the Greekes and other more ancient Nations, by fabulous inventions, and by breaking into parts the Story of the Creation, and by delivering it over in a myfficial fense, wrapping it up mixed with other their owne trumpery; have sought to obscure the truth thereof; and have hoped, that after ages, being thereby brought into many doubts, might receive those inter-mixt discourses of God and Nature, for the inventions of Poets and Philosophers and not as any thing borrowed or stolne out of the Bookes or God. But as a skilfull and learned Chymist can aswell by separation of visible elements draw helpefull medicines out of poylon, as poylon out of the most healthfull hearbs & plants (all things having in themselves both life and death): so, contrary to the purposes and hopes of the Heathen, may those which seeke after God and Truth, find out every-where, and in all the ancient Poets and Philosophers, the Story of the first Age, with all the works and marvels thereof, amply and lively exprest.

That the corruptions themselves were very ancient: as in the Family of NOAH, and in the old Egyptians.

Burthis defection and falling away from God, which was first found in Angels, and afterwards in Men (the one having erred but once, the other ever) as concerning Mankinde it tooke such effect, that thereby (the liberall grace of Godbeing with-drawne) all the posterity of our first Parents were afterwards borne and bred in a world, suffering a perpetual Eclipse of spiritual light. Hence it was that it produced plants of fuch imperfection and harmefull quality, as the waters of the generall floud to could not fo wash out or depure, but that the same defection hath had continuance in the very generation and nature of mankinde. Yea, even among the few fonnes of Noah, there were found strong effects of the former poyson. For as the children of Sem did inherite the vertues of Seth, Enoch, and Noah; fothe sonnes of Cham did possesse the vices of the sonnes of Cain, and of those wicked Gyants of the first Age. Whence the Chaldæans began soone after the Floud to ascribe divine power and honour to the Creature, which was onely due to the Creatour. First, they worshipped the Sunne, and then the Fire. So the Egyptians and Phoenicians did not onely learne to leave the true God, but created twelve feverall gods, and divine powers, whom they worshipped, and unto whom they built Altars and Temples. For Herodotus faith, Duodecim Deorum nomina primos Agyptios in usu habuisse, atque Gracos ab illis cepisse mutuatos, eosq; prius Aras, o primus Asyption and Diss sibierexisse; The Egyptians (faith he) first devised the names of the twelve gods, which the Greekes received from them, who first erected unto themselves Altars, Images, and Temples for the gods.

That in processe of time these lesser errours drew on greater: as appeareth in the grosse Superstitions of the Egyptians.

Ut as men once fallen away from undoubted truth, doe then after wander for evermore in vices unknowne, and daily travaile towards their eternall perdition: fo vermore in vices this low-leading to the vermore and low-did these grosse and blinde Idolaters every Age after other descend lower and lower, and shrinke and slide downwards from the knowledge of one true and very God; and did not thereby erre in worshipping mortall men onely, but they gave divine reverence, and had the fame respect to Beasts, Birds, Fishes, Fowles, Windes, Earth, Water, Ayre, Fire, to the Morning, to the Evening, to Plants, Trees, and Rootes, to Passions and Affections of the Minde, to Paleneffe, Sickneffe, Sorrowes, yea to the most unworthy and basest of all these. The Egyptians thinke it finne to root up, or to bite Their Leekes or Onyons, which they ferve with holy rite: O happy Nations, which of their owne fowing Have store of gods in every Garden growing ! E. IIII.

That from the relickes of ancient Records among the Egyptians and others, the first Idols and Fables were invented : and the first Jupiter was Cain, Vulcan, Tubalcain, &c.

Ut in fo great a confusion of vanities, where among the Heathens themselves there is no agreement or certainty, it were hard to finde out from what example the beginnings of these inventions were borrowed, or after what ancient patternethey erected their building, were it not certaine that the Egyptians had knowledge of the first Age, and of whatsoever was done therein, partly from some inscriptions upon stone or metall remaining after the Floud; and partly from Mizraim the son of Cham, who had learnt the same of Cham, and Cham of his father Noah: for all that the Egyptians write of their ancient Kings, and date of times, cannot be fained. And though other Nations after them had by imitation their Jupiters also, their Saturnes, Vulcans and Mercuries, with the rest, which S. Angustine out of Varro; Ensebius out of many pro- Aunt 19.6.22 phane histories; Cicero, Diodorus Siculus, Arnobius, and many more have observed, Decivil. Del. to wir, the Phanicians, Phrygians, Cretians, Greeks, and other Nations; yet was Cain the English Phanicians. fonne of Adam (as some very learned men conceive) called and reputed for the first and 12.0.23, ancient Jupiter; and Adam for the first Saturne: for Jupiter was said to have invented Cic. Ladina. the founding of Cities; and the first Citie of the World was built by Cain, which he cal- Arnob Acontra aled Enoch, of whom were the Henechis before remembred. And fo much may be gathered out of Plato in Protagoras, which also Higinus in his 275. Chapter confirmeth. For hesides that many Cities were founded by divers men; Tamen primam latissimam à primo & autiquissimo Jove edificatam : yet the first and largest was built by the first and most ancient Jupiter, seared in the East parts, or in India, according to that of Moses: And Cain dwels towards the East side of Eden, &c. where also the Henochii were found Gen. 4.16. after the Floud. And therefore was Jupiter by the Athenians called Policus, a Founder of Cities, and Herceios, an incloser or strengthener of Cities (say Phornutus and Paula-Phornide name or Cities, and that to Jupiter Herceios there were in very many places Altars and Temples Payland. 4.5. erected. And that there were Cities built before the Floud, Plato also witnesseth, as may 10. in Protago. begathered in this his affirming, that foone after mankinde began to increase, they built many Cities; which, as his meaning, he delivereth in plaine termes, in his third Booke of Lawes: for he faith, that Cities were built an exceeding space of time before the destruction by the great Floud.

This first Jupiter of the Ethnickes was then the same Cain, the sonne of Adam, who marrying his owne Sifter (as also Impiter is faid to have done) inhabited the East, where Stephanus de Urbibus placeth the Citie Henochia. And besides this Citie of Henoch, Philo Gen. 4.20.12.25 Judans conceiveth that Cain built fixe others, as, Maich, Jared, Tehe, Jesca, Selet, and Gebat : but where Philo had this, I know not. Now as Cain was the first Jupiter, and from whom also the Ethnicks had the invention of Sacrifice: so were 3nbal, Tubal, and Tubal-Cain (inventors of pastorage, Smiths-craft, and Musicke) the same which were called by the ancient prophane writers, Mercurius, Vulcan, and Apollo; and as there is a likelihood Lattilacare of name between Tubalcain and Vulcan: fo doth Augustine expound the name of Noema or Naamath, the fifter of Tubalcain, to fignifie Venusta or beautifull, Voluptas or pleasure; as the wife of Vulcan is faid to bee Venus, the Lady of pleasure and beauty. And as Adam was the ancient and first Saturne, Cain the eldest Jupiter, Eva, Rhea, and Nomes or Naamath the first Venus: so did the Fable of the dividing of the World betweene the three Brethren the Sonnes of Saturne, arise from the true Story of the dividing of the Earth betweene the three Brethren the Sonnes of Noah: fo also was the Fiction of those Golden Apples kept by a Dragon, taken from the Serpent which tempted Evah: fo was Paradife it selfe transported out of Asia into Africa, and made the Garden of the Hesperides: the prophecies, that Christ should break the Serpents head, and conquer the power of Hell, occasioned the fables of Hercules killing the Serpent of Hesperides, and defcending into Hell, and captivating Cerberus: fo out of the taking up of Henoch by God, was borrowed the conversion of their Heroes (the inventors of Religion, and such Arts as the life of man had profit by into Stars and Heavenly Signes, and (withall) that leaving of the World, and ascension of Astrea: of which ovid:

For authoright the Ethinicks would understand funder a person, yet as it is led, as it is a vertue abstract, and may bee considered without a person, yet as it is usuallamong the antient Poets to describe Vertues and Vices by the persons of men and women, as Defire by Cupid, Valour by Mars, Beauty or Luft by Venus; fo doe they also the persons of Men by like Vertues and Vices : and therefore by Justice and Aftrea, Enoch; the justice and piety of Enoch being in the same manner express, as that of Noah was by Moses : for Noah was faid to bee a just man ; And Noah walked with God. And of Enoch it is written, That hee walked with God, and he was no more Gene: for God tooke him away.

From this story also of the first Age, and from that part where Moses remembreth the Giants begotten by the sonnes of good men upon the daughters of the wicked (whom Moses calleth mighty men, and men of renowne) did they steale those wondrous great acts of their antient Kings, and powerfull Giants; and againe their warre undertaken against the gods, from the building of the Tower of Babel by the L. de civit. Dei. Giant Nimrod, as Saint Augustine termeth him. Which warre of their Giants, Cor. nelius Severus thus describeth.

The Giants did advance their wicked hand Against the Starres, to thrust them headlong downe; And robbing fove of his Imperiall Crowne, On conquer'd Heavens to lay their proud command.

Whereby was meant that Nimrod purposed to raise the building of Babel to that height, as God neither by drawing waters from the deepe, nor by any conjunction of the starres, should bury them under the moisture of a second floud, but that by this building (if they had been herein victorious) they would have given the Law to Heaven it selfe. Also the making of leagues, peaceand covenants among Heathen Nations and Kings, confirmed by facrifice, whereof Virgil both in the eighth and twelfth of his Aeneides hath a touch, was (as it feemeth) borrowed from Mofes, Exed. 24. who when he read the Booke of the Covenant, sprinkled the people with blood.

Wee finde also many remembrances of Seth, the paternall Ancestor of Henoch and Noah: for Amenophis, the same King of Egypt which raigned at such time as emosts carried thence the children of Ifrael (as of late some learned men, mistaking his time, supposed) called his sonne and successour Sethe, of Seth: and of the same Seth (as many men of good judgement have granted) were the Princes of Thrace, called Seuthes, whereof there were many very famous. But herein was the memory of Seth most manifestly preserved, that the Egyptians worshipped Seth, as their most antient parent, and of the first tradition: in honour of whom they called a principall Province Setheiri. ca. We also find in Bithynia the City of Sethia, and others of the same name elsewhere. And fure, from the Egyptians did the Gracians borrow this kind of Theologie, though they scorned to acknowledge any antiquity preceding their owne: and that they might not seeme to learne elsewhere, they gave the same names to their owne Idols, which the Egyptians did totheirs.

Of the three chiefest Jupiters, and the strange story of the third.

Ut of all those armies of Jupiters remembred by the Antients, Cicero makethbut st B three, because those were of most fame: which other Writers have also done, who sought out, and laboured in their originals.

The first was Jupiter, the sonne of Aether and Dies, so called because the one hadreference to his celeftiall conditions (for ether is as much as shining or pure fire): the other discovered his naturall vertues, which dayes and times make more perfect, and arethe witnesses of mensactions.

The second was said to be the some of Calum or Heaven, for the same some respect; and this Jupiter was an Arcadian, and King of Athens.

The third, of whom all the Gracian fables were devised, was of Crete (now Candie) the sonne of Saturne and Ops. The name derived from the Latine is taken of Juvans Pater, from the Greeke word Zeus, it fignifyeth life, but somewhat strained. Boccas in his Genealogie of the gods, conceiveth, that his name was borrowed from Jupiser the Planet; but whether that starre had such a name, before the same was given to men, I know not. Jupiter is hot and moift, temperate, modest, honest, adventurous, liberall, mercifull, loving, and fairhfull (that is) giving these inclinations. And therefore those ancient Kings beautifyed with these conditions, might be called thereafter Jupiter: but howsoever they were, or were not with those vertues enriched, yet by imitation, all Kings in the eldest times assumed those Titles and Sir-names: great Princes affecting as high Titles of honour and reputation in the world, (howfoever deferved) as the worthyest, that ever were, acquired by their well deservings. Joves omnes Reges vocarunt ansiqui, The Ancients called all Kings Jupiters, as TZetZes in his waria bistoria confirmeth; Regesolim Joves vecarunt omnes; In old times all Nations called their Kings Jupiters. But where this last and most remembred Jupiter was borne, it is uncertaine. Somethere are that make him of Greee: others that he was but fent thither by his mother Ops or Nat.com. 1.6.7. Opis, to bee fostered and hidden from the fury of Titan his Uncle: because it was conditioned betweene Saturne and Titan, that Saturne being a younger brother, and reigning (for his owne life) by Titans permission, hee should put to death all his male children, o lest the Titans might bee interrupted by any of them in their succession; which agreement, because Saiurne performed in his first borne, it is fayned that Saiurne devoured his owne children. Hereof Lycophron, thus turned into Latine:

Haud fit pinguior. Saturne to be the fatter is not knownes Erndu sepulchrum quod sit ipse filiis. By being the grave and buriall of his owne. This composition betweene Titan and Saturne, Sybilla also witnesseth in these words

Things thus agreed; Titan made Saturne sweare No sonne to nourish, which by raigning might Usurpe the right of Titans lawfull heire.

But Opis the mother of Jupiter, being delivered at once both of Jupiter and June, conveyed Jupiter (first called Lysanias) into Crete, as shee did afterwards his two brothers, Neptune and Pluto: where he was brought up in Gnoffus, the chiefe Citie of that Iland, Entering by Cress the King, or by the Curetes, a people and nation thereof.

Others challenge him to bee of Thebes and a Thebane: others call him an Arcadian: others make him of Messena. The like contention is found among the Greekes touching his education and first fostering. Some affirme that hee was fed by Honi-bees: in recompence whereof hee changed their blacke coats and skinnes into yellow; a reward well fitting fuch a god: others, that he was nourished by Beares: others, by Goats: and of all these the idle Greekes have many pretty tales. But in the end when Titan had knowledge that Saturne had broken his faith, hee fet on him, and tooke him and his wife prisoners, whom Jupiter againe rescued and delivered.

But lastly, the father and the sonne equally ambitious, the one doubted the other. Saturne being the leffe powerfull, fled into Italy, and left his Kingdomes in Greece to his sonne. And although this Prince at the first purchased great honour, and for his many vertues, the name of Jupiter was given him: yet after hee was once setled and became potent, hee gave himselfe over wholly to palliardize and adultery, without all respect of Honour, Law, or Religion. And it is reported by such as doe ascribe the actions of many to one Jupiter, that not therewith fatisfied, hee was afterwards knowneto offend in the finne of Sodome with Ganimedes and others: and did not onely begin with incest, marrying his owne fister June, but he ravished, betrayed, stole away, and tookeby strong hand all the beautifull women borne in his time, within the limits of his owne Kingdomes, or bordering them. Among whom these hereafter written were of greatest fame; Niebe, Laodemia, and Alemena, the wife of Amphierion, by whom hee had Pelaszus, Sarpedon, Argus, and Hercules: by Taygete he had Taygetus, of whom the Mountaine Taygetus tooke name, with another sonne called Saen, of whom Savena:

by Antiope he had Amphion and Zetus: by Lada, Caftor and Pollux, Hellen and Clyten. nestra: by Danae, Perseus; by Jordana, Deucation: by Charme (the daughter of Eubu. lus) Britomartis: by Protogenta, he had Athlius the father of Endymion: and by 10 (the daughter of Inachus) Epaphus, the founder of Memphis in Egypt: which Epaphus married Libya, of whom that Countrey tooke name, for so the Greeks afterward called Africa. He ravished Aegina the daughter of Aesopus, and carried her into the Iland Oenopia or Oenotria, afterwardcalled Aegina, on whom hee begate Aeacus: by Torrhebia hee had Archesilaus and Carbius: by Ora, Colaxes: hee had also Dardanus by Elettra, who built Dardanium, afterward Ilium or Troy. Hee begate the brothers Talici, on Thalia, and on Garamantis, Hiarhas. He had besides these (if they belye not their chiese god) Phileus and Pilumnus, inventers of the Bakers craft; and I know not how many more; 10 but I know well that hee could not be father to all these, who were borne in ages so farre differing. And of these his severall ravishments, betrayings, stealing away of mens wives, daughters, and fons, buying of virgins, and the like, came in all those ancient fables of his transformations into showers of gold, eagles, bulls, birds, and beasts; and of him, and by him (in effect) all that rabble of Grecian forgeries. And yet did not the Greekes and Romanes feare to entitle this monster, Optimus Maximus, though Cicero in his second Booke, de natura Deorum, affirme, that hee deserved nothing lesse; and in his Oration, pro domo sua, reprocheth Clodius for his incest, by the name of Jupiter. His buriall was in Crete (faith Lucian.) Cretenses non solum natum apud se, & sepultum Jovem testantur, sed 20 etiam sepulchrum ejus oftendunt; The Cretians or Candians doe not onely avow that Jupiter was borne and buried among them, but they shew his grave and sepulchre: which Epiphanius also confirmeth; for in his time there remained the monuments of his tombe in the Mountaine Jasius. This Callimachus in his hymnes also witnesseth, but, as offended thereat, faith thus: The Cretians ever lyars were, they care not what they fay:

Diodorus Siculus tells by way of report from the Libyan fables, confirmed (as hee 3 faith) by some Greeke Writers, that the originall of these gods was from the Westerne parts of Africa. For there among the Atlantida reigned one uranus (which fignifieth Heaven) called so for his great skill in Astrologie; and for his knowledge, and benefits to the people, honoured by them as a god after his death. He had by many wives 45. fons; but by his principall wife Titea, hee had feventeene fonnes and two daughters, all which were called after their mothers name, the Titanes. Of Titea, likewise it is said, that she for her goodnesse was canonized as a goddesse, being dead, and called the Earth, as her husband was stiled Heaven. But of all the children of Titea, her daughter Basilea (which name founding as Queene in English, shee is by the Latine translator of Diodorus called Regina) excelling the rest as farre in vertue as in yeeres, was by generall consent of her brethren, and of the people, appointed to rule as Queene after her fathers death, being as yet a Virgin. Shee tooke to husband her brother Hyperion, to whom she bare a some and a daughter, called Sunne and Moone. The beauty and towardlinesse of these children moved her brethren to envie, and bred in them a feare of being excluded from the fuccession: wherefore they tooke the boy and drowned him in the River Eridanus, now called Poe. The losse of this childe caused his fister to breake her owne necke; and the losse of both her children made the mother to play many madde pranckes, dancing with Cymbals, after a wilde fashion, in fight of all the people, before whom shee is faid to have vanished away. Ere shee died, her sonne (as the fable hath it) signified unto her in a dreame, that hee and his fifter, by the providence of God, should become immortall, that also the Sunne and Moone should be called by their names, and that their death should bee revenged upon the Murderers. According to which it is faid, that the people did so call those two Planets, and withall held her selfeasa goddesse, and termed her the great Mother, which name they had formerly given to her, for her motherly care in cherishing her brethren whilest they were young. Hyptrion and his race being extinguished, the other sonnes of uranus divided the Kingdome. Of these Atlas and Saturne were chiefe. Atlas reigned over the countries lying about the Mountaines, which afterward bare his name; a just and wife Prince, deepely skillfull in Aftrologie, and for invention of the Spheare, faid to have supported Heaven

Hee had many fonnes; but the principall of them called Hefperus, being of his Fathers qualities and studies, was faid to have beene carried away by the winde, from the top of an high Hill in the middest of his contemplations; and his name in honour of him, imposed by the people upon the morning Starre. The seven Daughters of Atlas were alfo faid to have beene excellent Ladies, who accompanying fuch as came to bee Deified. or registred among the Worthies, brought forth children, answerable in qualitie to those that begatethem. Of these it is held, that the seven Starres called Plesades tooke name. Saturne, the brother of Atlas, reigned in Sicilia, part of Africke, and Italya Aubiter, another of the Sonnes of Uranus, reigned in Crete; who had ten sonnes, which hee called Curetes; hee called that Iland after his wives name, Idea; in which Isle hee dved, and was buried. But this Jupiter must not have beene that great one, but Uncle to the great Jupiter, if these fables of the Libyans were true. Saturne (as these Libyans tell the tale) was a great Tyrant, and fortifyed strong places, the better to keepe his people in Subjection. His fifter Rhea was married to Hammon, who reigned in some part of Africke. Hammon loving others as well as his Wife, or better, got a Daughter called Minerva, neare to the river Triton, who thereupon was called Tritonia. Hee also begate on Amalihea a sonne called Bacchus, whom hee caused secretly, for feare of his life, to bee brought up at Nysa, an Iland in the river Triton, under the tuition of his Daughter Minerva and certaine Nymphs. To Amalthea hee gave in reward a goodly O Countrey, that lay on the Sea-coast, bending in forme of a horne, whence grew the tale of Amalthea's plentifull horne, famous among the Poets. When Rhea heard these newes, shee fled from her husband to her brother Saturne, who not onely entertained her as a fifter, but tooke her to Wife, and at her instigation made warre upon Hammon. vanquished him by the affistance of the Titanes, and made him flee into Crete. The Curetes Funiters children before mentioned, held the Island at that time; which was new named Crete by Hammon, after the name of Creta the Kings daughter, whom hee tooke to wife, and had with her (women, as may feeme, being very gracious in those names) the Kingdome. Backhus was growne a proper young man, had found out the making of Wine, the art of planting Trees, and many things else commodious for mankinde, before the flight of his Mother in law. Now therefore hearing report of all that had have pened, and that Saturne was comming against him with the Tirans; hee levied an Armie, to which the Amazons, living not farre from Nyla, added great forces, in love of Minerva, who was entred into their profession. So Bacchus leading the men, and Min nerva the women, they fet forward against Saturne, met him, overthrew him, and taking many of the Titans prisoners, returned to Nysa; where pardoning the prisoners, that promifed to become his true followers, he prepared for a second expedition. In the fecond expedition he behaved himselfe so well, that he wan the love of all the peopleby whom hee passed: insomuch that partly for good affection to him, partly in hatred of Saturns rigorous government, hee was greatly strengthened, and the enemy as o muchenfeebled by daily revolts. Comming to the Citie of Hammon, hee wan a battaile of Saturne before the very walls. After which, Saturne with his wife Rhea fled by night, fetting the Towne on fire to despight Bacchus. But they were caught in their flight. pardoned by Bacchus, and kindely entreated. Saturne had a young fonne by Rhea called Jupiter. This childe Bacehus tooke with him in a great Expedition that he made into the East Countries: and comming into Egypt, he left this Jupiter, being then a boy, Governour of the Countrey; but appointed unto him as an Over-seer, one Olympus, of whom Jupiter grew to bee called Olympus. Whilest Bacchus travailed through all Nations, as farre as into India, doing good in all places, and teaching many things profitable to the life of man; the Titanes had found out his father Hammon in Crete, and began to warre upon him. But Bacchus returned out of India, with whom Jupiter from Egypt, and his fifter Minerva, together with the rest, that afterwards were held as gods. Joyning all their forces, went into Crete, overthrew the Titanes, chased them, tooke and lew them, and freed the World of them all. After all this, when Hammon and Bacchus were dead, they were deified; and the great Impiter, the fonne of Saturne, succeeding them, reigned Lord alone over all the world, having none of the Titans left alive, nor any other to diffurbe him. Betweene this tale of the Libyan gods, and the Egyptian fables of Ofiris, there is a rude refemblance, that may cause them both to bee taken for the crooked Images of some one true history. For the expeditions of ofiris, and of Sanchoniato (as Eusebius cites him) would have all these to be Phanicians, and is earnest in saying, That it is a true storie, and no allegorie. Yet he makes it sceme the more allegoricall, by giving to uraor Heaven for daughters, Fate, & Beauty, and the like, with addition of much fabulous matter, omitted by Dodorus, though Diodorus have enough. To the Genealogy hee addes Elius or the Sunne, as father of Uranus, and among the children of Uranus, Japetus, to Battlus, and Dogon (whom Diodorus doth not mention by their names) giving withall to Uranus the proper name of Terrenus or Indigena, and of Illus to Saturne, but omitting Jupiter of Crete. The pedigree of them is this.

of Cham, and other wicked ones, whereof some gate, some affected the name of Gods.

F Jupiter Belus, the fon of Saturnus Babylonicus, otherwise Nimrod, it seemerly that Cicero had not heard, (at least by that name) who was more antient than any of the former three by him remembred: for long after these times were the Greekes but Salvages, if they feeke no farther off for their Gods.

But the Egyptians, even after the floud, began (fomewhat before this Chaldean Funiter) to intitle Cham, the parent of their owne Mizraim, Jupiter Chammon or Hammon. 10 For the Etymologie of this word (Hammon) which the Greekes deduce ab arens from the lands, is ridiculous (faith Pencer;) neither yet is his owne much better, who brings it pencer de Oratio from Hammath, which fignifieth heat : because the said Temple of Jupiter Hammon was to feated in Libya, where the aire is exceeding hot and scorching. And as for the antiquitie of the latter Jupiter (among the Greeks and Romanes the most renowned) it is certain that he was borne not long before the warre of Troy, as by many of his fonnesis made manifest; namely, Castor, Pollux, Hercules, Sarpedon, and others, which lived in that age of Priamus, under whom, and with whom Troy was destroyed.

Now feeing that mortall men, and the most wicked, were esteemed immortall among the Heathen; it was not to be wondred at, that Alexander Macedon, Tyberius, Nero, Calighta, and others, fought to be numbred among them, who were as deformed monsters as the rest: for by what reason could the same Deity be denied unto Laurentia and Flora which was given to Venus? feeing they were as notorious and famous harlots as the was.

6. V I I. That the wifer of the antient Heathen had farre better opinions of God-

Ut that ever Pythagoras, or Plato, or Orpheus, with many other antient and ex-Cellently learned, beleeved in any of these sooleries, it cannot be suspected, though some of them (over-busily) have mixed their owne inventions with the Scriptures: for, in punishment for their fictions, did Pythageras hang both Homer and He-Godus in Hell, where hee fained that they were perpetually stung and pinched with Serpents. Yet it cannot be doubted, but that Homer had read over all the bookes of Moles. as by places stolne thence, almost word for word, may appeare; of which Justine Martyr remembreth many in that treatise converted by Mirandula. As for Plato, though he diffembled in somethings for feare of the Inquisition of the Areopagites, vet Saint Augustine hath already answered for him (as before remembred) Et mirifice iis delectatus est, qua de uno Deo tradita fuerant; And he was greatly delighted in the dollrine of one God, faith Justine Martyr. Now howfoever Lactantius pleased to reprehend Plato, because (faith he) Plato sought knowledge from the Egyptians, and the Chaldwans, neg- Eust, prep. But whether it were out of the same vanity, which possessed all those learned Phi- Ambr. ad Iven. losophers and Poets, that Plato also published (not under the right Authours names) are peo. u. r. those things which hee had read in the Scriptures; or fearing the severity of the A- musseu mons reopagites, and the example of his Master Socrates, by them put to death by poyson, hishill: a house I cannot judge. Justine Martyr (as it feemeth) ascribeth it wholly to Platots feare, whereincapitally whosewords, among many other of the same effect, are these; Plato Moss men-matters were tryed; so called tionem facere, ob id, quod unum solumque Deum docucrat, sibi apud Athenienses tutum at inchesausa non putavit, veritus Areopagum; Plato fearing the Areopagites thought it not safe Morstherein for him among the Athenians to make mention of Moles, that hee taught that there is but cause forthe one God. quod existit; for Moses saith, Heemho is; Plato, That which is. Now of Gods incomprehenfible nature, and of the difficulty either to conceive, or expresse the same, hee giveth this testimony : Genitorem Universitatis tam difficile est invenire, quam inventum imposibile digne profari; It is as hard to find out the Creator of the Universall, as it is imposi fible, if hewere found, to (peake of him worthily . And what can bee more agreeable to the Majefty of Gods Nature, than this property by Ptato acknowledged? Deus bonus, & quidem, Deus causa bonorum: malorum autem omnium non causa; God is absolutely good, and fo (affuredly) the cause of all that is good: but of any thing that is evil he is no cause at all: and againe, Charitas Des fuit causa factionis mundi, o originis omnium rerum; The love of God was the cause of the worlds creating, and the original of all things. Apaleius the Platonist: Summus Deus infinitus est, non solum loci exclusione, sed etiam natura dignitate: & nihil est Deo smilius & gratius, quam vir animo perfectobonus; The most high God is also an infinite Gad, not onely by exclusion of place, but by the dignity of nature : neither is there any thing more like or more acceptable to Godthan a man of a perfect heart. THALES affirmed that God comprehended all things, and that God was of all things the most antient: Quia nunquam effe capit; Because he never had any beginning. ZENO, that God beheld even the thoughts of men. Athenodorus, that therefore all men ought to be carefull in the actions of their life, because God was every where present and beheld all done. But what can be more agreeable to Moles story of the Creation, than this opinion and description of the Worlds beginning in Europides, Scholler of Anaxagoras?

Cælumterrag; unius formæ fuit: Sed cum fuissent abjuncta amplexu mutuo, Emersit omnis in lucem res progenita; Arbores, aves, fera, quasq; affert mare, Genusq; mortalium. Heaven and Earth one forme did beare: But when dif-joined once they were From mutuall embraces, All things to light appeared then; Of trees, birds, beafts, fishes, and men

The still-remaining races.

And as in Pythagoras, in Socrates, and in Plato: fo we finde the fame excellent understanding in Orpheus, who every where expressed the infinite and sole power of one God; though he use the name of Juniter, thereby to avoide the envie and danger of the time: but that hee could attribute those things to the sonnes of men, and mortall creatures, which hee doth to this Jupiter, there is no man who hath ever heard of God, that can imagine.

Nomina Deorum (faith MIRANDULA) quos ORPHBUS canit, non decipientium demonum, à quibus malum & non bonum provenit; sed naturalium virtuium divinarumg; sunt nomina; The names of those Gods whom Orpheus doth sing, are not of deceiving Devils, from whom evill comes, and not goodnesse; but they are the names of natural and divine vertues. Yea, that he yet reacheth higher, and speaketh of God himselfe, this his instruction to Museus and the Hymne following, teach us: Respiciens vero ad divinum hunc sermonem ei diligenter animum adverte, intendens cordis rationis capax conceptaculum: rectam autem ascende viam, & solum aspice mundiregem. Unus est ex se genitus, ex eo omnia nata sunt: ipsevero in illis versatur, nec quisquam eum intueri potest mortalium, sed ipse nihilominus om an eximuterum.

Then marking this my facred speech, but truely lend Thy heart, that's reasons sphere, and the right way ascend,
And see the worlds sole King. First, he is simply one,
Begotten of himselfe, from whom is borne alone
All else; in which hee's still: nor could it ere befall
A mortall eye to see him once, yet hee sees all.

Now befides these former testimonies, that all the learned men of ancient times were not fo stupid and ignorant, as the Egyptians, Græcians, and other Nations by them infected were, I will onely repeate two or three other opinions, and leave the Reader to those large and learned Collections of Justine Martyr, Clemens, Lactantius, Eusebius, Eugubinus, Peucer, Plesis, Danaus, and others. For Cleanthes the Stoick, being demanded of what nature God was, described him by these attributes and properties: Bonus, justus. Canctus, feipfum possidens, utilis, speciosus, optimus, severus, liber, semper commodus, tutus, gloriosus, charitas, &c. Good, just, holy, possessing bimselfe, profitable, beautifull, best. fevere, free, alwaies doing good, safe without fcare, glorious, and selfe-charity. Epicharmus affirmed that God who beheld all things, and pierced every nature, was onely and eve-20 ry where powerfull : agreeing with Democritus: Rex omnium iple folus: Hee is the onely King of kings: and with Pindarus the Poet, Deus unus, Pater, creator summus, atque optimus artifex, qui progressus singulis diversos secundum merita prabet; One God, the Father. the most high Creator, and best artificer, who giveth to every thing divers proceedings according to their deferts. This God (faith Antisthenes) cannot bee resembled to any thing, and therefore not elsewhere knowne; Nisi in patria illa perenni, cujus imaginem nullam habes : Save onely in that everlasting Countrey, whose image thou hast none at all. Hereof also Xenophanes Colophonius : Unus Deus inter deos & homines maximus, nec corpore, nec mente mortalibus similis . There is one God among gods and men most powerfull neither corporally nor mentally like unto mortals: and Xenophon, Deus qui omnia quatit, & omnia quief-30 cere facit, magnus potensque quod omnibus pates: qualis autem forma sit, nemini pates, nihipsi foli, qui luce sua omnia perlustrat; God who shaketh all things, and setteth all things at rell, is great and mighty; as is manifest to all : but of what forme he is, it is manifest to none? (ave onely to himselfe, who illuminateth allthings with his owne light. Finally, Plato faith. Totius rerum natura caufa, & ratio, & origo Deus, summus animi genitor, aternus animantium Cobitator, assiduus mundi sui opifex, fine propagatione genitor, neque loco, neq temporeullo comprehensus, eog. paucis cogitabilis, nemini effabilis; God is the cause, ground, and oginall of the whole nature of things, the most high Father of the soule, the eternal preserver ofliving creatures, the continuall framer of his world, a begetter without any propagation. comprehended neither in any place, nor time; therefore few can conceive him in thought. 40 none can expresse what he is. Therefore was it said by Saint Hierome, Si enim cunctos Phi- Hieronin com.

losophorum revolvas libros, necesse est utin eis reperias aliquam partem vasorum Dei, ut a- in Danin princip; pud Platonem, fabricatorem mundi Deum : apud Zenonem, Stoicorum Principem, in eros Emmortales animas, &c. If thou consider all the bookes of the Philosophers, thou canst not but finde in them some part of the Vessels of God, as in Plato, God the Creatour of the world: in Zeno, Prince of the Stoickes, Hell and immortall foules, &c. And this is certaine. that if we looke into the wisedome of all Ages, wee shall finde that there never was man of folid understanding or excellent judgement: never any man whose minde the Art of education hath not bended; whose eyes a foolish superstition hath not afterward blinded: whose apprehensions are sober, and by a pensive inspection advised; but that hee hath o found by an unrefiltable necessity, one true God, and everlasting being, all for ever caufing, and all for ever fultaining; which no man among the Heathen hath with more reverence acknowledged, or more learnedly exprest, than that Egyptian Hermes, howfoever it fayled afterward in his posterity: all being at length by divellish policie of the Egyptian Priests purposely obscured; who invented new gods, and those innumerable, best forting (as the Devill perswaded them) with vulgar capacities, and fittest to keepe in awe and order their common people.

6. VIII.

That Heathenisme and Judaisme, after many wounds, were at length about the same time under Julian miraculoully confounded.

D Ut all these are againe vanished: for the inventions of mortall men are no lesse mortall than themselves. The Fire, which the Chaldwans worshipped for a god, is crept into every mans chimney, which the lacke of fuell starveth, water quencheth, and want of ayre furfocateth: Jupiter is no more vexed with Junoes Jealousies; Death hath perswaded him to chastity, and her to patience; and that time which hath devoured it selfe, hath also eaten up both the Bodies and Images of him and his : yea their stately Temples of Stone and durefull Marble. The houses and sumptuous buildings erected to Baal, canno where bee found upon the earth, nor any monument of that 10 glorious Temple consecrated to Diana. There are none now in Phoenicia that lament the death of Adonis; nor any in Libya, Creta, Thessalia, or elsewhere, that can aske counfaile or helpe from Jupiter. The great god Pan hath broken his Pipes, Apolloes Priests are become speechlesse, and the Trade of riddles in Oracles, with the Devills telling mens fortunes therein, is taken up by counterfait Egyptians, and couzening Aftrologers.

But it was long ere the Devill gave way to these his over-throwes and dishonours: for after the Temple of Apollo at Delphos (one of his chiefe mansions) was many times robbed, burnt, and destroyed; yet by his diligence the same was often enriched, repay-20 red, and re-edifyed againe, till by the hand of God himfelfe it received the last and utter fubversion. For it was first robbed of all the Idolls and Ornaments therein by the Eubæan Pyrates: Secondly, by the Phlegians utterly fackt: Thirdly by Pyrrbus the fonne of Achilles: Fourthly, by the armie of Xerxes: Fiftly, by the Captaines of the Phocenses : Sixtly, by Nero : who carried thence five hundred brazen Images: all which were new made, and therein againe fet up at the common charge. But what soever was gathered betweene the time of Nero and Constantine, the Christian armie made spoile of, defacing as much as the time permitted them: notwithstanding all this, it was againe gloriously rebuilt, and so remained till such time as Julian the Apostata sent thither to know 30 the successe of his Parthian enterprise, at which time it was utterly burnt and consumed with fire from Heaven, and the Image of Apollo himselfe, and all the rest of the Idols herein, molten downe, and lost in the earth.

The like successe had the Jewes in the same fulians time, when by his permission they affembled themselves to rebuild the Temple of Jerusalem: for while they were busied to lay the foundations, their buildings were overthrowne by an earth-quake, and many thousands of the Jewes were overwhelmed with the ruines, and others slaine, and scattered by Tempest and Thunder: though Am. Marcellinus report it more favourably for the Jewes, ascribing this to the nature of that Element. For, saith hee, Allypius and the Ruler of the province of Judæa, being by Julian busied in the re-edifying of this Temple, flaming Balls of fire iffuing neere the foundation, and oft confuming the Worke-men, made the enterprize frustrate.

Of the last refuges of the Devill to maintaine his Kingdome.

Ow the Devill, because hee cannot play upon the open Stage of this World, (as in those dayes) and being still as industrious as ever, findes it more for his advantage to creepe into the mindes of men; and inhabiting in the Temples of their hearts, works them to a more effectuall adoration of himselfe than ever. For whereas he first taught them to sacrifice to Monsters, to dead stones cut into faces of 50 Beafts, Birds, and other mixt Natures; he now fets before them the high and shining Idoll of glory, the All-commanding Image of bright Gold. Heetels them that truth is the Goddesse of dangers and oppressions, that chassity is the enemie of Nature, and lastly, that as all vertue (in generall) is without tafte; so pleasure satisfieth and delightethevery sense for true wisedome (faith hee) is exercised in nothing else, than in the obtayning of power to oppresse, and of riches to maintaine plentifully our worldly delights. And if this Arch-Politician finde in his pupils any remorfe, any feeling or feare of Gods future judgement, hee perswades them that God hath so great neede of mens soules, that hee will accept them at any time, and upon any condition: interrupting by his vigilant endeavours all offer of timefull returne towards God, by laying those great blockes of rugged poverty and despised contempt in the narrow passage leading to his divine presence. But as the minde of man hath two Ports, the one alwaies frequented by the entrance of manifold vanities; the other defolate and over-growne with graffe, by which enter our charitable thoughts and divine contemplations: fo hath that of death a double and twofold opening, worldly mifery paffing by the one, worldly prosperity by the other: at the entrance of the one we find our fufferings and patience to attend us: (all which have gone before us to prepare our joyes) at the other our cruelties, coverousnesse, lio centiousnesse, injustice, and oppressions (the Harbingers of most fearefull and terrible forrow) flaying for us. And as the Devillour most industrious enemy was ever most diligent: fo is he now more laborious than ever, the long day of Mankind drawing fast towards an evening, and the Worlds Tragedy and time neere at an end.

CHAP. VII.

Of NOAHS Floud.

6. I.

Of Gods fore-warning: and some humane testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of Noahs Floud.

F this destruction it pleased God to give warning unto Noah: who (saith Josephus) fearing to perish among the rest, Secedens cum suis in aliam regio- Topphlic. nem migravit: He departed with his children, and travailed into another region. And of these Giants from whom Noah withdrew himselfe, Berofus writeth in this manner; That they exceeded in all forts of inhumane and unnaturall wickednesse, and that they were contemptores or religionis of deorum: contemners of religion and of the Gods: among which mighty men (faith Berofus) unus erat qui deorum venerantior & prudentior cunitie Gr. huic nomen erat Noah: There was one more wife and reverencing the Gods than the rest, whose name was Noah: who with his three sonnes. Sem, Taphetus, and Cham, and with their Wives, and the Wife of Noah, (namely Tited the great, Pandora, Noela, and Noegla) preserved themselves in the Arke. This Arke God General commanded Noah to prepare: And God (and unto Noah, Make thee an Arke of Pinetrees: thou shalt make Cabines in the Arke, and Shalt pitchit within and without with Pitch. For God made Noah to know, that arrend of all flesh was at hand, and that the graves of the

to rebellious and cruell Generations were already fashioned in the Clouds, which soone after should swallow up and cover all living creatures which breathed in the aire, Noah and his family excepted.

But this univerfall grave of waters, and generall Deluge hath not beene received by all: for divine testimonies doe not perswade all naturall men to those things to which theirown reason cannot reach: Dum obvoluta in obscuro veritas latet : Whill the truth li- Latinpresta ethorapt up in obscurity. Many there are who have disputed against the universality of falfareig. this overflowing, and have judged that this floud of Noah fell but in some particular places and kingdomes: moved fo to thinke, because in elder ages there have bin many other flouds (as they suppose) of that nature. Hereof Nicholas Damascenus writeth in this manoner, as his words are cited by Josephus. Est super Minyadam excelsus mous in Armenia, qui Josan. Lit. 4. Baris appellatur, in quo multos confugientes fermo est diluvii tempore liberatos, & quendam Euflb. depropile Simul in Arca devettum in hujus vertice hasisse, lignorumq; reliquias multo tempore conser-Vatas, qui fortasse is fisit de quo etiam Moses Judaorum legislator scribit : thus far this Author. There is (faith he) above Minyada (or the country of Minya) an exceeding bigh mountaine in Armenia called Baris:on which it is reported, that many having fled thither, were faved in the time of the deluge: and that one was carried in an arke, and rested upon the top of the mountaine, whereon there remained a long time after certain pieces thereof, and this might be the same of which Moses the Law-giver of the Jewes makes mention. And of this opinion were the Thalmudists (faith Annius) that many Giants faved themselves upon Mount

But Berofus (who, after Moses, was one of the most antient, howsoever he hath been fince deformed and corrupted) doth in the substance of all agree with Moses as touching the generall Floud, taking from thence the beginning of his History in these words: Ante aquarum cladem famojam, qua universus persit Orbis, &c. Before that famous destruction on of Waters, by which the World univerfall perished : witnessing withall, that Noah with his wife Titea, and his three fons with their wives (in all eight persons) were only saved.

Of the Floud in the time of Ogyges: and that this was not Noahs Floud.

Ut from the vanity of the Greekes, the Corrupters of all truth (faith Lastantius) who without all ground of certainty vaunt their Antiquity, came the errour first of all: who therein flattering themselves also, sought to perswade the world that there was no Floud preceded the Floud of ogyges, King of the Thebans in Bæotia, or rather of Attica; and therefore (faith Rhodiginus) Ogygumid appellant Poeta, tanquam pervetus dixeris, ab Ogyge vetustisimo : The Poets gave the name of Ogygia to things ex-1 ceeding ancient, as of Ogyges the most ancient.

But let Ogyges be as ancient as those mencan make him, yet it is manifest that hee lived but in Jacobs time (though Eufebius makes him later, and in Mofes time) and was born 67. yeeres after him. There is also an opinion that Ogyges was Cadmus (and then was he farre later) as Rhodiginus in the ninth booke of his Antiquities remembreth: Sunt tamen qui in Aegypto regnasse autumant bunc : unde sit Cadmus qui in Graciam profectus Thebas condidit à bove jugulato sic nuncupatas; quoniam Syrorum lingua Bos dicitur Thebe. There are (faith hee) who thinke that this Ogyges did reigne in Egypt, whereby he should be Cadmus, whotravailing into Greece built Thebes, sonamed of a Beefe slaine : because inthe Sqrian Language, a Beefe is called Thebe.

But this Floud of Ogyges fell in the yeere of the World, 3440. according to Eufebius, who followed the account of the Septuagint: and the Floud of Noah in the yeere 2242. after the same account: and so there came 1200. betweene these Flouds, wanting but two, though herein Eusebius was much mistaken, and corrected this opinion in his Chronologie. Now although the very yeere and time of this overflowing in Achaia, or rather Attica, bee not precisely set downe, but that there is a great difference among Writers; yet who soever makes it most ancient, findes above 500, yeeres difference betweene that

For Paulus Orosius affirmes that this tempest fell upon the Athenians, but 1040. yeers before Rome was built. Bucholz erus fairh, it was 1043. elder than Rome; which was founded (according to the same BucholZerus) in the worlds yeere 3219. though after the account which I follow (and whereof I will give my reasons in the Story of Abraham) it was built in the Worlds yeere, 3280. Now the generall Floud preceded the building of Rome (faith Buchalzerus) 1563. yeeres: and the Floud of Ogyges (as before) 1043 Hence it followeth by easie calculation, that (if hee place Ogyges in his true age) the difference betweene the set wo. Flouds must bee 520. yeeres, to which wee (allowing 600 Xenophor Anni- more) find 5 80. And that this of Ogyges was not the same of Noah (except we call Noah, Ogyges Prisess, as some doe) it appeares by this, that the Floud of Ogyges then King of Attica or Ogygia, did not extend it selfe any farther than the bankes of Archi-pelago, or the Aegaan Sea. For whereas Mela, Pliny, and Solinus witnesse, that the City of Joppe in Judæa was founded before the Floud; and that (notwithstanding the waight of Waaniquisimum or-ters) there remained on certaine Altars of stone, the Title of the King, and of his Brother beroio, utpote an- Phiness, with many of the grounds of their Religion: fure it is no where found among prophane Historians, nor in the Scriptures, that ever the Floud of ogyges spred it selferver any part of Syria, much leffe over all the earth. But that it drowned both the Regions of Attica about Athens, and that of Achaia in Peloponnesus, it is very probable. For it feemeth that at that time it was, when Helice and Bura were swallowed up (Cities feat ted on the North part of Peloponnesus): of which ovid:

Si quaras Helican & Buran Achaidos urbes. Invenies sub aquis.

Bura and Helice, on Achaian ground Are fought in vaine, but under Sea are found.

Of this Floud of Ogyges was invented the Fable of Apollo and Diana. For Latone, the Mattendian daughter of Caus, the sonne of Titan, being beloved and forced by Jupiter, and by him gotten with child, Juno thereat enraged, permitted her (as they fay) no part of the Earth to be delivered on; and withall, caused the monstrous Serpent Python to follow & affright her, where foever the travelled still at length arriving at the Ile of orthgia, the was there received; in which she was delivered, first of Diana, and then of Apollo, being Twins: whereof Barlaam makes this exposition: That at such time as the Deluge (which happened in Ogyges his reigne) ceased, out of the abundant moisture of the Earth (heat by putrefaction being thereto mixed) there were exhaled fuch thicke mifts and fogges, that in Attica, and along the Coasts of the Aegean Sea, neither the beames of the Sunne by day, nor of the Moone by night, could pierce the ayre, or be perceived by the inhabitants: fo as when at length (the Earth being dryed, and these vapours dissipated) the ayre began to be cleare, the people of Ortygia espyed the light of the Moone somewhat be- Plint 4.11 fore day, and in the fame morning the Sunne also appeared : fabulously (because Diana represented the Moone, and Apollo the Sunne) they were reported to be borne in the Ile of Ortreia, thereof afterwards called Delos; which fignifieth manifestation.

And furely it is not improbable, that the Floud of Ogyges, being fo great, as Histories have reported it, was accompanied with much alteration of the ayre, sensibly discerned in those parts, and some unusuall face of the Skyes. Varro in his Bookes de gente popule Romani (as he is cited by Saint Augustine) reporteth out of Castor, that so great a mi- Augusticities racle happened in the Starre of Venus, as never was seene before, nor in after-times: For the colour, the greatnesse, the figure, and the course of it, were changed. This fell out, as Adrastus Cy Zicenus, and Dion Neapolites, farnous Mathematicians, affirmed, in the time of Ogyges.

Now concerning the course of that or any other Planet, I do not remember, that I have any where read of fo good Astrologers, flourishing among the Greekes, or elsewhere in those dayes as were likely to make any calculation of the revolutions of the Planets, so exact, that it should need no reformation: Of the colour and magnitude. I see no reason, why the difference found in the Starre of Venus, should be held miraculous; confidering, that leffer mifts and fogges than those which covered Greece with so long darkneffe do familiarly present our senses with as great alterations in the Sunne and Moone. That the figure should varie, questionlesse it was very strange: Yet I cannot hold it any prodigie: for it stands well with good reason, that the side of Venus which the Sunne beholds, being enlightned by him, the opposite halfe should remaine shadowed; whereby that Planet would, unto our eyes, descrying onely that part whereon the light falleth, apmare to be horned, as the Moone doth feeme ; if distance (as in other things) did not hinder the apprehension of our senses.

A worthy Astrologer now living, who by the helpe of perspective Glasses hath found in the Starres many things unknowne to the Ancients, affirmeth so much to have beene ill covered in Venus, by his lare observations. Whether some watrie disposition of the wre might present as much to them that lived with Ozyges, as Galilaus hath seen through his Instrument; I cannot tell: fure I am, that the discoverie of atruth formerly unknown, both rather convince Man of ignorance, than Nature of error. One thing herein is worthy be noted, that this great, but particular Floud of Ogyges, was (as appeareth by this of Saint Augustine) accompanied with such unusuall (and therefore the more dreadfull though naturall) fignes, testifying the concurrence of causes with effects in that inundation; whereas the Floud of Noah, which was generall, and altogether miraculous, may feme to have had no other token, or fore-flewing, than the long preaching of Noah himselfe, which was not regarded : for they were eating and drinking, when the Floud Luke 17.00.17 ame fuddenly and tooke them all away.

H

Of Deucations Floud: and that this was not Noans Floud: nor the Umbii in Italie a remnant of any univer (all Floud.

Second Floud of great fame, and of which the time is more certaine, was that of Deucalion in Thessalia; of which S. Augustine out of Varro: His temporibus (ut AVARRO (cribit) regnante Athenien libus CRANAO, successore CECROPIS (ut autem nostri, Eus e e ius & Hieronymus) adhuc eodem Ce crope permanente, diluvium fuit, quod appellatum est Delicationis : (that is) In thefe times (as VARRO reporteth) CRANAUS the successor of Cecrops governing the Athenians, or (as our Eusebius and HIEROME (ay) CECROPS yet living, that Floud (called Deucalions) happened.

And in the beginning of the eleventh Chapter of the same eighteenth Booke, he useth these words :Eduxit ergo Mos Es ex Egypto populum Dei novissimo tempore Cecropis Atheniensium Regis, cum apud Assyrios regnaret Ascatades, apud Sicyonios Marathus, apud Argivos Tripas: Mos Es led the people of God out of Egypt about the later time of Cecrops King of the Athenians, Ascatades raigning over the Assyrians, over the Sicyonians Marathus, and over the Argives Triopas. So as leaving the curiofitie of a few yeeres, more or leffe, it appeareth, that this Floud of Deucalion was either at the egreffion of the children of Ifrael out of Egypt, or neere it: and then after Noah 753. yeers, according to Functius, who makes Cecrops to live in the yeere of the World 2409. or if we follow Mercator, then 739. yeeres after Noah, and in the yeere of the World 2395. But if Deucation wereborne in the age of the World 2356. according to Code. man; then giving unto Deucation 40. yeeres of age when this Floud happened, it falleth within one yeere of Mercators account. But Deucalion by all approved Historiansis faid to have beene 82 yeeres old at that time. Now Clemens Alexandrinus dates the time of this Floud of Dencalion, and the conflagration and burning in Phaetons time, by the reigne of Crotopus, King of the Argives; but Crotopus lived King of the Argives fixe yeeres after Israel departed Egypt, which makes twenty yeeres difference, according to Functius, who will have this Floud and Burning to have fallen 14 yeeres before Most left Egypt: for he gave of the Worlds yeeres to the Floud and Burning the yeere 2440 and to Moses his egression the yeere 2434. And yet Cedrenus thinkes that Moses was more ancient, and lived with Inachus; but that cannot be true: for then had the Flow of Deucation, and the burning of Phaeton, preceded the Floud of Ogyges, which is denyed by all: for that of Thessalie (called Deucations) followed that of Attica (called Ogygia) at least 250 veeres, or thereabouts. Eusebins in his Chronologie makes it 230. & so doth P. Orolius: Eufebius about the 50. yeere of Moses life, and Cyrillus about the 67. and both after Noahs Floud 770 veeres: for these be Clemens Alexandrinus his words: Fut autem in Gracia tempore quidem Phornei, qui fuit post Inachum, inundatio que sui tempore Ogygis: There happened in Greece in the time of Phorneus, who lived after Inachus, the Floud of Ogyges. Now if the Floud of Ogyges in Attica were 1020. 01 1016. yeeres before the first Olympiad, according to Eusebius and Orosius; (as before)than is it manifest, that taking 763 out of this number of 1020 it fals out, that Ogyges Floud happened before the Hebrewes left Egypt 250. yeeres, or 260. yeeres, according to the difference betweene the opinions of Eusebius and Orofius. And for my selfe (who rather follow those Chronologers, which give 60 yeeres more to Abraham after the Flond, than the rest) I reckon the times which come betweene these Flouds in this fort. The generall Floud was in the yeere of the World 1656. Jacob was borne in the yeere of the World 2169 so as from the beginning of the Floud to Jacobs birth, there were confirmed 513. yeeres. Ogyges Floudhappened 100. yeeres after Jacob was borne; and there fore after the generall Floud 613. yeeres. Now Deucation was borne in the yeere of the World 2356 and had lived 82 yeeres, when his Kingdome of Thessale was overwhelmed; (which added to 2356.make 2438.) his Floud was after Noahs Floud ended, 782. yeeres. And hereto Annius his Xenophon agreeth, who makes 700. yeeres betweene the generall Floud and Deucalions birth; to which adde 82. yeeres of his Age (as before) and then the Floud of Thessalie followed the generall 782 yeeres. The words of that bout 306 yeeres before the Warre of Troy, Lyraon then governing Arcadia: who being Kenophon are these: Ab inundatione terrarum ad ortum Deucalionis, secundo anni Sphaeri, septingenti supputantur anni, qui natus annos duos & octoginata The saliam vidit inundatam: From the drowning of the World to the birth of Deucalien, in the second geere of Sph ERUs, are numbred 700. yeeres, and when Deucalion was 82. yeeres olds besaw Thessalia drowned. This Floud happened in the Winter time about Parnasses: witnesse Aristotle in the first of his Meteors. And Varro (whom Saint Augustine so often city) citeth for his excellent Learning, especially in Antiquities) findeth this Floud of Deucation to have happened in the time of Cranaus, who fucceeded Cecrops: Orofias thinkes it somewhat later, Amphytrion reigning in Athens, the third from Cocrops: Onely this of Deucation was very great, and reached not onely over The salie it selfe, and the Regionsadjoyning Westward, but it covered the greatest part of Italie: and either the sime, or some other particular Floud then happening, oppress Egypt, saith Eusebius. And therefore did the Greekes eyther thinke it, or faine it to be universall; and Deucalion then King, faving himselfe and some others on the Mountaine of Thessalie (of all other the highest, saith Solinus) was by reason thereof (as Strabo witnesseth) said to be the solinities preserver of Mankind. That this Floud covered a great part of Italie, Plinie and Solinus Strable, make it probable, who affirme, that the peoplethen inhabiting Italie, were therefore Pinia 3.6.14. called once quia ab imbribus diluvii superfuissent; and therefore also were they esteemed Plinibid, the most ancient Nation, as Strabo confirmeth in his first Booke, and Trezenius in his second: which umbri these Authors make the parents of the Sabines, and the Sabines to bethe Parents of the Samnites, Piceni, Lucani, Brutii, and all others inhabiting anciently the bankes of the Mediterrane Sea. But that these umbri were not the Inhabiters of Italie before the Floud of Noah, and so tooke name by faving themselves upon the Appenine Mountaines, the Scriptures teach us; shewing who, and who onely then were preserved, which is sufficient. Report hath adventured further, telling us, that the first Atherna dip. peterved, which after the generall Floud inhabited Italie, were the Camelenes; (so named noppolisone people which after the generall Floud inhabited Italie, were the Camelenes; (so named noppolisone of Draw Corey) com Camese, whom C a ro in originibus, another of Annius his Authors, names for a news saith, that confort of Janus) which people lived altogether a favage life; till fuch time as Saturne cample was the priving on those Coasts, devised Lawes to governe them by: the memorie of whose wife and fifter Acts in that Region, Diodor and Thallus among the Greekes, Nepos Cassius and Varro a- Lastinas, nong the Latines, have preserved; and of whom Virgil:

> Primus ab athereo venit SATURNUS Olympos Arma Jov 1 s fagiens & regnis exul ademptis. Is genus indocile, ac difer sum montibus altis Composuit, Legesq; dedit; Latiumq; vocari Maluit_

SATURNE descending from the Heavens high, Fearing the Armes of Jupite Rhis Sonne His Kingdome loft, and banisht thence, doth flies Rude people on the Mountaine tops he wonne To live together, and by Lawes: which dones He chose to call it Latium.

adafterward in the Verses following he speaketh of the Ausones, and after them, of the iani: Nations, which againe fought to dif-plant the ancient Inhabiters:

Tum manus Ausonia, & gentes venere Sicani. Then came th' Aufonian Bands, and the Sicanian Tribes.

Of these Sicani (which left Spaine, and fat downe in Italie) Thurydides and Plinie give Thurydles flimonie: who were againe expelled by the Ligit, faith Thucydides. After all these lantations & replantations; came the umbri, descended of the Gaules (faith Annius,) not of Annius ex Sal lose Gaules of France; but of those of Segthia, who commanded a great part of Italie, dulla venall Hetruria and Campania; as Herodotus; Plinie; and Diony sins have affured us: & ther-Herodics. ore this Floud of Deucalion was long after that of Noah. For all those Nations were plan-Dividio 13 din Italie, & dispossest of Italie again, before the Umbri were ever heard of or had being Othat Kingdome was first called Camasene, then Latium or Saturnia, then Ausonia, then icania; before the umbri (in whose time Deucations Floud happened) posses the same, lefather of two and twenty sonnes, the youngest called Oenotrius invaded Italie, who Paulandriad aveit the name of Oenotria. This name it held untill Italias of the same Nation changed lib.8. into tealie, after his owne name, about 250. yeeres before the fall of Troy. After thefe, different came the Pelassi, of whom Plinie in his third Booke and fifth Chapter, and Strabo in his fifth, Thucydides in his fixt, speake at large: and after them the Lydi, under Tyrrhenus their Captaine, that gave name to the Tyrrheni; who casting thence the Imbri, tooke from them three hundred Castles, and built therein twelve Cities; to which (after they had possest and past over the Appenine Mountaines) they added divers others, whereof Telfina (afterward Bononia) was one.

Now that there was not anciently fuch a Nation as these Umbri in those parts, I doe not affirme; having respect to the testimonies before repeated. And Stephanus thinkes, that the name was derived from the Greeke word Ombros; but that these umbri of Italie were descended of the Nation of Scythians (called Galli) it shall be shewed hereafter.

Of some other Records testifying the universall Floud and of two ancient Deluges in Egypt : and of some elsewhere.

Aint Augustine out of Varro affirmeth, that the Greekes and Latines made not any mention of the Universall Floud, because they had nothing of Antiquitie foregoing that of Ogyges; and therefore (according to Rhodoginus, before remembred) were all things among the Greekes (which antiquitie had worne out of knowledge) called ogygia, which we in English commonly call (worme-eaten) or of defaced date. But as all the parts of the Earth were successively planted and peopled; and as all Nations had their proper times, and not their beginning at once and at the instant: so did every Familie, which afterward became a great People, with whom the knowledge of divine Letters was not received, finde no Parent of more antiquitie, than fuch as they had themselves, nor allow of any before their owne, and as the Gracians, so did others vaunt themselves to be Indigena, and growing out of the Earth, or invent some other prophase or ridiculous beginning. But the Chaldeans had certaine knowledge of Noahs Floud, & Berosus witnesseth; and Nicolaus Damascenus maketh particular mention thereof (as is aforesaid though he also affirme by heare-say, that some Giants saved themselves upon the Mountaines Baris in Armenia, but speaketh not thereof as from any authoritie ap proved: using the word Sermo eft; That fuch a speech there was. And Enfebius remembred a place out of the ancient Historian Abydenus . who writteth, that Sissibrus, to preserv himselfe from a Floud fore-told him by Saturnus, fled to the Hils of Armenia by ship ad Armeniam navigio confugiebat : who the third day (after the Waters were fallen) for forth birds, that finding no land to rest on, returned againe; which he also did a secon time, but at the third returne the birds feet were covered with mudde and slime. Total effect are Eusebius words out of Abydenus, which may seeme a true description (thou in other termes) of Noabs Floud.

Cyrillus alfo affirmeth, that Alex. Polyhiftor maketh mention of this generall Flow And Plato in Timao produceth an Egyptian Priest, who recounted to Solon out of the tholy Bookes of Egypt, the storie of the Floud universal, which (faith he) happened log before the Gracian inundations. Fryer Annius his Xenophon remembreth a third Flow which also Diodorus Siculus confirmeth, somewhat more ancient than that of Ogygui Attica. For he named the generall Floud for the first, which happened (faith he) unit the old OGYGES: Sub prifeo Ogyge, which was Noah; he calleth the second Niliaca:Hocules and Prometheus then living; 44-yeere before that of Attica, in the 34. yeere of Blb chus King of the Affyrians, though I doe not beleeve him as touching the time. But Floud covered a great part of the nether Egypt, especially all the Region subject to Pro metheus; & hereof came the fable of the Vulture on Prometheus his Liver, afterward by Hercules of Egypt: which fiction Diod. Siculus delivereth in these words: Fluvium pro pter cursus velocitatem, profunditatemq; aquarum, Aquilam tunc appellatum, HERCHLE cum confilii magnituaine, tum virtute, volunt è vestigio compressisse, & aquarum impetut ad priorem cur sum convertisse: Unde & Graci quidam Poetarem gestam in fabulam verto tes, HERCULEM tradunt Aquilam PROMETHEI jecur depascentem occidiffe ; This Flow (meaning of Nilus) for the swiftnesse of his course, as also for the depth, was in thesi day called the Eagle: but HERCULES by his great judgement and vertue did againe compr and straighten this River, so far extended and over-spred, turning it into the old channels

table) devised, that Hercules slew the Eagle which fedon Prometheus Liver; meaning that he delivered Prometheus of that forrow and torment, which for the loffe of his Peonle and Countrey (by the Waters destroyed and covered over) he suffered

A fourth Floud chanced about Pharus in Egypt, where Alexander Macedon built Alexandria, as Annius conceiveth out of his Xenophon, who in this briefefort writeth of all these Inundations: Inundationes plures fuere: prima novimestris inundatio terrarum sub Xenop.de gauin. prisco Ogyge : fecunda Niliaca, & There were many Inundations (faith the same Xeno- Commercan plon:) the first, which was universall, of nine Moneths; and this happened under the first OGYGES: the fecond was Niliaca, & of one Moneths continuance, in the time of Hercules and Prometheus, Egyptians: a third of two Moneths, under Ogyges Atticus: the fourth of three moneths, in Thesalia, under Deucalion: and a fifth of the like continuance (called Pharonica) under Proteus of Egypt, about the time of Helens rape. Diodorus in his fifth Booke and eleventh Chapter, taking the Samothraces for his Authors, remembreth a Floud in Asia the lesse, and essewhere, of no lesse destruction than any of the other particular Inundations, saying, that the same happened before that of Deucalion; the Sea of

But there have bin many Flouds in divers times, and ages, not inferior to any of these two last remembred, Niliaca and Pharonica in Egypt: as in the yeere of our Redemption 190. when in October of the same yeere, Gregory then being Bishop of Rome, there happeneda marvellous overflowing in Italy, and especially in the Venetian Territorie, and in Lieuria, accompanied with a most fearefull storme of thunder and lightning after which followed the great Plague at Rome, by reason of the many dead Serpents cast up and left upon the Land, after the Waters decreased and returned. And in the yeere 1446. there perished 10000 people, by the breaking in of the Sea at Dordroch in Holland: of which Muniter, kind I take that Floud to be of Achaia or Attica. Before that, and in the yeere 1238. Trithemius speaketh of an Earthquake, which swallowed many thousands and after that Echypsis were manuscontinuis of a Floud in Friseland, in which there perished 100000 persons. Strozius Sigog. in his muta bominuo Magia omnifaria, telleth of an Inundation in Italie, in the time of Pope Damafus, in milia opposition which also many Cities of Sicil were swallowed: another in the Papacie of Alexander quagger manifestation. the fixt:also in the yeere 1515. Maximilian being Emperor. He also remembreth a peril- mos fluctus tota the fixt: also in the yeere 151). oxux omican octug Lington people perished. Likewise penesunga lous over-slowing in Polonia, about Cracovia, by which many people perished. Likewise fuit, & perienunga fuit, & perienunga fuit, & perienunga fuit of the fuit of Visinier a French Historian speaketh of a great Floud in the South part of Languedoc, plusuum which fell in the yeere of our Lord 1557 with fo dreadfull a tempest, as all the people 1000000 attended therein the very end of the World, and Judgement Day; faying, That by the violent descent of the Waters from the Mountaines, about Nismes there were removed divers old heapes and mountures of ground, and many other places torne up and rent: by which accident there was found both Coyne of Silver and Gold, divers pieces of Plate, and Vessels of other Mettall, supposed to behidden at such time as the Gothes invaded that Province in the yeere 1156.

5. V. That the Floud of NOAM was supernaturall, though some say it might have beene foreseene by the Starres.

TOw how foever all these Flouds, and many other, which have covered at several! times severall Regions, not onely in these parts of the World, but in America alfo.(as I have learned of fome ancient Southfayers among them) may be aferibedto naturall causes and accidents; yet that universall Floud (in the time of Noab) was poured over the whole face of the Earth by a power above Nature, and by the especial! commandement of God himselfe, who at that time gave strength of influence to the Starres, and abundance to the Fountaines of the Deepe: whereby the irruption of Waters was made more forcible, than any ability of nature could effect, or any fecond causes, by what foever union, could performe, without receiving from the Fountaine of all power trength, and faculties supernatural. Henricus Mechliniens a Scholler of Albertus Magnus In his Commentaries upon the great conjunctions of Alba Masar, observeth, that before the Floud of Noah, the like conjunction of Jupiter and Saturne happened in the last de-Bree of Cancer, against that constellation since called the Ship of Argos; by which the Floud of Noah might be fore-told because Cancer is both a watrie Signe, and the House of the Moone, which is the Ladie of the Sea, and of Moysture, according to the rules of Astronomie, and common experience. And this opinion Petrus de Aliaco upon Genesis confirmeth, affirming, that although Noah did well know this Floud by divine revelation, yet (this conjunction being notorious) he could not be ignorant of the fecond causes thereof. for those were not onely signes, but also working causes, by strength received from the first cause, which is God himselfe : and further, that by * Catarratta Caeli, Englished the Windowes of Heaven) Moses meant this great and watrie conjunction; the word (Ca. tarratte) fignifying flowing downe or comming downe. Now (faith P. de Aliaco) it pleased God to ordaine by the course of the Heavens such a constellation, by which all men might behold therein their destruction towards, and thereby for sake those wicked waves wherein they walked, and call unto God for mercy.

Of this judgement was Gul. Parisiensis, who understood, that the words Catarracta Cæli, or Windowes of Heaven, were to be taken for the former conjunction, or for thele watrie Signes, Cancer, Pifces, Pleiades, Hyades, and Orion; and of the Planets, Mars, Venus and the Moone: which are the forcible causes of the greatest Inundations. His owne words arethese: Nondum intelligo Prophetam Hebraorum Catarractas Cali vocasse, nist partes illas Cali, qua generativa sunt Pluviarum & Inundationum Aquarum, quales sunt figna aquatica, ut Cancer, co.as aforcfaid. As yet (faith he) I perceive not what the Proonely open, but phet of the Hebrewes meaneth by those words (Catarracta Cali, or Windowes of Heaven) unlesse be thereby understanding those Celestiall powers, by whose influences are engendred the word nath beene expoun- Raine, and Inundations of Waters, such as are the watrie Signes of Cancer, &c.

But in a word, as it might please God, that in the course of his unsearchable Wisdome this conjunction should at such time be: so did he (as aforesaid) adde vigor and faculty, and gave to every operation encrease of vertues, violent eruptions to Springs and Fountaines, commanding them to cast out the whole treasure and heape of their waters; taking retention from the Clouds, and condensing ayre into water by the ministerie of his Angels, or who foever else best pleased his All-powerfulnesse.

That there was no need of any new Creation of Matter to make the universall Floud: And what are Catarracta Cali. GEN.7. VERS.II.

TOw if it be objected, that God doth not create any thing of new; (for God reffeth the seventh day: (that is) he did not then after create any new species) which granted, it may feeme that then all the Earth and Ayre had not waters fufficient to cover the habitable World fifteene Cubits above the highest Mountaines. Of this proposition, whether God hath so restrayned himselfe, or no, I will not dispute; but for the consequent (which is) that the World had want of water to over-cover the highest Mountaines, I take that conceit to be unlearned and foolish: for it is written, that the Fountaines of the great Deepe were broken up (that is) the waters for sooke the very bo wels of the Earth; and all whatfoever was difperft therein, pierced and brake throughthe face thereof. Then let us confider, that the Earth had above one and twentie thousand miles, the Diameter of the Earth, according to that circle, seven thousand mile, and thou from the Superficies to the Center some three thousand five hundred miles. Take thenthe highest Mountaine of the World, Caucasus, Taurus, Olympus, or Atlas, the Mountaines of Armenia or Scythia, or that (of all other the highest) in Tenuerif, and I doe not finds, that he that looketh highest, stretcheth above thirtie miles upright. It is not then impossible, answering reason with reason, that all those waters mixed within the Earth three thousand five hundred miles deepe, should not well helpe to cover the space of thirtie miles in height, this thirtie miles upright being found in the depths of the Earth 50 one hundred and fixteene times: for the Fountaines of the great Deepe were broken #p, and the waters drawne out of the bowels of the Earth. Secondly, if we confider what proportion the Earth beareth to the extension of the Ayre over and above it, we shall finde the difference exceeding great. If then it pleased God to condense but so much of this Ayre, as every where compaffeth and embraceth the Earth, which condensation is a conversion of Ayre into Water, a change familiar in those Elements; it will not seeme strange to men of judgement, yea but of ordinary understanding, that the Earth (Godso pleasing) was covered over with Waters, without any new Creation. Laftly:

Lastly, for the opinions of Gulielmus Parisiensis, and Aliacensis, to which I may adde Berofus and others, That fuch a conjunction there was fore-shewing that destruction by Waters which followed; and that by the word Catarracta Cali, or Windowes of Heaven was meant this conjunction; there needes no other answer than that observation of Ludovicus Vives, who affirmeth, That by the gravest Astrologian it was observed that in the yeere 1524. there should happen the like conjunction as at Noah's Floud; than which (faith he) there was never a more faire, drie, and feafonable yeere: the like deftrution was prophecied of the yeere 1588. But Picus Earle of Mirandula proveth, that there could not be any fuch conjunctionat that time.

To conclude, I find no other mysterie in the word Catarratta Cali, than that the clouds were meant thereby : Moses using the word Windowes of Heaven (if that be the sense of the word) to expresse the violence of the Raynes, and powring downe of Waters. For whosoever hath seene those fallings of water, which sometimes happen in the Indies, which are called the Spours, (where clouds do not breake into drops, but fall with a refiftlesse violence in one body) may properly use that manner of speech which Moses did: That the Windowes or Flud-gates of Heaven opened: (which is) That waters fell contrarie to custome, & that order which we call naturall. God then loofened the power recentive in the uppermost ayre, and the waters fell in aboundance: Behold (fayth Job) Job and visit bewithholdeth the Waters, and they drie up (or better in Latine, Et omnia siccantur : And all things are dryed up) but when he sendeth them out they destroy the Earth . And in the 26. Chapter: Hebindeth the Waters in the Clouds. But these Bonds God loosed at that time of the generall Floud, and called up the Waters which flept in the great Deepe; and these iovning together, covered the Earth, till they performed the worke of his will: which done, he then commanded them to return into their darke and vast Caves, and the rest $G_{02,0,0}$ (by a winde) rarified againe into ayre, formerly condensed into drops.

Of some remainder of the memorie of NOAH among the Heathen. TO A H, commanded by God, before the fall of those Waters, entred the Arke which he had built, withhis owne Wife, and his Sonnes, and his Sonnes Wives, taking with them of every Creature which tooke life by generation, feven of the cleane, and of the uncleane, two. Noah, according to Philo, fignifieth quietneffe: after others, and according to the prophecie of his Father Lamech, ceffation; to whom afterimes gave many Names, answering his antiquitie, zeale, vertue, and other qualities: as, Thefirst Ogyges, because in the time of the Grecian Ogyges there was also a great Floud of Athaia: Saturne they called him, because he was the Father of Nations: Others gave limthe Name of Prometheus, who was faid to steale away Jupiters fire in that place being taken and understood for the knowledge of God and heavenly things. Others thinke, that he was so called for his excellent wisedome and foresight. He had also the Name of Janus, (ideft) vinofus, because Jain signifieth Wine in the Hebrew. And so Intullian findes him written in Libris Ritualibus, in the Bookes of Ceremonies, preceding both Saturne, Uranus, and Jove: which three enjoyed an elder time than all the other ancientest fayned gods. And this Name Jain is taken from the Hebrew and Syrian; and to from the Latine : for it was in use before there was any Latine Nation, or any Kingdome by that Name known. Of the antiquitie of Janus, Fabius Pictor giveth this testimo-Mani etate nulla erat Monarchia, qui a mortalibus pectoribus nondumba ferat ulla regnand inditas &c.Vinum & Far primus populus docuit JANUS ad sacrificia: primus enim Aras Glomeria & facra docuit; In the time of Janus (faithhe) there was no Monarchie: for the after of rule had not then folded it selfe about the hearts of men. JANUS first taun the people to sacrifice Wine and Meale: he first set up Altars, instituted Gardens and Marie Groves, wherein they used to pray; with other holy Rites and Ceremonies. Agraer testimonie than this there cannot be found among the Heathen, which in all agreet so well with the Scriptures. For first, whilest Noah flourished, there was not any his or Monarch; Nimrod being the first that tooke on him soveraigne authority. Second, Noah after the Floud was the first that planted the Vine, and became a Hus- Geng. 207 banding and therefore offered the First-fruits of both (to wir) Wine and Meale. Thirdy he was the first that rayled an Altar, and offered sacrifice to God; a thanks giving Gons 20;

for his mercifull goodnesse towards him. Noah was also signified in the Name of Bifrons (which was given to Janus) because he beheld the times both before & after the Floud. Quia praterita noverit, & futura prospexerit, faith Arnobius: Because he knew what was past, and provided for what was to come. He was also in the person of fanus shadowed by the Name of Chaos, and Semen Orbis, The Seed of the World: because as out of that confufed Heape was drawne all the kinds of Beafts and Plants: fo from Noah came all Mankind. He was also intituled Calum and Sol, Heaven and the Sunne, for his excellent knowledge in Aftronomie: Vertumnus, Bacchus, and Liber Pater; not that latter, which Diod, Siculus and Alex. Aphrodiseus so call, because he was the restorer of the Greekes to their former libertie but in respect of the Floud. For the Greekes called Liber 28, and his Nurses Hyades, of Rayne, because Noah entred the Arke when the Sunne joyned with the Starres Hyades, a conftellation in the Brow or Necke of Taurus, and ever after a Monument of Noahs Floud. He was also by others furnamed Triton, a Marine god, the sonne of Neptune; because he lived in safetie on the Waters. So was he knowne by the name. of Dionysus, quasi Stardown, mentem pungens, Bite-braine, or Wit-stinger; though Diodorus conceive otherwise, andderive that name à Patre & Loco Ofhis Father, and the place of his Birth, (to wit) of Jove, and Nifa, a Towne of Arabia falix, faith Suidas out of or. pheus. He had also the by-name of Taurus, or Taurophagus; because he first voked Oxen, and tilled the ground: according to that of Moses; And Noah became an Hus bandman. Now how soever the Grecians vaunt of their Theban Bacchus, (otherwise Dia. wyfus) it is certaine, that the Name was borrowed, and the Invention stolen from Noah But this Name of Bacchus, more ancienty Boacus, was taken (faith Gul. Steph.de Vib. Herod 14.

Of fundry particulars touching the Arke : as the place where it was made, the matter, fashion, and name.

Ow in what part of the World Noah built the Arke, it doth not appeare in the Scriptures, neither doe I find any approved Author that hath written thereof: red in the building of the Arke; to which also he addeth the conveniencie of Rivers, t transport the Timber which he used, without troubling any other Carriages.

Onely this we are fure of, that the Arke was built in some part of the Easterne World; and to my understanding, not far from the place where it rested after the Floud. For Noah did not use any Mast or Sayle(as in other Ships) and therefore did the Arke no otherwise move, than the Hulke or body of a Ship doth in a calme Sea. Also, because it is not probable, that during these continual and downe-right Raines there were any Windes at all, therefore was the Arke little moved from the place where it was fashioned and fet together: for it is written, God made a Wind to passe upon the Earth, and the God so Waters ceased. And therefore it may be gathered, that during the fall of the Waters, there was not any Storme or forcible winde at all, which could drive the Arke any great distance from the place where it was first by the Waters listed up. This is also the more probable, if that ancient opinion be true, as it is very likely, that the Arke had fundum planum, aflat bottom, and not rayled in forme of a Ship, with a sharpenesse forward, to cut the waves for the better speed.

This kind of Vessell the Hebrewes call Thebet, and the Greekes Larnax, for so they termed Deucalions Ship: and some say, that the Hill Parnassus, to which in eight dayes he arrived, was first called Larnassus, and by the change of (L) into (P) Parnassus, but Pau-supplements thinkes that it tooke name of a Sonne of the Nymph Cleodora, called Parnassus, the Inventor of Auguration.

Peucerus findes the word (Parnassus) to have no affinitie with the Greeke, but thinkes De Oratul. Mg. t derived from the Hebrew word Nahas, which fignifieth Auguration and Divination or 94. from Har or Parai, as in his Chapter of Oracles in the Leafe before cited.

Fofephus calls the Arke Machina, by the generall name of a huge Frame; and Epiphanius Epiphin Amor; but of the Hebrew, Aron: but herein lyeth the difference betweene Aron and Thebet, That Aren fignifieth properly the Arke of the Sancturie, but Thebet fuch a Veffell, as fwimmeth, and beareth it felfe upon the Waters.

Lastly, this Arke of Noah differed from the fashion of a ship in this, that it had a Cover and Roofe, with a Crest in the middest thereof, and the sides declining like the Roofe of an House : to the end, both to cast off the Waters, and that thereunder Noah himselfe and his children might shelter, and separate themselves from the noysomnesse of the many Beafts, which filled the other roomes and parts of the Arke.

Of what Wood the Arke was built, it is uncertaine. The Hebrew word Gopher once which Diodorus complayneth in his fourth Booke and fifth Chapter. This first Bacchin Land in this place onely used, is diversly understood: and though the matter be of little (to wit) Noah was furnamed Nysius, of the Mountaine Nysa in India; where the Grecian importance, yet this difference there is, That the Geneva Translation calls it Pine-tree; Bacchus never came, what soever themselves faine of his enterprises: and these Moun the Rabbine, Cedar; the Seventie, square Timber; the Latine, simooth Timber. Other will have it Cypres Trees, as dedicated to the dead, because Cypres is worne at Fune rals. But our of doubt, if the word Gopher fignifie any special kind of Timber, Noah obey-Furthermore, to the end that the memorie of this fecond Parent of Mankind might edthe voyce of God thereingif not, he was not then curious as touching the kind or many the better be preferved, there were founded by his Issues many great Cities, which bare aure of the wood, having the promise of God, and his grace and mercie for his defence: his Name, with many Rivers and Mountaines; which oftentimes forgat that it was done. For with Noah God promised to establish his covenant. Plinie affirmeth, that in Egypt it views in his regard, because the many Names given him brought the same confusion to places, was the use to build ships of Cedar, which the wormes eate not; and he avoweth, that he Plantices are faw in Utica, in the Temple of Apollo, Cedar beames, laid in the time of the foundation of of the red Sea, and elsewhere the River of Noas in Thrace, which Strabo calleth Noarm, the Citie, and that they were still sound in his time, which was about 1188; yeares after: proving thereby, that this kind of wood was not subject to putrefying or mould ring in a very long time. But in that it is easie to cut, light to carrie, and of a fweete sayour, lafting also better than any other wood, and because neere the place where the Arke rested there are found great store of these Cedar trees, as also in all the Mountaines of the East. besides those of Libanus, it is probable enough that the Arke might be of that wood: which hath, befides the other commodities, the greatest length of Timber, & therefore fittest to build ships withall. Pererius conceiveth, that the Arke had divers forts of Time ber, and that the bottome had of one fort, the decke & partition of another; all which may onely Goropius Becanus in his Indo Soythia conceiveth, that Noah built his Arke be true or false, if Gopher may be taken for Timber in generall. True it is, that Cedar will neerethe Mountaines of Caucajus, because on those Hils are found the goodliest Cedars: serve for all parts of a Ship, as well for the body, as for Masts and Yards. But Noah had for when alex. Macedon made the warre among the people, called Nyfei, inhabiting the most respect to the direction received from God: to the length, breadth, and height, and other fide of Caucafus, he found all their Burials & Sepulchers wrought over with Cedar to the partitions of the Arke; and to pitch it, and to divide it into Cabines: thereby To this place (faith Becanus) Noab repaired, both to separate himselfe from the reprobate to sever the cleane beasts from the uncleane, and to preserve their severall sorts of food. Giants, who rebelled against God & Nature, as also because he would not be interrup and that it might be capable of all kind of living creatures, according to the numbers by God appointed. without the helpe of a Compasse, or the North star. The Pitch which Noah used, is by some supposed to have bin a kind of Bitumes, whereof there is great quantitie about the Valley of Sodome and Gomorah, now the dead Sea, or Asphaltes, and in the Region of Babylon, and in the West India: and hereinit exceedeth other Pitch, that it melts not with the Sunne, but by the fire onely, after the manner of hard Waxe.

He Arke according to Gods commandement, had of length three hundred Cu-i bites, fifty of bredth, and thirtie deepe or high: by which proportion, it had fixe parts of length to one of bredth, and ten times in length to one of depth; of which S. Augustine : Proculdubio figura est peregrinantis in hoc seculo Civitatis Dei, (hoc est) Eccleiae, que lis (alvaper lignum, in que pependit Mediator Dei & hominum, homo Jesu made a difference of Species, then were the Negro's, which we call the Blacke-Mores. their food and water, was sometimes of opinion, that the Arke had proportion after the Geometricall Cubit, which containeth almost fixe of the Common For, measuring the Arke by the vulgar Cubit, it did not exceed the capacitie of that Vessell built by Hiero of Syracuse, or the Ship of Ptolomic Philo-pater. But S. Augustine (who at the single was led by Origen) changed his judgement as touching the Geometricall Cubit; and sound, upon better consideration, that there needed not so huge a Body to preserve all forts of Creatures, by God appointed to be reserved. For it was not needfull to take any kindes of Fishes into the Arke, because they were kept living (saith S. Augustine) in their owne element. Non fuit necesses were put also to the second and the Arke, which could live in the Waters, and not onelly Fishes which can live under water but also those Fowlers which fit and swim on them. And again the other water but also those Fowlers which God cursed; for of the Sea, did Adam eat. So as S. Augustine gathereth hereupon (as afore said there were not any whit the more roome in the Arke, it were not hard to smeans there were not any whit the more roome in the Arke, it were not hard to that so huge a Frame needed not.

And if we looke with the eyes of judgement hereunto, we shall finde nothing monfrom therein; although the imaginations of men, who (for the most part) have more laters, might according to their present quantities be contained in a Vessell of those of mischiefe and of ignorance, than of any reverend reason, found many impossibilities mensions which the Arke had; allowing to the Cubit one foot and a halfe of our now in this worke of God. But it is manifest, and undoubtedly true, that many of the specific whence it followeth of necessitie, that those large Bodies which were in For those Beasts which are of mixt natures, either they were not in that age, or este it was not needfull to preserve them, seeing they might be generated againe by others as the Mules, the Hyana's, and the like; the one begotten by Asses and Mares, and the other than the second that they were not in that age, or este it was not needfull to preserve them, seeing they might be generated againe by others as the Mules, the Hyana's, and the like; the one begotten by Asses and Mares, and the other than the second the second the second that have place in the Aske; But so hath yery the second the second the second that have place in the Aske; But so hath yery the second the second the second the second the second the second that the second the second the second the second that the second the second that the second the second the second that the second the second that the second the second the second that the second that

And whereas by discovering of strange Lands, wherein there are found divers Beasts and Birds, differing incolour or stature from those of these Northerne parts; it may be supposed by a superficiall consideration, that all those which weare red and pyed Skinnes, or Feathers, are differing from those that are leffe painted. and weare plaine ruflet or blacke; they are much mistaken that so thinke. And for my owne opinion, I find no difference, but onely in magnitude, betweene the Cat of Europe and the Ownce of India; and even those Dogges which are become wilde in Hispagnia ela, with which the Spaniards used to devoure the naked Indians, are now changed to Wolves, and begin to destroy the breed of their Cattell, and doe also oftentimes teare afunder their owne Children. The common Crow and Rooke of India is full of red Augustinities feathers in the drowned and low Islands of Caribana; and the Black-bird and Thrush hath his feathers mixt with blacke and carnation, in the North parts of Virginia. The Dog-fish of England is the Sharke of the South Ocean: For if colour or magnitude indes precifely of all Creatures, as they were by God created, or out of the Earth by By what kinde of Cubite the Arke was measured, it hath bin a disputed question as his Ordinance produced; the Arke, after the measure of the common Cubit, was suf-

S. Angustine considering the many sorts of Beasts and Birds which the Arke held, with their food and water, was sometimes of opinion, that the Arke had proportion after the about the sort long, and farre weightier and bigger than all Davids bodie, who carried the sort long, and farre weightier and bigger than all Davids bodie, who carried the sort long.

learnedly declared: the briefe fumme of whose discourse to that purpose, is this. The length of the Arke was three hundred Cubites, which multiplyed by the bredth, namely fifty Cubits, and the product by the height of thirtie Cubites, sheweth the whole Concavitie to have beene. 45,000. Now whereas the posts, walls, and other partitions of Lodgings may feeme to have taken up a great part of the hollow: the height of the roofe, which (the perpendicular being one Cubite) contained 7500 cubicall Cubes, was a fufficient recompence: If therfore in a Ship of fuch greatnesse we seeke roome for 89. distinct Species of Beafts, or (left any should be omitted) for 100. severall kinds, we shall easily find place both for them, and for the Birds, which in bignesse are no way answerable to them, and for meat to sustaine them all. For there are three sorts of Beasts, whose bodies are of a quantitie best knowne; the Beefe, the Sheepe, and the Wolfe : to which the rest may be time of Ararat, Baris; being the same which the Chaldaan nameth Kardu, to which mound reduced by faying, (according to Aristotle) that one Elephant is answerable to foure Beeves, one Lyon to two Wolves, and so of the rest. Strabo remembreth a Promontoric in Arabia falix of that name; and Plinie findes odde one for facrifice: the other eight and twentie kindes were taken by two of each Mart-towne fo called in the same, which Ptolomie cals Ocilis, Pinetus Acyla, and Niger. fiftie uncleanc, estimable for largenesse as ninetie one Beeves; yet for a supplement (le Of the lefter fort feeding on vegetables, were in the Arke fixe and twentie kinds, estimately this Nicolaus Damascenus called Ninyada, perhaps (as Becanus conjectures) for Milytheir severall Cabbines; their meate in a second: the Birds and their provision in a thin with place to spare for Noah and his family, and all their necessaries.

S. X.

That the Arke restedupon part of the Hill Taurus (or Caucasus) betweene the East Indies, and Scythia.

A preservition of some questions less materiall: with a note of the use of this question to finde out the Metropolis of Nations.

"Hat time Noah tooke to build the Arke, I leave to others to dispute: h he received the Commandement from God a hundred yeeres before waters fell; and had therefore choyce of time and ley fure fufficient. for the number of Deckes and Partitions, which Origen divides into foure, S. Augusti into three, I wil not trouble the Reader with the controversie or whether those creams which fometimes reft on the Land, other times in the Waters, as the Crocodiles (1997) called Alegartos) the Sea-Cowes or Sea-Horfes, were kept in the Arke, or no. I think it a needleffe curiofitie; and yet to this faith Pererius, and others before him, that a File poole might be made as well within the Arke, as in Hiero his Ship of Syracufe. Latty confider or labour to disprove the foolerie of the Hebrewes, who suppose that the his was lightened by a Carbuncle, or had Windows of Crystall to receive in Light, & keep out Water, were but to revive the buried vanities of former times. But that which I feeld most to satisfie my selfe and others in is, in what part of the World the Arke restedates the Floud: because the true understanding of some of these places (as the Seatest the terrestriall Paradise, and the resting of the Arke) doe onely and truly teach the World Plantation, and the beginning of Nations, before and after the Floud; and all florie, well generall as particular, thereby may be the better understood.

†. II. A proposal of the common opinion, that the Arke rested upon some of the Hils of Armenia.

A Nd first, for the true place where the Arke rested after the Floud, and from which part of the World the Children of Nosh travailed to their first fertlement and plantation, I am refolved (without any prefumption) that therein the most writers were utterly mistaken. And I am not led so to thinke out of my Hamour or newnesse of opinion, or fingularitie; but doe herein ground my felfe on the original! & first truth, which is the word of God, and after that upon reason, and the most probable circumsances thereon depending. For whereas it is written, that the Arke stated upon one of the mountaines of Ararat, which the Chaldean Paraphrast hath converted Kardu, meaning the hils Gordai or Gordai in Armenia the greater: (as the words Gordai and Kardu, seeme tobe one and the same) of which opinion also the most of our Interpreters are: I finde neither Scripture nor reason which teacheth any such thing: (to wit) that it rested on that part of Ararat, which is in the greater Armenia. Nicolaus Damascenus cals this mounmine the Fryer Annius (citing this place out of Fosephus) makes him finde another adinvning, called Ocila, and to fay that the Arke (of which Moses the Lawgiver of the kinde, so that in all there were in the Arke one and twentiegreat Beasts cleane, & six and zidon. But this Ocila of Damascenus, or rather of Annius, seemeth to be one and a part of the Armenian mountaines. Berosus calleth those mountaines of Armenia Gordiai, and perhaps any Species be omitted) let them be valued as a hundred and twentie Beeves Curtius Cordai: Ptolomie Gordai and Gordiai: of which the Countrienext adjoying is Hieros 1,273 ble with good allowance for supply, as fourescore Sheepe. Of those which devous da or rather Minni: which word is used for Armenia Minor. And the very word of flesh were two and thirtie kinds, answerable to threescore and soure Wolves. All the drmenia seemes to be compounded of this word Minni, and Aram: as if we should say Nathilities. two hundred and eightie Beafts might be kept in one storie or roome of the Arke, winni of Syria; for that Armenia also was a part of Syria, Plinie witnesseth. Epiphanius capaza laceth the Cardyes about these mountaines, whom others call Gordieni or Gordeni. The nountaines are seated apart from all other to the North of that Ledge of the mounines called Taurus, or Niphates in the plaines of Armenia the great, neere the Lake Tho itis: whence the River of Tigris floweth in 75. degrees of longitude, and 41. and 42. deresof latitude. One of the mountaines Gordiai (that which furmounteth the reft) uphanius cals Lubar, which in the Armenian fignifieth a place of descent: but this out Josephus; which name (faith Junius) was of the event, because of Noahs comming Josephus Atting owne with his children. But this also I take to be a supposed event; seeing any hill from trade hace on every fide we must descend, may thus be called: as Junius corrects the place Mephus And Bugus (Kubaris.) That the place is thus to be read, he conjectureth, because off.l.1.c.4. sayes, the place is called exogether (as it were the descent or comming owne) and Epiphan. l.1. contr. Hares. cals it respenses which word in the Armenian and applian tongue fignifieth descent, of Lubar, which is to descend; whence also Lubra asynagogue, because it was commonly built on some high place: whereof also the La-Delubrum may feeme to be derived; and Act. 6.9. they that belonged to the Synaof the Agyptians are called Libertini, for Lubratenu. Yet this opinion hath beene braced from age to age, receiving a habit of strength by time, and allowance without Thather examination; although the name of Lubar might otherwise rightly be given. really to that mountaine, by reason that the passage was more faire, up and downe in than to any of the rest adjoyning.

> t. III. bufult argument against the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would have come fooner, had they come from fo neere aplace as Armenia.

Ut there are many arguments to per swade me, that the Arke of Noah did not rest it Melfe in any part of Armenia, and that the mountaine Ararat was not Baris, nor any one of the Gordi aan mountaines.

the first, it is agreed by all which follow Berofus, that it was in the 130. yeere, or in Berof the me 131. after the floud, when Nimrod came into the valley of Shinar, which Valley Interward called Babylonia, Chulh, and Chaldea. If then the Arke had first found Armenia, it is very unprobable, that the children of Noah which came into that and have fpent so many yeeres in so short a passage: seeing the Region of Mesowas onely interjacent, which might by easie journeyes have been pass over in twentic dayes; and to haften and helpe which paffage, the navigable River of Tygris offered it selfe, which is every where transpassable by boates of great burden : so as where the Desart on the one side resisted their expedition, the river on the contrary side served to advance it; the River rifing out of the same Ledge of mountaines, or at the foote of them, where the Arke of Noah was first supposed to settle it selfe; Then if the Nations which followed Nimrod still doubted the surprise of a second sloud (according to the opinions of the ancient Hebrewes) it foundeth ill to the eare of reason, that they would have spent many yeeres in that low and overflowne Valley of Mesopotamia, so called of the many Rivers which imbroyder or compasse it: for the effects witnessed their affections, and the workes which they undertooke, their unbeleefe; being no fooner arrived in 10 Shinar, but they beganto provide themselves of adesence (by erecting Babel) against any future or feared inundation. Now at Babel it was that Nimrod began his Kingdom, the first knowne Citie of the world, founded after the floud about 131. yeeres, or (as others fuppose) ten yeeres later: though (for my selfe) I rather thinke, that they undertooke that worke in two respects; first, to make themselves famous, To get us a name (saith the Text:) Secondly, thereby to usurpe dominion over the reft.

The second argument, That the Easterne people were most ancient in populositie, and in all humane glory.

Or a fecond Argument: The civilitie, magnificence and multitude of people (wherein the East parts of the world first abounded) hath more weight than any thing which hath bin, or can be faid for Armenia, and for Noahs taking land there. And that this is true, the use of Printing and Artillerie (among many other things which the East had), may easily perswade us, that those Sunne-rising Nations were the most ancient. The certaintie of this report, that the East Indians (time out of minde) have had Gunnes and Ordnance of batterie, confirmed by the Portugals and others, make us now to understand, That the place of Philostratus in vita Apollonii Tianai, l. 2.0. 14. is no fable, though exprest in fabulous words: when he faith, that the wisemen, which dwell be 3 tweene Hyphasis and Ganges, use northernselves to goe forth into battaile: but that they drive away their enemies with thunder and lightning fent from Jupiter. By which meanes there it is faid, that Hercules Agyptius and Bacchus, joyning their forces, were defeated there; and that this Hercules there cast away his golden shield. For the invention of letters was ignorantly ascribed to Cadmus, because he brought them first into Greece : of which the people (then rude and favage) had reason to give him the honour, from whom they received the benefit. But it is true, that letters are no leffe ancient than Seth or Henoch were: for they are faid to have written on pillars of stone (as before remembred) long before the floud. But from the Easterne world it was that John Cuthenberg a Germane, brought the device of Printing: by whom Conradus being instructed, a brought the practice thereof to Rome: and after that Nicholaus Gerson a Frenchman, bettered both the letters and invention. And notwithstanding that this mysterie was then supposed to be but newly borne, the Chinass had letters long before either the Egyptians or Phænicians; and also the Art of Printing, when as the Greekes had neither any civill knowledge, or any letters among them.

And, that this is true, both the Portugals and Spaniards have witneffed, who about an hundred yeeres fince discovered those Kingdomes, and doe now enjoy their rich trades therein: for the Chinaos account all other Nations but Salvages, in respect of themselves,

And to adde strength to this argument, the conquest and storie of Alex. Macedon may justly be called to witnesse, who found more Cities and sumptuositie in that little King s dome of Porus, which lay fide by fide to the East India, than in all his other travails & m dertakings. For in Alexanders time learning and greatnesse had not travailed so far to the West as Rome: Alexander esteeming of Italie but as a barbarous Countrie, and of Rome as of a Village. But it was Babylon that stood in his eye, and the fame of the East pierced his eares. And if we looke as farre as the Sun-rising, and heare Paulus Venetus what he reporteth of the uttermost Angle and Island, thereof, wee shall finder that those Nations have fent out, and not received; lent knowledge, and not borrowed it from the West. For the farther East (to this day) the more civill, the farther West the more Salvage

And of the Isle of Japan (now Zipingari) Venetus maketh this report: Incolareligioni. literis & Capientia funt addictissimi, & veritatis indagatores acerrimi; nihil illis frequentius oratione, quam (more nostro) facris in delubris exercent : unum cognoscunt Principem unum Deum adorant: The Ilanders are exceedingly addicted to religions letters and Philosophie, and most diligent searchers out of truth: there is nothing among them more frequent than prayer, which they use in their Churches, after the manner of Christians. They acknow. ledge one King, and worship one God. The antiquitie, magnificence, civilitie, riches, sumptuous buildings, and policie in government, is reported to be such by those who have bin employed into those parts as it seemeth to exceede (in those formerly named and divers To other particulars) all other Kingdomes of the world.

Ut for a third argument, and also of a treble strength to the rest, I lay the invasion of semiramis before the indisferent and advised Reader: who may be lived and hour for age she lived, and how soone after the worlds new birth shee gathered her Armic (as Diodorus Siculus out of Ctessas reporteth) of more than three Millions to invade India, 20 to which he adjoyned also 500000. Horse; and 100000. Waggons: whereof if we beleeve but a third part, it shall suffice to prove that India was the first planted and peopled Countrie after the floud. Now as touching the time wherein shee lived: All Historians confent, that shee was the wife of Ninus, and the most approved Writers agree. that Ninus was the Sonne of Belus, and Belus of Nimrod, that Nimrod was the Sonne of Culb, Culb of Cham, and Cham of Noah. And at fuch time as Nimrod came to Shinaar, he was then agreat Nation, as by the building of the Citie and Tower of Babel may appeare; and being then so multiplied and increased, the two descents cast betweene Nimrod and Semiramis, brought forth in that time those multitudes, whereof her Armie was composed. Let us then see with whom shee encountred in that warre with this her o powerfull Armie: even with a multitude, rather exceeding, than equalling, her owne, conducted by Staurobates King of India beyond Indus; of whose multirudes this is the witnesse of Diod. Siculus. STAUROBATES avitis majoribus quam qua erant SEMI RAMIDIS copiis: STAUROBATES gathering together greater troupes than those of SEMIA RAMIS. If then these numbers of Indians had beene encreased but by a Colonie sent out from Shinaar, (and that also after Babel was built, which no doubt tooke some time in the performance) this encrease in the East, and this Armie of Staurobates must have beene made of stone, or somewhat else by miracle. For as the numbers which Semiramis gathered might easily grow up in that time, from so great a Troupe as Nimrod brought with him into Babytonia (as shall be demonstrated hereafter in the Storie of Ifrael) so could not any fuch time, by any multiplication naturall, produce fo many bodies of men as werein the Indian Armie victorious over Semiramis, if the Colonies fent thither had beenefo late as Babel overturned, and the confusion of Languages. For if wee allow 65 veeres time after the Floud, before Nimrod was borne: of which, thirty yeeres to Cush ere he begat Seba, after whom he had Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, and Sabtecha: Gento? and then thirtie yeeres to Raamah, ere he begat Shiba and Dedan, both which were borne before Nimrod: and five yeeres to his five elder brothers, which make fixtie five, and then twice thirtie yeeres for two Generations more, as for Nimrod, Sheba and Dedan with others, to beget their fonnes; and that a third Generation might grow up, which makes in all an hundred twenty five yeeres, there will then remaine fixe yeeres to have bin spent in travailing from the East, ere they arrived in Shinaar in the yeere after the Floud 131. And so the followers of Nimrod might be of sufficient multitude. But as for those which make him to have arrived at Shinaar in the yeere tot. and the confusion to have beene at Pelegs birth, these men doe all by miracle: they beget whole Nations without the helpe of time; and build Nimrods Tower in the Ayre; and not on those low and marish grounds (which require found foundations) in the Plaines of Shinaar. For except that huge Tower were built in a day, there could be no confusion in that yeere 101. or at Pelegs birth. And therefore it is farre more probable, that Nimred usurped Regall authority in the 131. yeere after the Floud, (according to Berofus) and that the worke of Babel lasted forty yeeres (according to Glycas) Hominibus in eapersicienda totis 40. annis incassum laborantibus; Men labouring in vaine 40. yeeres to sinish it. By which account it sals out, that it was 170. yeeres after the Floud, ere a Colonie was sent into East India; which granted (the one being the maine body, and the other but a Troupe taken thence) it can hardly be believed that Staurobates could have exceeded Semirams in numbers: who being then Empresse of all the part of that world, gathered the most of Nations into one bodie.

The fourth Argument from divers considerations in the person of NOAH.

Ourthly, it is no way probable, that Noah, who knew the world before the floud, and had lived therein the long time of 600. yeeres, was all that space 130. yeeres after the floud, without any certain habitation: No, it wil fallout, and better agree with reason, that Nimrod was but the conducter of those people, by Noah destined and appointed to fill and inhabit that middle part of the earth and the Westerne world; (which travailes Noah put over to young and able bodies) and that Noah himselfe then covered with many yeeres, planted himselse in the same place which God had assigned him; which was where he first came downeout of the Arke from the waters : for it is written, that after Noah came downe out of the Arke, he planted a Vineyard, and became an Husbandman: whose businesse was to dresse and manure the earth; and not to range over so many parts of the world, as from Armenia into Arabia falix, where he should (if the tradition be found) have left certaine Colonies : thence into Africa towards Triton, then into Spaine, where they fay he fettled other companies, and built Cities after the names of Noela and Noegla his fonnes wives: from thence into Italie, where they fay he found his sonne Cham the Saturne of Egypt, who had corrupted the people and fubjects of Gomer in his absence : with whom Noah (as they make the storie) had passence for three yeeres; but then finding no amendement, they fay he banisht him out of Italie. These bebut the fancies of Berosus Annianus, a plaine imitation of the Græcian fables. For let every reasonable man conceive, what it was to travaile farre in such a forrest as the World was, when after so great a rotting of the earth by the floud, the fame lay waste and over-growne for 130. or 140. yeeres, and wherein there could hard. ly be found either part or paffage through which men were able to creepe for woods, bushes and bry ars that in those yeeres were growne up.

And there are so many reasons, proving that Noah never came into the valley of Shimaar, as we need not suspect his passage into Italie or Spaine : For Noah, who was Father of all those Nations, a man reverenced both for his authority, knowledge, experience and pietie, would never have permitted his children and iffues to have undertaken that unbeleeving presumptuous worke of Babel. Rather by his presence and preva lent perswasions he would have bound their hands from so vaine labours, and by the air thority which he received even from God himfelfe, he would have held them in that awfull subjection, as whatsoever they had vainely conceived or feared, yet they durst not have disobeyed the personall commandement of him, who in the beginning had a kinde of Regallauthority over his children and people. Certainely, Noah knew right well, that the former destruction of mankinde was by themselves purchased through crueltie and disobedience; and that to distrust God, and to raise up building against his Almighty power, was as much as in them lay, a provocation of God to lay on them the same, if not a more sharpe affliction. Wherefore, there is no probabilitie, that ever he came so farre West as Babylonia; but rather, that he sent those numbers, which came into Shinaar (being the greatest troupe, because they had the greatest part of the world to plant) under Nimrod, or those upon whom he usurped. Nauclerus and Calestinus takethe testimony of Methodius Bishop of Tyre for currant, that there were three Leaders of the people after their encrease (to wit) Nimrod, Suphene, and Jottan: of which Nimred commanded the iffues of Cham, Jottan of Sem, and Suphene of Japhet. This opinion I cannot judge of, although I will not doubt, but that fo great a worke as the worlds plantation, could not be effected without order and conduction.

Of the fonnes of Sem: Jostan, Havilah, and Ophir, are especially noted to have dwelt in the East India. The rest of Sems issues had also the Regions of Persia and the other adjoyning adjoyning to Indus, and held also a part of Chaldaa for a time: for Abraham inhabited ur, till he was thence called by God; and whether they were of the Sonnes of Jottan, or of all the rest a certaine number (Cham and his iffue onely excepted) that Noah kept with himselfe; it cannot be knowne. Of which plantation I shall speake at large in the Chapter following.

Now another reason which moves me to believe, that Noab stayed in the East far away from all those that came into Shinaar, is, that Moses doth not in any word make mention of Noab in all the story of the Hebrewes, or among any of those Nations which contended with them. And Noah, being the Father of all mankinde, and the chosen servent of God, was too principall a person; to be either forgotten or neglected, had he not (in respect of his age and wearisome experience of the world) withdrawne himselfer and rested a part with his best beloved, giving himselfe to the service and contemplation of God and heavenly things, after he had directed his children to their destined portions. For he landed in a warme and fertile soile, where he planted his Vineyard, and drest the earth; after which, and his thankselfiving to God by facrifice, hee is not remembred in the Scriptures, because he was so farre away from those Nations of which Moses wrote: which were the Hebrewes chiesly, and their enemies and borderers.

Tremaineth now that we examine the Arguments and authorities of Frier Annius. who in his Commentaries upon Berofus and others, laboureth marvailously to prove Lithat the Arke of Noah rested upon the Armenian mountaines called Caspii; which mountaines separate Armenia from the upper Media, and doe equally belong to both. And because all his Authours speake of the mountaines Gordiei, he hath no other shift to unite these opinions, but by uniting those farre-distant mountaines together. To effect which he hath found no other invention, than to charge those men with errour, which have o carefully over-feene, printed, and published Ptolimies Geographie, in which they are Ptol.tab. Afte. 2 altogether dissevered. For that last edition of Mercators, sets these hills sive degrees (which makes three hundred English miles) asunder. And certainely, if we looke into those more ancient copies of Villanovanus and others, we shall find nothing in them to helpe Aunius withall: for in those the mountaines Caspii stand seven degrees to the East of the Cordiai, which make 420. miles. And for those Authours by whose authoritie Amius strengtheneth himselfe, Diodorus whom he so much followeth, giveth this judgmentupon them in the like dispute. Aberrarunt vero omnes, non negligenta, sedregno- viodle; rum situs ignorantia, They have allerred (faith he) not through negligence, but through ignorance of the situation of Kingdomes. But for an induction, to prove that the Arke of Noah of food on the mountaines of Armenia, he beginneth with the antiquity of the Scythians: and to prove the same heciteth Marcus Portius Cato, who avoweth that 250 yeeres be-cuode original to prove the same heciteth Marcus Portius Cato, who avoweth that 250 yeeres be-cuode original to prove the same heciteth Marcus Portius Cato, who avoweth that 250 yeeres be-cuode original to prove the same heciteth Marcus Portius Cato, who avoweth that 250 yeeres be-cuode original to prove the same heciteth Marcus Portius Cato, who avoweth that 250 yeeres be-cuode original to prove the same heciteth Marcus Portius Cato, who avoweth that 250 yeeres be-cuode original to prove the same heciteth Marcus Portius Cato, who avoweth that 250 yeeres be-cuode original to prove the same heciteth Marcus Portius Cato, who avoweth that 250 yeeres be-cuode original to prove the same head of the same head of the same head or same hea fore Ninus, the earth was overflowne with waters, & in Scythia Sagarchatum mertale pars prima genus ; and that in Scythiathe flocke of mortall men was renewed. The fame Authour alfo teacheth that the "mbri before remembred (who were fo called, because faved from Deucalions floud) were the Sonnes of the Galli, a Nation of the Scythians. Ex his venisse Janum cum Dyrim, & Gallis progenitoribus Umbrorum; From these Sythians, he faith, that JANUS same with DYRIM, and with the Galli the progenitours of the Umbri : And againe, Equidem principatus originis semper Scythis tribuitur ; Certainely the Prime antiquitie of off fring is alway given to the Scythians. And hereintruely Iao gree with Annius, that those Regions called Scythia, and now Tartaria, and by some Writers Sarmatia, Asiatica, were among the first peopled: and they held the greatest part of Asia under tribute till Ninus time. Also Plinie called the Umbri which Plinia called long since inhabited Italie. Gens antiquissima, a most ancient Nation, who descended of these Southians. Now that which Annius laboureth, is to proove that these ancient Scythians (meaning the Nephewes of Noch) did first inhabit that Region of the mountaines, on which the Arke refted; and confessing that this great ship was grounded in Armenia, he faineth anation of sombians called Araxea, taking name of the mouncame Armat, necre the River of Araxes. And because his Author Cato helpeth him in pare

(to wit, That in Scythia mankinde was restored after the great sloud, 250 yeares before Ninus) and in part utterly destroyeth his conceit of Armenia, by adding the word Saga; as, In Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus ;In Scythia Sagamankinde was restored, he ther-Prol. Asia. tore in the Proæme of his Commentary upon Berosus, leaveth out the addition of Saga altogether in the repetition of Cato his words, and writes, homines in Scythia salvatos, For Scythia Saga or Saca, is undoubtedly under the Mountaines of Paropanifus; on which, or neare which it is most probable that the Arke first tooke ground : and from those East parts (according to Moses) came all those companies which erected the Tower of Babel in Shinaar or Babylonia. But now the best authority which Annius hath, is out of Diodorus: where he hath is read, that the Scythians were originally Armenians, taking name à Scytha Rege corum, from Scythatheir King. But (in a word) we may fee his vanity, or rather (indeede) his falshood in citing this place. For Diodorus, a most approved and diligent Author, beginneth in that place with these words: Fabulantur Scytha; The Scythians fable: and his Interpreter in the table of that worke giveth this title to that very Chapter. Scytharum origo & successus, fabula; The original and successe of the Scythians, a fable. And (indeede) there needs no great disproofe hereof, since Ptolomie doth directly delineate Scythia Saga or Saca, and fets them in 130 degrees of longitude: and the Persians (faith Herodotus) call all the Scythians, Saca; which Pling confirmeth: for in respect that these Saca (faith Pliny) are the next Scythians to the Perfians, therefore they gave all the rest than name. Now that any Nation in Armenia can neighbour the Persians, there is no man beleeveth. But this supposed Scythia Araxea in Armenia lyeth in 78. degrees of longitude (that is) 42 degrees distant from the Sace; and the Country about Araxes Ptolomy calleth Colthene and Soducene and Sacapene without any mention of Scythia at all: and yet all those which are or were reputed Scythians either within Imaus or without, to the Tal. affert & number of 100. feverall Nations, are by Ptolomie precisely set downe.

But to come to those latter Authors, whereof some have written, others have seene a great part of those North-east Regions, and searched their antiquities with great diligence: First, Marius Niger boundeth Scytbia within Imaus, in this manner: (for Scytbia without these Mountaines is also beyond our purpose) Scythia inter Imaum montem es est, qua proprio vocabulo Gassaria hoc tempore dicitur : ab Occasu Sarmatia Asiatica : ab Oriente Imao monte : à Septentrione terra incognita . à Meridie Saccis, Sogdianis, Margianis, usque ostia O xaamnis in Hyrcanum mare excuntis 3 & parte ipsius maris hinc usq 3 ad Rha sluminis oftia terminatur : Scythia within the Mountaine Imaus is that part of the World, which in their owne speech is at this time called Gassaria; and the same is bounded on the West side by Sarmatia Asiatica (Or Of Asia:) on the East by the Imaan Mountaines: on the North by unknowne Lands : on the South by the Sacca (which are in the Saca) the Sogdiani, and the Rhandwavolga. Margiani, to the mouth of Oxus, falling into the Hyrcan Sea, and by a part of the same Sea as farre as the mouth of Rha.

Now if Niger sets all Sarmatia Asiatica, to the West of Scythia, then Sarmatia (qui magna sand Regio est, & qua innumer as nationes completitur) Which is agreat Region, comprehending innumerable Nations (faith Niger) much of it being betweene Scythia and Armenia, doth sufficiently warrant us, that Armenia can be no part of Scythia; and to make it more plaine, he dissevereth Sarmatia it selfe from any part of Armenia, by the Regions of Colchis, Iberia, & Albania, which he leaveth on the right hand of Sarmatia, & yet makes Sarmatia but the West bound of Scythia. And for Paulus Venetus, he hath not a word of Armenia among the Tartarian or Stjthian Nations; neither doth his fellow Frier John Plancarpio (cited by Vincentius in his description of Scythia) make any mention of Armenia; neither doth Haytonus, an Armenian borne, of the bloud of those Kings (though afterward a Monke) ever acknowledge himselfe for a Tartarian, or of the Scythian Races descended : though he write that storie at large, gathered by Nicholaus Salcuni, and (by the commandement of Pope Ch-ment the fifth) in the yeere 1307. published.

Neyther doth Mathias a Michon (a Canon of Cracovia in Polonia) a Sarmatian borne, and that travailed a great part of Sarmatia Asiatica, finde Armenia any way within the compasse of Tartaria, Scythia, or Sarmatia; and yet no man (whose Travailes are extant) hathobserved somuch of those Regions as he hath done: proving and disproving many things, heretofore subject to dispute. And among others he burieth that ancient and received opinion, That out of the Mountaines, Ripbai, and Hyperborei in Scythia, spring the Rivers of Tanais or Don, Volga or Edel; providing by unanswerable experience, than there are no fuch Mountaines in rerum natura; and (indeed) the Heads and Fountaines of those famous Rivers are now by the Trade of Musicovia knowne to every Merchant. and that they arise out of Lakes, low, wooddie, and marish grounds. The River of Tanois or Don, ariseth to the South of the Citie Tulla, some twentie English miles, out of a Lake called Imanowesero, in the great Wood Okenit Zkilies or Jepiphanolies. Volga, which Ptolomie calls Rha, and the Tartars call Edel, rifeth out of a Lake called Fronow, in the great Wood Vodkon Zki: from which Lake the two other famous Rivers flow of Borysthenes (now Neyper) and D fuina or Dividna. And this learned Polonian doth in this fort bound the European Sarmatia. In Sarmatia of Europe are the Regions of Russians, Lithuanians, Muscovians, and those adjoyning, bounded on the West by the River of Vista. the Name perchance mif-printed Vissa for Vistula, a River which parts Germanie and Grazens calleth the Name perchance in princed spatial for the Name perchance in princed spatial this River wis Sarmatia and for the East border he nameth Tanais, or Don. Sarmatia Assatica he cutteth flaus, Niger Drafrom Europe by the same River of Tanais, and the Caspian Sea, to with-hold it from firet variance, ching farther East: this Asian Sarmatia being part of that Scythia which Ptolomie cal-Icth Scythia intra Imaum montem : Scythia within the Mountaine Imaus. And the fame Mathias Michon farther affirmeth, that the Scythians (which Frier Annius Would make Armenians) came not into Sarmatia Afiatica it selfe above three hundred and a few odde so yeeres before his owne time : thefe be his words: Constat eam esse gentem novam, or adventitiam à partibus Orientis (mutatis sedibus) paulo plus abbine trecentis annis Asia Sarmatian ingressam It is manifest (faith he, speaking of the Scythian Nation) that this is a late planted Nation, come from the coasts of the East: from whence they entred into Asia, & gat new seates a little more than 200 yeeres fince: For (indeed) before that time the Gothes or Pouloci inhabited Sarmatia Afatica. And this Mathias lived in the yeere 1511 and this his Discourse of Sarmatia was printed at Augusta in the yeere 1506. as Bucholzerus in his Chronologie witnesseth-Now these Soythians (faith he) came from the East, for in the East it was that the Arke of Noah rested, and the Soytha Saca were those people which lived at the North foot of those Mountaines, of Taurus or Ararat, where they encounter or begin to mixe o themselves with the great Imaus. And were there no other testimony than the general! description of the Earth now extant, and the witnesse of Ptolomie, it is plaine, that betweene all parts of Armenia, and Scythia, there are not only those three Regions of Col. chis, Iberia, and Albania, but the Caspian Sea: on the East shore of which Sea, but not on the West, or on that part which any way toucheth Armenia, there are (indeed) a Nation of Soythians (called Ariace) betweene Jaxartus and Jattus; but what are these Soythiansto any Ariaca, or Soythia Araxea, which Annius placeth in Armenia, morethan

the Scytbians of Europe?

The fift Argument, The Vine must grow naturally neere the placewhere the Arke rested.

O this if we adde the confideration of this part of the Text, That NOAH planted Gengates a Vineyard, we shall find that the fruit of the Vine or Raysin did not grow naturally in that part of Armenia, where this resting of the Arke was supposed: for if the Vine was a stranger in Italie and France, and brought from other Countries thither, it is not probable that it grew naturally in Armenia, being a farre colder Country. For Tyrrhenus first brought Vines into France, and Saturnus into Latium: yea at such times as Brennus and the Gaules invaded Italie, there were few or no Vines in France. For faith Plutarch in the life of Camilus) the Gaules remained betweene the Pyrenai and the Alpes, Servin Acuidi neere unto the Senones, where they continued a long time, untill they drunke Wine, Europius, which was first brought them out of Italie; and after they tasted thereof, they hasted to inhabite that Country, which brought forth fuch pleafant fruit: fo as it appeareth, that the Plant of the Vine was not naturall in France, but from Italie brought thither; as by Saturne from else where into Italy.

Nowit is manifest, that Noah travailed not farre to feeke out the Vine. For the Planta? tion thereof is remembred, before there was any counsaile how to dispose of the World among his children: and the first thing he did, was, to till the ground, and to plant a Vineyard, after the Sacrifice and Thankefgiving to God; and wherefoever the Arke refted, there did the Vine grow naturally. From whence it doth no where appeare, that he travailed far: for the Scriptures teach us, that he was a Husband-man, and not a Wanderer.

An answer to anobjection out of the words of the Text: The Lord scattered them from thence upon the face of the whole earth.

Nd that all the children of Noah came together into Shinaar, it doth not appeare faving that it may be inferred out of these words (from thence) because it is written: So that the Lord scattered them from thence upon all the earth; which hath no other sense, but that the Lord scattered them (to wit) those that built this Tower: for those were from thence dispersed into all the Regions of the North and South, & to the Westward. And by these words of Sybilla (as they be converted) it seemeth that all came not together into Shinaar; for they have this limitation: Quidam eorum turrem adificarunt altissimam,quasi per eam cœlum essent ascensuri : Certaine of them built a most high Towar, as if they meant thereby to have scaled the Heavens.

Ut before I conclude this part, it is necessarie to see & consider, what part of Scripture, and what reason may be found out, to make it true or probable, that the Arke of Noah was for faken by the waters on the Mountaines of Armenia. For the Text hath onely these words: The Arke rested on (or upon) the Mountaines of Ararat, or Armenia, faith the marginall note of the Geneva: the Chaldean Paraphrast cals it Kardn; of which, the highest hath the name of Lubar, saith Epiphanius. Now this Ararat (which the Septuagint doe not convert at all, but keepe the same word) is taken to be a Mountaine of Armenia, because Armenia it selfe had anciently that name : so as first out of the name, and fecondly out of the heighth (which they suppose exceeded all other) is the opinion taken, That the Arke first sate thereon.

But these suppositions have no foundation: for neither is Ararat of Armenia alone, neither is any part, or any of those Mountaines of equall stature to many other Mountaines of the World; and yet it dothnot follow, that the Arke found the highest Mountaine of all other to rest on: for the Plaines were also uncovered, before Noah came out of the Arke. Now, if there were any agreement among Writers of this Ararat, and that they did not differ altogether therein, we might give more credit to the conceit. For in the Bookes of the Sybils it is written, that the Mountaines of Ararat are in Phrygia, upon which it was supposed that the Arke stayed after the Floud. And the better to particularize the place and seate of these Mountaines, and to prove them in Phrygia, and not Armenia, they are placed where the City of Calenes was afterward built. Likewise in the same discription shee maketh mention of Marsyas, a River which runneth through part of Phrygia and afterward joyneth it selfe with the River Meander, which is farre from the Gordinan Mountaines in Armenia. We may also finde a great mistaking in Jose-PHUS (thoughout of Berosus, who is in effect the Father of this opinon) that Jose PHUS sets Ararat betweene Armenia and Parthia, toward Adiabene, and affirmeth withall, that in the province of Caron (by others Kairos and Arnos, so called by reason that the waters have from thence no descent, nor issue out, the people vaunt that they had in those dayes reserved some peices of Noahs Arke. But Parthia toucheth no where upon Armenia, for Armenia bordereth Adiabene, a Province of Affyria: fo that all Media and a part of Affyria is betweene Parthia and Armenia. Now whereas the so discoverie of the Mountaines Cordiai was first borrowed out of Berosus by Josephus; yet the Text which Josephus citeth out of Berofus, differs far from the words of that Berofus, which wandreth up and downe in these dayes, set out by Annius. For Berosus, cited by Josephus, hath these words . Fertur & navigit hujus pars in Armenia apud montem Cordixorum superesse er quosdam Bitumen inde abrasum secum reportare, quo vice amuletilici bujus homines uti solent: (which is) It is reported also that a part of this ship is yet remaining in Armenia upon the Cordiaan Mountaines; & that diverse doscrape from it the Bitamen or Pitch, and carrying it with them, they use it in stead of an amulet. But Annius his

Edition of the Fragment of Berofus useth these words: Nam elevata ab aquis in Gordia montis vertice quievit, cujus adhuc dicitur aliqua pars esse, & homines ex illa Bitumen tollere quo maxime utuntur ad expiationem: For the whole Irke being lifted up by the waters, rested on the top of the Gordinan Mountatines, of which it is reported that some tarts remaine, and that men doe carry thence of the Bitumen to purge by Sacrifice therewith: so as in these two Texts (besides the difference of wordes) the name is diversly written. The ancient Berosus writes Cordiei with a (C.) and the Fragment Gordiei with a (G.) the one that the Bitumen is used for a preservative against Poyson or Inchantment; the other in Sacrifice. And if it be faid that they agree in the generall, yet it is reported by neither from any certaine knowledge, nor from any approved Authour: for one of them, useth the word (fertur) the other (dicitur) the one, that so it is reported, the other, that fo it is faid; and both but by heare-fay, and therefore of no authority nor credit. For common bruit is so infamous an Historian, as wise men neither report after

it, nor give credit to any thing they receive from it. Furthermore, these Mountaines which Ptolomie cals Gordiai, are not those Mountaines which himselse giveth to Armenia, but he calleth the Mountaines of Armenia Moschici. These be his owne words: Montes Armenia nominantur ii, qui Moschici appellantur, qui protenduntur usq; ad superjacentem partem Ponti Cappadocum; & mons qui Piol. Afaciali, penantur, que procenament of 15 mons of Armenia are they which are called Moschici, stretcht Pargardes dicitur: The Mountaines of Armenia are they which are called Moschici, stretcht raryarues account part of Pontus of the Cappadocians: also the Hill which is called Paryardes: which Mountaines Plinie calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Gordiei or Plinie calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Gordiei or Plinie calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Gordiei or Plinie calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Gordiei or Plinie calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Gordiei or Plinie calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Gordiei or Plinie calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Gordiei or Plinie calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Gordiei or Plinie calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Gordiei or Plinie calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Gordiei or Plinie calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Gordiei or Plinie calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Gordiei or Plinie calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Gordiei or Plinie calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Gordiei or Plinie calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Gordiei or Plinie calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Gordiei or Plinie calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Gordiei or Plinie calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Gordiei or Plinie calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Gordiei or Plinie calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Gordiei or Plinie calleth pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Gordiei or Plinie calleth pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Calleth Pariedri, & both which lye to the North of Calleth Pari Baris, in 43. and 44. and a halfe; and the Gordinan Mountaines in 39. and a halfe: from the Northermost of which did the Georgians take their names, who were first Gordians, and then Georgians, who amidst all the strength of the greatest Insidels of Persia and Turkie, doe still remaine Christians. Concerning the other suppositions, that the Mountaines of Gordiai, otherwise Baris, Kardu or Lubar (which Ptolomie calleth Torgodiaion) are the highest of the World, the same is absolutely false.

†. XI. Of Caucasus, and divers farre higher hils than the Armenian.

Or the best Cosmographers with other, that have seene the Mountaines of Armenia; find them farre inferiour, and under-fetto divers other Mountaines even in that part of the World and also rubers as the Mountaines even in that part of the World, and else where: as the Mountaine Athos between Macedon & Thrace, which Ptolomie cals Olympus, now called Lacas, (faith Caftaldus) is farre furmounting any Mountaine that ever hath beene feene in Armenia: for it cafteth shade three hundred furlongs, which is feven and thirtie miles and upwards : of which Plutarch : Athos Plut Municipal adumbrat latera Lemnia bovis: Athos shadoweth the Cow of Lemnos. Also the Mount of com Olympus in The salie, is said to be of that heighth, as neither the Windes, Cloudes or Raine overtop it. Againe, the Mountaine of Antandrus in Mysia, not farre from Ida, whence the River Scamandrus floweth, which runneth through Troy, is also of a farre more admiration than any in Armenia, and may be feene from Constantinople. There are also in Mauritania neere the Sea, the famous Mountaines of Atlas, of which HERO-DOTUS: Extat in hoc mari Mons cui nomen Atlas, ita sublimis esse dicitur, ut ad illius verticem oculi mortalium pervenire non possint : Upon this Coast there is a Mountaine called Atlas, whose heighth is sayd to be such, as theeye of no mortall man can discerne the top thereof. And if we may believe Arifforle, then are all these inseriour to Caucasus, which he maketh the most notorious both for breadth and height: Caucasus Mons omnium maximus, qui astivum ad ortum sunt, acumine atq, latitudine, cujus juga à Sole radiantur usq, ad con- anit siercons. ticinium abortu : G iterum ab occasu, Caucasus (saith Anistotle) is the greatest Moun- 16.13. taine both for breadth and heighth of all those in the North east, whose tops are lightneed by the Sun-beames, ufq; ad conticinium (which is, faith Macrobius) betweene the first crowing after mid-night and the breake of day : Others affirme, that the top of this Mountaine holds the Sunne-beames when it is darke in the Valley; but I cannot believe either: for the highest Mountaine of the World knowne, is that of Tenerife in the Canaria: which although it hath nothing to the Westward of it for 1000. Iberia; though (indeed) Caucasus doth divide both Colchi, Iberia, and Albania from Sarmatia: for he acknowledgeth that the River of Phasis riseth in the same Mountaine, which himselfe calleth Caucasus, and that Phasis springeth from those Hils which funder Colchis from Iberia, falling afterward into Euxinus: which River (it is manifest) yeeldeth it selfe to the Sea, two degrees to the North of Trapezus (now Trabefunda) howsoever Mercator bring it from Paryardes.

†. X I I.

Of divers incongruities if in this Storie we should take Ararat for Armenia.

O asit doth first appeare, that there is no certaintie what Mountaine Ararat was: for the Bookes of the Sybils fet it in Phrygia, and Berofus in Armenia: and as for Berosus authoritie, those men have great want of proofes that borrow from thence. Secondly, that Baris was the highest Hill, and therefore most likely that the Arke grounded thereon, the affertion and supposition have equall credit: for there are many Hils which exceed all those of Armenia; and if they did not, yet it doth not follow (as is before written) that the Arke should fit on the highest.

Thirdly, it cannot be proved that there is any fuch Hill in Armenia, or in rerum natura, as Baris : for Baris (faith Hierome) fignifieth high Towers : and fo may all high Hils be called indifferently; and therefore we may better give the name of Baris to the, Hils of Caucasus (out of which Indus riseth) than to any Hils of Armenia. For those of Caucafus in the East, are undoubtedly the highest of Asia.

Fourthly, the Authours themselves doe not agree in what Region the Mountaines Gordiai stand: for Ptolomie distinguisheth the Mountaines of Armenia from the Gordiaan, and calleth those of Armenia Moschici and Paryardes, as aforesaid. Now Paryardes is feated neere the middle of Armenia, out of which on the West-side riseth Euphrates, and out of the East-side, Araxis: and the Mountaines Moschici are those Hils which difjoyne Colchis, Iberia, and Albania (now the Country of the Georgians) from Armenia.

Of the contrary lituation of Armenia, to the place noted in the Text: and that it is no marvaile that the same Ledge of Hils running from Armenia to India, should keepe the same name all along: and even in India be called Ararat.

Aftly, we must blow up this Mountaine Ararat it selfe, or else we must digge downe, and carry it out of Armenia, or find it else where, and in a warmer Country, and (withall) fer it East from Shinaar; or else we shall wound the Truth it selse with the weapons of our owne vaine imaginations.

Therefore to make the mistaking open to every eye, we must understand, that Art rat (named by Moses) is not any one Hill, so called, no more than any one Hill among those Mountaines which divide Italie from France, is called the Alpes: or any one a mong those which part France from Spaine is the Pyrenian; but as these, being continu ations of many Hils, keepe one name in divers Countries: fo all that long Ledge of mountaines, which Plinie calleth by one name Taurus, and Ptolomie both Taurus, Niphaus Coatras, Coronus, Sariphi, untill they encounter and croffe the Mountaines of the great Imaus, are of one generall name, and are called the Mountaines of Ararat or Armenia, because from thence or thereabout they seeme to arise. So all these Mountaines of Hycania, Armenia, Coraxis, Caspii, Moschiel, Amazonici, Heniochi, Scythici, (thus diversly called by Plinie and others) Prolomie cals by one name Caucasus, lying betweene the Seas Caspium and Euxinus: as all those Mountaines which cut asunder America, even so from the new kingdome of Granado, to the streight of Magellan, are by one name called Andes. And as these Mountaines of Ararat runne East and West, so doe those marvais lous Mountaines of Imaus firetch themselves North and South; and being of like extent well-neere, are called by the name of Imaus, even as Plinie called these former hils Take rus, and Moses the hils of Ararat. The reason of severall names given by Ptolomie, Was, thereby the better to distinguish the great Regions and Kingdomes, which these great mountaines bound and diffever; as Armenia, Mesopotamia, Assyria, Media, Susiana, Persia, Parthia, Caramania, Aria, Margiana, Battria, Sogdiana, and Paropanisus: having all these Kindomes either on the North or South side of them. For all the mountaines of Asia (both the leffe and the greater) have three generall names, (to wit) Taurus, Imvus, and Caucafus: and they receive other titles, as they fever and divide particular places and regions. For these mountaines which funder Cilicia from the rest of A flathelesse on the North side, are called Taurus; and those mountaines, which part it from Comagena (a Province of Syria) are called Amanus: the mountaines called Taurus running East and West, as Imaus doth North and South. Through Taurus the River of Euphrates forceth her paffage, leaving the name of Amanus to the mountaines on her West-banke, and on her East side the mountaines are sometimes knowne by the name To of Taurus, (as in Ptolomies three tables of Asia) and sometimes Niphates; (as in the fourth) retaining that uncertaine appellation fo long as they bound Armenia from Melopotamia: and after the River of Tygris cutteth them afunder, they then take the name of Niphates altogether, untill they separate Assyria and Media; but then they call themfelves Coatras, though betweene the upper and nether Media, they doe not appeare, but altogether discontinue. For at Mazada in Media they are not found, but runne through the Easterne Media by pieces: in the middle of which Region they call themselves 0fontes, and towards the East part Coronus; out of the Southerne part whereof the River of Bagradus rifeth, which divideth the ancient Persian from Caramania: and then continuing their course Eastward by the name of Coronus, they give to the Parthians and Hyrcanians their proper Countries. This done, they change themselves into the mounraines of Sariphi, out of which rifeth the River Margus, afterward yeelding her selfe to Oxus (now Abia): and drawing now neere their wayes end, they first make themselves the South border of Bactria, and are then honoured with the Title of Paropanisus and lastly of Caucasia, even where the famous River of Indus, with his principal companions Hydaspis and Zaredrus, spring forth and take beginning. And here doe these Mountaines build themselves exceeding high, to equal the strong Hils called Imaus of Scythia, which encounter each other in 35. 36 and 37 degrees of Latitude, and in 140. of Longirude : of the which the West parts are now called Delanguer, and the rest Nagracot; and these Mountaines in this place onely are properly called Caucasi (saith Ptolomie) that Ptolomie) is, betweene Paropanists and Imaus: and improperly, betweene the two Seas of Caspiam and Pontus.

of the best vine naturally growing on the South side of the Mountaines Caucasi and toward the East Indies: and of other excellencies of the soile.

TOw in this part of the Worlditis, where the Mountaine and River Janus; & the Mountaine Nyseus (so called of Bacchus Niseus or Noah) are found: and on these highest Mountaines of that part of the world did Goropius Becanus conceive that the Arke of Noah grounded after the Floud; of all his conjectures the most probable, and by best reason approved. In his Indoscythia he hath many good Arguments, though mixt with other fantastical opinions of this subject. And as the same Becanus also noteth, that as in this part of the world are found the best Vines: so it is as true, that in the same Line, and in 34.35. & 36. degrees of Septentrionall Latitude, are the most delicate Winesof the World, namely, in Judaa, Candia, and other parts of Greece: and likewife in this Region of Margiana: and under these Mountaines Strabo affirmeth, that the most excellent Vines of the World are found; the clusters of Grapes containing two Cubits of length: & it is the more probable, because this place agreeth in Climate with that part of Palestina, wherethe fearchers of the land, by Mofes direction, found bunches of equal bignes at Efcol. Num o.13.13.

The fruitfulnesse of this place (to wit) on the South bottome of these Hils, Curtius wirneffeth. Forin Margiana neere the Mountaines of Meros did Alexander feaft himselfe and his Armie tendaies together, finding the most delicate Wine of all other.

The conclusion, with a briefe repeating of divers chiefe points.

A Nd therefore to conclude this opinion of Ararat, it is true, that those Mountaines doe also traverse Armenia: yea, and Armenia it selfe sometime is knowne by the name of Ararat. But as Plinie giveth to this ledge of high Hils, even from Cilicia to Paroponisus and Caucasus, the name of Taurus: and as the Hils of France and Germanie are called the Alpes: and all betweene France and Spaine the Pyrenes: and in America the continuation of Hils for 3000 miles together, the Andes: so was Ararat the generall name which Moses gave them; the diversitie of appellations no otherwise growing, than name which Moses gave them; the diversitie of appellations no otherwise growing, than the diversity dividing and bordering divers Regions and divers Countries. For in the like by their dividing and bordering divers Regions and divers Countries. For in the like case doe we call the Sea, which entreth by Gibraltar, the Mediterran and inland Sea; and yet where it washeth the Coasts of Carthage, and over against it, it is called Tyrrhenum: betweene Italie and Greece, Ionium: from Venice to Durazzo, Adriaticum: betweene Athens and Asia, Aegeum: betweene Sesus and Abydus, Hellespont: and afterward to Pontus, Propontis, and Bosphorus. And as in these, so is the Ocean to the North-cast part of Scotland called Deucaledonycum: and on this side, the Brittaine Sea: to the East, the Germane and Baltick, and then the Frozen.

For a finall end of this question we must appeale to that Judge, which cannot erre, even to the Word of Truth, which in this place is to be taken and followed according to the plaine sense: seeing it can admit neither distinction, nor other construction than the plaine sense: seeing it can admit neither distinction, nor other construction than the words beare literally, because they are used to the very same plaine purpose of a dewords beare literally, because they are used to the very same plaine purpose of a description, and the making of a true and precise difference of places. Surely, where the sense is plaine (and being so understood, it bringeth with it no subsequent inconvenience or contrarietic) we ought to be warie, how we fancie to our selves any new or strange examposition; And (withall) to resolve our selves, that every word as aforesaid) hath his weight in Gods Booke. And therefore we must respect and reverence the testimonies of the Scriptures throughout, in such sort as Saint Angustine hath taught us touching the Gospell of Christ Jesus (which is) Nequis aliter accipiat (quod narrantibus Discipulis Christ) in Evangelio legerit, quam si ipsam manum Dei, quam in proprio corpore gestabat, conspexerit; That no man otherwise take or understand that which he readeth in the Sospel (the Disciples of Christ having writtenit Ithan is he had seene the very hand of the Lord;

The wordes then of Moses which end this dispute, are these: And as they went from the East, they found a Playne in the land of Shinaar, and there they abode: which provethy without controversie, that Nimrod, and all with him, came from the East into Shinaar; and therefore the Arke of Noah rested and tooke land to the East-ward thereof. For we must remember, that in all places wheresoever Moses maketha difference of Countries, he alwayes precifely nameth toward what quarters of the world the fame were feated: as where he teacheth the plantation of Joctan, he nameth Sephar, a Mount in the East: where he remembreth Cains departure from the presence of God, he addeth; And CAIN dwelt in the land of Nod towards the East-side of Eden: And when he describeth the Tents and Habitations of Abraham after he departed from Sechem, he useth these words; Afterwards removing thence unto a Mountaine East-ward from Bethel, he pitched his Tents: baving Bethel on the West-side, and Hai on the East: and afterward in the ninth Verse of the same Chapter it is written; And ABRAHAM went forth journeying towards the South also when Ezechiel prophecieth of Gog and Magog, he sheweth that these Nations of Togorma were of the North quarters and of the Queene of Sabait is written, that she came from the South to visit Salomon: And the Magi (or wisemen) came out of the East to offer presents unto Christ. And that all Regions, and these travailes were precisely set down upon the points of the Compasse and quarters of the world, it is most manifest: for Eden was due East from Judea; Saba South from Hierusalem: the way from Bethel to Egypt directly South; and the Calofyrians, the Tubalines and Magogians inhabited the Regions directly North from Palestina, and so of the rest. But Armenia answereth not to this description of Shinaar by Moses. For to come out of Armenia, and to arrive in 50 that Valley of Babylonia, is not a journying from the East, nor so neere unto the East as the North: for Armenia is to the West of the Northit selfe; and we must not say of Moses (whose hands the holy Ghost directed) that he erred toto calo, and that he knew not East from West. For the body of Armenia standeth in fortie three degrees Septentrionall, and the North part thereof in forty five; and those Gordiaan Mountaines, whereon it was supposed that the Arke rested, stand in fortie one. But Babylonia, and the Valley of Shinaar are fituated in thirtie five; and for the Longitude (which maketh the differ ence betweene East and West) the Gordinan Mountaines stand in 75. degrees, and the Vally of Shinaar in 79. and 80. And therefore Armenia lyeth from Shinaar Northwest, nintie five degrees from the East; and if Armenia had beene but North, vet ir had differed from the East one whole quarter of the Compasse. But Gregorie and Hierome warne us, Inscripturis ne minima differentia omitti debet: nam singuli sermones. Collaba, apices, & puncta in divina Scriptura plena sunt sensibus; In the Scriptures the least difference may not be omitted: for every speech, syllable, note, or accent, and point in divine Scriptimes are replenished with their meanings. And therefore seeing Moss teacher hus that the children of Noah came from the East, we may not believe Writers (of little authority) who also speake by heare-say and by report, ut fertur, & ut dicitur, as Berosus and Nicolaus Damascenus, determining herein without any examination of the Text, at alladventure. But this is infallibly true, that Shinaar lyeth West from the place where the Arke of Noah rested after the floud; and therefore it first found ground in the East. from whence came the first knowledge of all things. The East parts were first civill. which had Noah himselfe for an Instructer: and directly East from Shinaar in the same degree of 25 are the greatest grapes and the best Wine. The great Armies also which overtopped in number those Millions of Semiranis, prove, that those parts were first planted. And whereas the other opinion hath neither Scripture nor Reason sufficient: for my selfe I build on his words who in plaine termes hath told us, that the Sonnes of Noah came out of the East into Shinaar, and there they abode. And therefore did the Arke rest on those Easterne Mountaines, called by one generall name Tanrus, and by Moses the Mountaines of Ararat, and not on those Mountaines of the North-west, as Berosus first fained, whom most part of the Writers have followed therein. It was, I say, in the plentifull warme East where Noah rested, where he planted the Vine, where he tilled the ground and lived thereon. Placuit vero Noacho agricultura studium, in qua tractanda inse omnium peritifimus esse dicitur: ob eamq; rem sua ipsius lingua Ish-Adamath (hoc est telluris vir appellatur celebratufa; est. The studie of Husbandriepleased Noah (faith the excellent learned man Arias Montanus) in the knowledge and order of which it is faid, that Noah excelled all men: and therefore was bee called in his owne language a man exercised in the earth. Which also sneweth, that he was no Wanderer; and that he troubled not himselfe with the contentions, beginning again in the world, and among men, but stayed in his destined places, and in that part of the world, where he was first delivered out of the prison of the Arke, whereinto God had committed him, to preferve him and mankind.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first planting of Nations after the Floud; and of the Sons of NOAH, SHEM, HAM, and TAPHET, by whom the earth was re-peopled.

Whether SHEM and HAM were elder than JAPHET.

Fifthese Sonnes of Noah, which was the eldest, there is a question made. Saint Augustine esteemed Shem for the eldest, Ham for the second, and Japher for Augustine esteemed Shem for the eldest, Ham for the second, and Japher for Augustinity the youngest: and herein the opinions of Writers are divers. But this we Declarate finde every where in the Scriptures, and especially in Moses, that there was never any respect given to the eldest in yeeres, but in vertue; as by the examples of Henoch, Abraham, Jacob, and David, is made manifest. In a few words, this is the ground of the controversie; The Latine translation, and so the Geneva, hath converted this Scripture of Genesis the 10.0.21. in these words: Unto Shem also the Father of all the Sonnes of Heber, and elder brother of JAPHET, were children borne. But Junius agreeing with the Septuagint, placeth the same words in this manner: to Shim also the Father of all the Sons of HEBER, and brother of JAPHET the eldest sonne, were children borne: So the transposition of the word (elder) made this difference. For if the word (elder) had followed after Japhet, as it is in the vulgar translation placed before it, then had it beene as plaine for Japhet, as it is by these translations for Shem. Now(the mat-

bloud, but to the eldest in pietie, yet the arguments are stronger for faphet than for shem. And where the Scriptures are plainely understood without any danger or inconvenience. it seemeth strange why any man of judgement should make valuation of conjecturall arguments, or mens opinions. For it appeareth that Noah in the five hundreth yeere of his gomenes, or mens opinions of his three Sonnes, Shem, Ham, and Japhet: and in the fixe hundreth life, begate the first of his three Sonnes, Shem, Ham, and Japhet: yeere (to wit) the hundreth yeere following, came the generall floud; two yeeres after which shem begate Arphaxad, which was in the yeere 602. of Noahs life, and in the yeere of Shems life one hundred: fo as Shem was but 100. yeeres old, two yeeres after the floud : and Noah begat his first borne being 500. yeers old, and therefore, were Shem the elder, he had then beene a hundred yeeres old at the floud, and in the fixe hundreth is yeere of Noahs life, and not two yeeres after. Which feeing the Scriptures before remembred hath denyed him, and that it is also written: Then NOAH awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger some had done unto him (to wit) HAM; of necessitie the first placedoth belong to Japhet. This younger son, so converted by the vulgar and Geneva, Ju. placedotti belong to Japanes 1 in Joungest some; but S. Chrysoftome takes it otherwise, and nius turnes it filius minimus; His youngest some; but S. Chrysoftome takes it otherwise, and findes Cham to be the middle or fecond brother, and Fapher the youngest sonne of all: which Cham for his disobedience and the contempt of his Father (whose nakednesse he derided) was dif-inherited, and loft the preeminencie of his birth, as Efau and Ruben did. Percrius conceiveth that Ham was called the younger in respect of Shem the eldest, but avoweth withall, that the Hebrew hath not that precise difference of younger and youngest, because it wanteth the comparative degree. It is true that Shem himselfe was alwayes named in the first place, yet whereas in the first Verse of the tenth Chapter of Genesis, Shem is accounted before Japhet: in the second Verse Moses leaveth to begin with the iffue by shem, and reciteth the children of Japhet first. So the first place was given to Shem for his election and benediction, and for this weightie respect, that the Hebrem Nation, Abraham, the Prophets, David, and Christ our Saviour were descended of him. And therefore, whether we shall follow the Vulgar Pagninus, and the Geneva, who agree in this conversion, SHEM Frater JAPHET major; or with the Septuagint, Junius and Tremelius, SHEM fratris JAPHET majoris 5 or with Pererius, SHEM frater JAPHET ille magnus: inferring that Shem was the great and famous brother of Japhet, let the Read der judge. But for ought that I have seene to the contrarie, it appeareth to me that Japher was the eldeft. For where Pererius qualifieth the strength of the former Argument, That Shems age at the time of the floud did not agree with the eldership (with a supposition that the Scriptures tooke no account of smaller numbers) I doe not finde in the Scriptures tures any fuch neglect at all: for it is written, that SHEM was an hundred yeeres old, or be. gat Arphaxad imo yeeres after the floud; and againe in the 12. Verse: So Shela livel after he begat EBAR, foure hundred and three yeeres, Gre. fo as the number of two yeers, of three yeeres, of five yeeres, and afterward of two yeeres, were alwayes precifely accounted.

Of divers things that in all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the world as that all Histories must yeeld to Moses: that the world was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that knowne great Lords of the first ages were of the Issue of HAM.

Ut let us goe unto the Worlds plantation after the floud, which being rightly understood, we shall find that many Nations have supposed or fayned themselves those Ancestors and Fathers, which never faw or approached the bounds of their 50 Countries, and of whom they are by no way or branch descended. For it is plaine in the Scriptures how the fons and iffues of Noah were distributed, and what Regions were first planted by them, from whence by degrees the rest of the world was also peopled. And if any prophane Author may receive allowance herein, the same must be with this caution, That they take their beginning where the Scriptures end. For fo far as the story of Nations is therin handled, we must know, that both the truth & antiquity of the books of God find no companions equall, either in age or authority. All record, memoric, and testimony of antiquitie what loever, which hath come to the knowledge of men, the fame hath beene borrowed thence, and therefore later than it, as all carefull observers of time have noted: among which thus writeth Eufebius in the Proame of his Chronologie: Mos Es is found more ancient than all those whom the Grecians make most ancient, as Homer, Hesion, and the Trajan warre; and far before Hercules, Museus, Linus, Chiron; ORPHEUS, CASTOR, POLLUX, ASCULAPIUS, BACCHUS, MERCURIUS, and Apollo. and the rest of the gods of the nations, their Ceremonies, or holy Rites, or Prophets: and before all the deeds of Jupiren, whom the Greekes have feated in the top and highest Turret of their Divinitie.

For of the three Jupiters remembred by Cicero, the ancientest was the some of Ather citero de Nace whose three sons begotten on Proserpina, were borne at Athens, of which Cecrops was the Decrumilis. first King: and in the end of Cecrops time did Moses bring the children of Israel out of Egypt: Eduxit Moses populum Dei ex Egypto novisimo tempore Cecropis Atheniensis Regis: Moses brought the children of Israel out of Egypt, in the last dayes of Cecrops, king of the Athenians, faith S. Augustine : and yet was not Cecrops the Founder of the Citie it Decivil Dei, felfe, but Thefens long after him. But because the truth hereof is diversly proved, and by many learned Authors; I will not cut afunder the purpose in hand, by alledging many authorities in a needlesse question, but leave it to the proper place.

First, we are to consider that the world after the Floud was not planted by imaginations neither had the children of Noah wings to flie from Shinaar to the uttermost border of Europe, Africa, and A sia, in haste, but that these children were directed by a wife Fathers who knew those parts of the world before the Floud, to which he disposed his children after it, and fent them not as Difcoverers, or at all-adventure, but affigured and allotted to every Sonne and their iffues, their proper parts. And not to hearken to fabulous Authors, who have no other end than to flatter Princes (as Virgil did Augustus in the fiction of Aneas) or else to glorifie their owne Nations; Let us build herein upon the Scriptures themselves, and after them upon Reason and Nature. First therefore we must call to minde and consider, what manner of face the earth every-where had in the 130-yeere after the great inundation, and by comparing those fruitfillest Vallies, with our own barren and cold ground, informe our felves thereby, what wonderfull Defarts, what impassable fastnesse of woods, reeds, bryars, and rotten grasse, what Lakes and standing Pooles, and what Marishes, Fens, and Bogs, all the face of the earth (excepting the Mountaines) was peftered withall. For if in this our Climate (where the dead and destroying Winter depresset all vegetative and growing Nature, for one halfe of the yeere in effect) yet in twenty or thirty yeers, these our grounds would all overgrow and be covered (according to the nature thereof) either with Woods, or with other of fensive Thickets and Bushments: much more did all forts of Plants, Reedes, and Trees, prosper in the most fruitfull Vallies, and in the Climate of a long and warme Summer, and having withall the flart of 130. years, to raife themselves without controlement.

This being confidered, it will appeare, that all these people which came into Shinaar, 50 and over whom Nimrod either by order or strength tooke the Dominion, did after the confusion of Languages, and at such time as they grew to be a mighty People, disperse themselves into the Regions adjoyning to the said Vallie of shinaar, which contained the best part of Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and Chaldaa; and from the borders thereof in time they were propagated, some of them rowards the South, others towards the West and North. And although there were allotted to Shem many Regions, both East and West from Shinaar, with the Dominion of Palastina, which the Canaanits first possest; yet could be not enjoy the lot of his inheritance on the sudden, but by time and degrees. For wee finde, that Abraham, the true successions of shem, dwelt in CHAP.8. $.2.

Chaldea at Ur; and from thence (called by God) he rested at Charran in Mesopotamia: from whence after the death of Thare he travailed to Sichem in Palestina: and yet there had passed betweene Shem and Abraham (reckoning neither of themselves) seven Descents, before Abraham moved out of Chaldea; where, and in Babylonia, all those people by Nimrod commanded, inhabited for many yeers, and whence Nimrod went out into Assyria, and sounded Nineve. Indeed the great Masters of Nations (as farre as we can know) were, in that Age of the Issues of Ham; the blessing of God given by Nosh to Shem and Japhet taking lesse effect, untill divers yeers were consumed; and untill the time arrived, which by the wisedome of God was apointed. For of Chus, Mikraim, and Canain, came the People and Princes, which held the great Kingdomes of Babylonia, Syina, and Egypt, for many Descents together.

6. III.

Of the Iles of the Gentiles in Japhers portion: of Berosus his too speedie seating Gomer the some of Japher in Italie; and another of Japhers somes Tubal in Spaine:

and of the Antiquitie of Longingue Navigation.

O begin therefore (where Moses beginneth) with the sonnes of Japheth, among whom the Iles of the Gentiles were divided: which division, as well to Japhets fons as to the rest which came into Shinaar, was (if the division were made at Phalegs birth) in the yeere of the World 1757. or 1758. and (by that account) in the yeares after the Floud one hundred and one, of which question elsewhere.

The habitations proper to the sonnes of Japhet were the Iles of the Gentiles, which include all Europe with all the Ilands adjoyning, and compassing it about: Europe being also taken for an Iland, both in respect that the Sea Hellespont and Ageum, Bosphorus and Euxinus cut it off from the great Continent of Asia, as also because Europe it selfeis (in effect) surrounded with water, faving that it is fastned to Asia by the North, for it hash those Seas before named to the East, the Mediterran to the South and Southwest, the Oceanto the West, and Brittish, Germane, and Balticke Sea, with that of Glaciale to the North North-east, and North-west. Besides, it hath about it all the Cyclades or Iles lying between Greece and the lesser Asia, and the Iles of Rhodes, Cyprus, Creete, or Candia, Sicilia, Carsica, Sardinia, Malta, the Iles of Brittanie and Zealand, with their young ones adjacent.

Funct-Chronol.

This partition and portion of Japheth, with the part which he held in Afia, and the North, which was also very great, answereth to that bleffing of God by Noah, Dilatt Deus Japheth; Let God fread abroad (or increase the Posteritie of) Japheth, and let him dwell in the Tents of SHEM. For though Junius here useth the word (alliciat) and not dilatet: and the Geneva persuadeat; vet the Septuagint have dilatet or amplificat; and fuch was the bleffing given to our Fathers, which God promifed to Abraham us and his Seede for ever. And the dwelling in the Tents or Tabernacles of Shem wasa bleffing by God to the Posteritie of Japheth: noting not onely an enlargement of Territories, but that thereby they should be made participant of Gods Church. But to come to Japhets sonnes, of whom Gomer is the eldest. This Gomer (if we may believe Berofus and Annius, whose authoritie the greatest number of all our late Writers have followed) did in the the tenth yeer of Nimrods Reign depart from Babylonia and planted Italie: which also Functius confirmeth in these words, Anno decime NIMRODI, Cr. In the tenth yeere of NIMRODS Reigne, GOMERUS GALLUS planted a Colonie in that Land afterward called Italie: and in the twelfth yeere of the same NIMRODS Reignt Tue Al Cated himselfe in Austuria in Spaine (new called Biscay) which was in the 140.4nd in the 142 yeares after the Floud, according to BEROSUS. But this opinion is very ridiculous. For before the confusion of Tongues the children of Noah did not separate themselves, at least so many of them as came with Nimred into Shinaar. Let us therefore confider with reason, what time the building such a Citie and Tower required, where there was no prepared matter, norany readie meanes to performe fuch a worke as Nimrod had erected (and as Functius himselfe out of his Author Berofus witnesset) ad alitudinem & magnitudinem montium; To the beighth and magnitude of the Mountaines. Sure that both this Citic and Tower was almost builded, the Scriptures witnesse: But the Lord came downe to fee the Citie and Tower, which the Sonnes of menbuilded. Let us generate then but allot a time fufficient for the making of Bricke to fuch a Worke, of the greatest heighth (and therefore of circuit and foundation answerable) that ever was: For where the univerfall Floud covered the highest Mountaines fifteene Cubits; Let us build us a Citie and Tower (faith NIMROD) whose top may reach unto the Heaven: meaning, that they would raise their Worke above fifteene Cubits higher than the highest Mountaine. otherwise they could not affure themselves from the seare of a second inundation: a great part whereof was finished before it fell, and before they left the Worke. They alfo began this building upon a ground, the most oppressed with waters of all the world: 20 as by the great ruine which these waters, forcibly over-bearing and over-slowing, made in the time of the succeeding Emperours, is made manifest, approved also by the Prophet Hieremy, speaking of Babylon in these words: Thou that dwellest upon many waters. It cannot be doubted but that there needed a fubstantiall foundation, for fo high a raifed building on a marish ground: and to which, Glycas upon Genesis giveth forty vecres. For it feemeth, that the Tower was neere finished when God overthrew it: it being afterward written, So the Lord scattered them from thence upon all the Earth, and they left to build the Citie. Out of which place it may be gathered (because the Tower is not then named) that they very neere had performed the Work of their supposed defence, which was the Tower: and that afterward they went on with the Citic adjoyning, wherein they inhabited. It is also to be noted, that till such time as this contusion seized them (whereupon the Tower was throwne down) these Nations did not disperse themselves: for from thence the Lord scattered them upon all the Earth, (that was) when they perceived Genti not one anothers speech. Now to thinke that this worke in the newnesse of the World (wanting all inftruments and materials) could be performed in ten yeares; and that Tubal and Gomer in the same yeere could creepe through 3000 miles of Defart, with Women, Children, and Cattell: let those light Beleevers, that neither tye themselves to the Scripture, nor to reason approve it, for I doe not. And if the Arke of Noah was 100. yeares in building, or but neere fuch a time, (and then) when the World had frood 1556. yeares, it were more than foolishnesse and madnesse it selfe, to thinke that such a Worke as this could be performed inten; when the World (from the Floud to the arrivall at Babel, and beginning of this building there) had but 131. yeares, and whereof they had spent some part in travelling from the East. Againe, if all Asia set to their The helping hands in the building of the Temple of Diana, and yet they confumed in that Work 400. yeares (or be it but halfe that time) and in fuch an Age as when the World flourished in all forts of Artificers, and with aboundant plentie of materials and carriages: This Worke of the Tower of ? oel could hardly (with all the former wants supposed) be erected in those few yeers remembred. And for conclusion, let all men of judgement. weigh with themfelves how impossible it was for a Nation or Family of men, with their Wives, and Children, and Cattell, to travell 3000 miles through Woods, Bogs, and Defarts, without any Guide or Conductor; and we shall find it rather a Worke of 100. years than of 100 dayes. For in the West Indies, of which the Spaniards have the experience, in those places where they found neither Path nor Guide, they have not entred the Countrey ten miles in ten yeeres. And if Nimrods people spent many yeeres by the account before remembred in passing from the East India or the higher part thereof, which standeth in 115. Degrees of Longitude, untill they came into Shinaer which lyeth in 79. Degrees (the distance betweene those places contaying 36. Degrees, which makes 720. Leagues, which is 2160. miles) & did all the way keepe the Mountaines and hard ground; then the difference betweene Babylon and Bifeay is much more: for the bodie of Biscay lyeth inten Degrees, and Babylon or Shinaar, (as aforefaid) in 79. so the length of way from Shinaar to Aufturia or Biscay is 69. Degrees, which make 1380. Leagues, or of miles 4140. And therefore if Nimrod tooke divers yeares to find Shinaar, which was but 2160 miles:or (supposing that the Arke rested in Armenia) little above 400 miles: there is no cause to the contrary, but to allow as many yeeres to Gomer and Tubal to travaile 3000. miles, to Countries leffe knowne unto them by far, than the Land of Shinar was to Nimrod. For Paradife was knowne to Noah before the Floud: and fo was the Region of Eden by Moses afterward remembred; but what hee understood of most part of the World else it is unknowne. And therefore did Anniu ill advise himself to plant Gomer in Italie, and Tubal in Spaine, in the tenth and twelfth of Nim-rods Reigne: Shall the Earth be brought forth in one day, or shall a Nation be borne at once ? But it may be objected, That the Sonnes of Japheth might come by Sea, and fo fave this great travaile through Defarts by Land. But we never reade of any Navigation in those dayes, nor long after. Surely he that knoweth what it is to imbarke fogreat a people as we may justly suppose those Conductors carryed with them, will not easily beleeve that there were any Veffels in those dayes to transport Armies, and (withall) their Cattell, by whose milke they lived and fed their Children: For Milke and Fruit were the banquetting Dishes of our Fore-Fathers. And in the eldest times, even the Kings and Fathers of Nations valued themselves by the Heards and numbers of their Cattell: who had Flockes of Sheepe, and great Droves, and Heards of their owne, and their owne Sheep-heards and Heardsmen. Now if Tubal had past by Seasfrom any part of Palastina, Syria, or Cilicia, he might have made good choice within the Streights, and not haveover gone Granado, Valentia, and other Provinces in that Tract: pass the Streights of Gibralter, disdayned all Andalusia, and Portugal, with all those goodly Ports and Countries; and have fought out the iron, woody, and barren Countrie of the World (called Bifcar) by a long and dangerous Navigation. But before the journey of the Argonautæ, there were scarce any Vessels that durst crosse the Seas in that part of the world : aud yet that which Talon had (if the Tale be true) was but a Galley, and a poore one (God knowes) and perchance fuch as they use this day in Ireland: which although it carryed but source and fifty Passengers, yet it was farre greater than any of the former times: Erat enim antea parvarum navicularum usus: For in former times they used very small Vessels. I deny not but that the Tyrians gave themselves of old to far-off Navigations, whence Tibulius ascribed the invention of Ships unto them:

And for those Boats called longe naves or Gallies, Pliny faith that Agesias ascribeth the device to Paralus: and Philostephanus to Jason: Ctesias to Samyras; and Saphanus to Semiramis : Archimachus to Ageon : to which invention the Erythrai are faid to have added certaine numbers of Oares: and then Aminocles the Corinthian to have increased them the Carthaginians afterwards to have brought them to foure Bankes: the Quing, Remi first to have beene used by Nesichthon the Salaminian, with which vessels in those parts of the World, the Romans ferved themselves in the Punicke Warre. But these be perhaps but the partialities of Writers, or their ignorance. For there are that as constantly cast the devising of these Gallies on Selosiris, though Semiramis used them in the passage of her Armie over Indus in Abrahams time. So it is faid, that Danaus was the first that brought a Ship into Greece: and yet the Samothracians challenge the invention; and yet Evange 1. Tertide commit Tertullian (on the contrarie) gives it to Minerva: others to Neptune: Thucydides to the Corinthians. And so ignorant were the people of those Ages, as the Egyptians used wi coast the Shores of the Red Seaupon raffes, devised by King Erythrus: and in the time of the Romans, the Brittans had a kind of Boat (with which they crost the Seas) made of small twigs, and covered over with Leather: of which kind I have seene at the Dingle in Ireland, and elfewhere. And although it cannot be denyed, when Noah by Gods infpiration was inftructed in fo many particulars concerning the Arke, that then many things concerning Navigation were first revealed; yet it appeares that there was much difference betweene the Arke of Noah, and fuch Ships as were for any long Navigation. Yea, ancient Stories shew; that it was long after these times, ere any durst presume upon any long Voyages to Sea, at least with multitudes of Women, and Children, and Cattell: as also common reason cantellus, that even now when this Art is come to her perfection, such Voyages are very troublesome and dangerous. So as it doth appeare, that there was not in that Age of Nimrod any Ship, or use of Ships fit for any long Navigation. For if Gomer and Tubal had passed themselves and their people by Sea; the exercise of Navigation would nor have beene dead for fo many hundred yeares after. Leaving therefore the fabulous to their Fables, and all men elfeto their fancies, who have cast Nations into Countries far off, I know not how, I will follow herein the Relation of Moses and the Prophets: to which Truth there is joyned both Nature, Reason, Policie, and Necessitie: and to the rest, neither probabilitie, nor possibilitie.

ullet Ow although many Learned and Reverend men have formed (I know no $^{ar{c}}$ whereby led) a Plantation of the World, which also hath been and is received; yet I hope I may be excused, if I differ altogether from them in many particular lars. Certainly, that great Learned man of this latter Age, Arias Montanus was also in fomethings much militaken: and for Josephus, as he hath many good things, and is a Guide to many errours withall; fo was he in the Plantation of the World very groffe and fabulous; whereby both Eusebius, Hierosolymitanus, Epiphanius, and others, that have taken his tellimonies for currant, have beene by him farre miffe-led. But the better to conceive what Regions of the World Gomer the first some of Japheth possest, as also Tubal, it is needfull to begin with Magog: because the Scriptures take most knowledge of Gog and Magog: which two names have troubled many Commentators, faith Matth. Beroaldus, who hath laboured herein with great diligence, and whom (of all that ever I read) I find most judicious in the examination of this Plantation. Hee takes authoritie from the Prophet Ezechiel chiefly, who in the 38 and 39. Chapters directeth us, what Nations the Gomerians, Tubalines, and Togormians were, together with the Magogians: of which Gog was Prince or Chiefe Conductor in their Attempts against Ifrael. For befides the portions of Europe, and the North-east parts of the greater Asia, which Japheths Issues possest, all Asia the lesse was peopled by them. And that those of the Issue o of Japheth (whom Exechiel speakes of) were seated hereabout, it may best appeare, if we confider the circumstances of the place, and the dependencie upon the former Prophefie in the 37. Chapter. For in that 37. Chapter, Ezechiel prophefieth of the uniting of the 0.37.1.13 two Kingdomes of Ifrael and Juda, after their deliverie from captivitie.

By which Prophefie of Ezechiel, it appeareth, that God purposed to gather together his people, to give life to dead bones, and to rule them by one Prince. For to that purpole it is written; And David my Servant shall be King over them, and they shall have one Sheepheard, (that is) they shall be united as they were in Davids time. Hereupon in the 38. Chapter, Ezechiel prophefieth against those Nations, which should seeke to impeach this Union, and disturbe the people of Ifrael, whom God purposed to receive to grace, and promifed to restore. And so in the same Chapter are those Nations coupled together, which infested the Israelites after their returne, and sought to subject them: all which were the Subjects or Allies of Gog, Prince of the Mazogians, or Calofyrians, next bordering Palastina, or the holy Land, followed also by the rest of the Nations of Asia the leffe, which lay North from Judaa. The words of Ezechiel are these: Sonne of man, C38.0.2; set thy face against Goo, and against the Land of Magoo, the chiefe Princes of Messech (or Mosoch) and Tueal: and afterward; Behold, I come against the chiefe Prince of MESECH and TUEAL: and in the fixth verse; Gomen and all his Bands, and the House of Togorma of the North quarters. Herein Ezechiel having first delivered the purpose of his Prophecie, teacheth what Nations they were, that should in vanitie affayle Ifrael. He joyneth them together under their Prince Gog, and sheweth that their habitations were on the North quarters of Juda, and how feated and joyned together. Gog fignifieth in the Hebrew (faith Saint Hierome) tectum or covering of a house: and Pintus upon Ezechiel affirmeth that by Goz is meant Antichrist: for (faith he) Antichri-Amerit Diaboli tegumentum sub specie humana: That Antichrist shall be the covering of the Devillunder bumane forme. He addeth, that Mazog is as much to fay as Gog: the Letter (M) being an Hebrew Preposition, and importeth as much as of or from: so hee taketh Magog for those people which follow Ancichrist. So farre Pintus; at least in this not amiffe, that he expoundeth Magog not for any one person, but for a Nation; with which to agreeth this observation of Beroaldus. Magog (faith he) in Hebrew is written Ham-Ma. gog, which sheweth Magog to be a Region or Nation: for the Letter (He) which is used but for an Emphasis (which the Hebrewes call Heliajedia) is never added to proper names of men, but often to place. So as Gog was Prince of that Nation (called either Magog, or, according to others, the people of Gog) also Prince of Meshech, (or Mosoch) and of Tubal: as by the first Verse of the 29. Chapter is made manifest: Behold I come against thee Gog the chiefe Prince of MESHECH and TUBAL. This must needes bee meant by the Successours of Seleucus Nicanor, who did not (as other conquering Nations) seeke to make the Jewes their Tributaries only, but indevoured by all meanes, and by all kinde of violence to extinguish the Religion it selfe (which the Hebrewes profest) and the acknowledging of one true God: and to force them to worship and serve the mortall and rotten gods of the Heathen; of which nothing remained but the very name, and dead Images, Saint Ambrofe and Isidore take Gog for the Nation of the Goths . belike because they invaded Europe, and facked Rome, and many other places and Cities thereabour. Hermolaus Barbarus out of Pomp. Mela derives the Turkes from the Scythians, esteemed Magogians of Gog. Many take Gog for the proper name of a Man: others of a Region: others for a Nation inhabiting a Region, as Junius, who fayes that Gog is the name of a Nation, denominated from him whom the Greekes Stories call Gyges: who in former time having slaine Candaules the Lydian, gave his owne name to that Nation, thence after called Gygades: and thereof also the Gygean Lake; which Lake Strabo also findeth in Lydia, (of which Gyges was King) fortic Furlongs from Sardis Plinie calleth it Gygeum flagnum. Herodotus and Nicander fet it about the Rivers of Hillus, and Manander; but the difference is not great. Marins Niger maketh mention of this Gyges King of Lydia: who after he had fubdued the Countrey about the River Rhodius which runneth into the Hellefpont, called the Promontorie Trapele after his owne name Grees. These Opinions doe also seeme to strengthen that of Junius. For Magog, saith he, is that part of Alia the leffe, which Halyattes obtained, and after him his Sonne Junin Exech 38. Crafus; who (as Junius furthernotes) having mastred all those Regions as farre South as Libanus, in that Border built the Citie Gigarta or Gogkarta (which in the Syrian fignifieth the Citie of Gog) feated in Caloffria, whose people were the ancient Enemies of

Now that Magog is found in Caloffria, Plinie affirmeth, faying; Caloffria habet Banbycen, quæ alio nomine Hierapolis vocatur : Syris verò Magog Cælofyria hath in it Bambya, which by another name is called Hierapolis, but of the Syrians Magog. He further tellethis that the monstrous Idoll Atergatis, called by the Greekes Derceto, was here worshipped Lucian makes mention hereof, faying that the Citie had anciently another name, which yet hee expresseth not; forbearing perhaps the word Magog, as founding nothing elegantly in the Greeke. But if wee may believe Strabo, then was Edeffa in Mesapotamiathe fame Bambyce or Hierapolis, where the fame Idoll was worshipped. Ortelius is doubtful whether one of these Authors did not mistake the place of this Bambyce or Hieraplis. It may well enough bee that the fame name and Religion was common to them both. Certaine it is, that both of them lay due North from Palastina, and were both subjectunto the Kings of the Race of Seleucus. Now I doe not condemne the Opinion of Hermolaus Barbarus following Josephus, but grant that perhaps Mages might also bee the Father of the Scythians; notwithstanding that in this place, where Gog is made the Prince of Magog, the Nations of Calofyria, and the North parts adjoyning bee meant by Magog: for by a latter Plantation from these parts they might bee propagated into Scythia. Yetit is not to bee denyed, that the Scythians in old times comming out of the North-east wasted the better part of Asia the lesse, and possest Calosyria, where they built both Scythopolis and Hierapolis, which the Syrians call Magog. And that to this Magog Ezechiel had reference, it is very plaine: for this Citie Hierapolis or Magog standeth due North from Judea, according to the words of Ezechiel, that from the North quarters those Nations should come. For as the Kings of the South which infested the Ifractites were the Ptolomies, Kings of Egypt: fo those of the North were the Kings of Asia and Syria, the Successours of Seleucus, the Successour of Alexander Macedon. Gulielmus Tyrius thinkes that this Hierapolis is that Rages, menti- Lib 4 capita oned in the Storie of Tobias. Plinie takes it not onely to have beene called Bambyce, as bello Sarro we have faid, but also Edessa: northat by Euphrates; but another of the same name: now the known name is Aleppo: for fo Bellonius expounds this Hierapolis, or Magog. This Citie had the Title of Sacred, as the Sacred Citie, (for fo the word Hierapolis fignifieth) ver was it a place of most detested Idolatry; and wherein was worshipped the Idoll of the Mermayde Atergatis, or Atergitis, according to Plinie, which the Greekes call Derceto.

If then we conferre the words of Ezechiel in the third verse of the thirtie eight Chapter, wherein he joyneth together Gog, Mefech and Tubal; and withall remember that Hierapolis was the Citie of Magog, which also is seated directly North from Judaa: with whom also Exechiel coupleth Gomer, and all his bands of the North quarters; we may (as I conceive) fafely conclude, that these Followers and Vassals of Gog (which were Northerne Nations in respect of Judea) were not the Gomerians of France, nor the Tubalines of Spaine, but a people of the leffer Asia, and Calosgria: and therefore that the opinions of Berofus, Josephus, and who soever else hath followed them therein, are to be reiected. But if Josephus referre himselfe to later times, and thinke that some Colonie of the Tubalines might from Iberia and Asia passe into Spaine (to wit) from that piece of Land betweene Colchis (or Mengrelia) and Albania, (most part possess by the Georgians) then is his judgement of better allowance. For without any repugnancie of opinions, it may be granted, that in processe of time these people might from their first habitation, passe into the Countries neere the Euxine Sea, and from thence in After-Ages into Spaine.

Jolephus makes mention of the Iheri, faying, that they were anciently called Thobelos as of Tubal; from whence (faith Justine) they passed into Spaine to search out the Mines of that Region: having belike understood that it was a Southerly Countrie, and Mountainous. For it feemeth that the Tubalines called Chalybes lived altogether by the exchange of Iron, and other Metals, as Apollonius witneffeth in thefe following Verses, telling how, the Argonautes did visit them:

Hac gens tellurem rigido non vertit aratro. Sed ferri venas (cindit sub montibus altis: Mercibus hec mutat, que vite alimenta ministrant &

The Calybes plough not their barren foyle But undermine high Hils for Iron Veines: Changing the purchase of their endlesse toyle For Merchandize, which their poore lives sustaines,

But it is more probable, that Spain was first peopled by the Africans, who had ever fince an affection to returne thither, and to re-people it anew. This appeared by the Carthagian mians of old, who were easily drawne to passe over the Streights into that Countrey: and after by the Moores who held Granado, and the South parts eight hundred yeeres till the time of Ferdinand and Isabel. And either of these opinions are more probable than that in the twelfrh yeere of Nimrods Reigne, Tubal past into Spaine, and therein built Saint Vual: a poore Towne, and a poore device, God knowes. Certaine it is that we must finde Mosoch or Mesech, and Tubal Neighbours, and Gomer and Togarma noc farre off, or else we shall wrong Ezechiel: for he called Gog the Leader or Prince of Mefech and Tubal, and maketh Gomer and Togarmatheir affiftants. And that Mefech inhabited Asia, Functius (though he followed Berofus) confesseth, for these be his words: Mesacus, qui à Mose Mesech : priscos Mesos ab Adulamente usq, ad Ponsicame regionem posuit : bac regio poste à Cappadocia dista est, in qua mebs Mazica, dec. bac est ATTA MAGOG principalis : Masacus, whom Mosas calleth Masacus, placed the aucient

Mesians from the Mount Adulas, unto the Coast of Pontus. This Region was afterward called Cappadocia, in which is the Towne Maxica, &c. this is the principall Countrey of Magoo. And this doth Annius also avow, and yet forgets that Gog was Prince both of Mesech and Tubal: and therefore that the one was a Nation of Spaniards, the other of Cappa docians, is very ridiculous; Spaine lying directly West, and nor North from Judaa. Also Ezecbiel in the 27. Chapter, where he prophecieth of the destruction of Tyre, nameth Mestech and Tubal joyntly. And for a finall proofe, that these Nations were of a Northren Neighbour Land (how farre foever stretched) EZechiel in the 38. Chapter makes them all Horsemen. Thou, and much people with thee, all shall ride upon Horses, even a great multitude and a mightie. Then if any man beleeve that these troupes came out of Spaine in over the Pyrenes, and first passed over a part of France, Italie, Hungarie, and Sarmatia, and imbarqued againe about the Hellespont, or else compassed all Pontus, and Euxinus, to come into the lesser Asia, which is halfe the length or compasse of the then knowne World; he may be called a ftrong beleever, but he shall never be justified thereby. But On the contrarie, it is knowne, that Select is was a Province neighbouring Palastina or Judea, and that Hierapolis (or Magog) joyned unto it : whose Princes commanded all Syria, and Alathe leffe, (namely, the Seleucida) and held it, till Scipio Afiaticus overthrew Antiochus the Great: after which they yet possest Syriatill the time of Tigranes: and whether Meshech be in Cappadocia, or under Iberia, yet is it of the Tubalines, and one and the fame Dominion.

Of Gomer the like may be faid. First, he seated himselfe with Togorma, not farre from Magog and Tubal, in the borders of Syria and Cilicia. Afterward he proceeded further into Asia the lesse; and in long tract of time his valiant Issue filled all Germanie, rested long in France and Brittanie, and possessed the utmost borders of the earth, accomplishing (as Melanethon well notes) the fignification of their parents name, which is utmost bordering. But when these borderers wanted further place, wherein they might exonerate their fwelling multitudes that were bounded in by the great Ocean, then did they returne upon the Nations occupying the Countries, through which they had formerly passed, oppressing first their Neighbours, afterwards the people more remore. Hereupon it was (as the worthy restorer of our Antiquities M. Willian Cambden hath noted) that they were called Cimbri, which in their old Language doth fignifie Robbers; necessity inforcing them to spoyle their Neighbours, to whom in their original they were as neere joyned, as afterwards in the feates which they possessed. For that the Warlike nations of Germany were in elder Ages accustomed to be beaten by the Gaules, the authoritie of Cafar affirming it, is proofe fufficient. But in times following they purfued richer Conquests, and more easie though further distant, by which (to omit their other enterprises not here to be spoken of) they were drawne at length into Asia the leffe, and occupyed those parts, which had formerly beene held by their Progenitours. I fay not that they claymed those Lands as theirs by Descent; for likely it is, that they knew little of their owne Pedigree. Neyther can any man therefore deny, that they were of old seated in Asia, because in late Ages they returned thirher; unlesse he will thinke, that all those Nations which from farre parts have invaded and conquered the Land of Shinaar, may by that Argument be proved not to have iffved from thence at the

Now concerning Samothes, for his excellent wisedome sirnamed Dis, whom Annie makes the Brother of Gomer and Tubal (which Brother, Moses never heard of, who spake his knowledge of Japhets fonnes) they must find him in fome old Poet: for Function, 2 great Berofian, confesseth: Quis hie Samothes fuerit incertum est; Who this Samothes was, it is uncertaine; neither is there any proofe that he was that same Dis, whom Cest faith the Gaules suppose to be their Ancestor, yea, and Vignier confesseth with Fundim: Mays on ne scayt qui il estoit; No man knowes who he was.

Against the fabulous Berosus his fiction, That the Italian Janus was Noah. Ut before I goe on with Noah his Sonnes, I thinke it is necessarie to disprove the fiction which Assiss hath of Noah himselfe; an invention (indeed) very ridiculous, though warranted (as hee hath wrested) by those Authors of whom

himselfe hath Commented: as the Fragment of Berofus, Fabius, Pittor, Cato, Lavinius and others. For Annus feeks to perswade us, that Noah (furnamed Janus) was the same which Pitt. de aur. seeks founded Genoa, with other Cities in Italie, wherein he lived 92. yeeres. This to disprove, b. founded Genoa, with other Cities in Lauren, wheten the invent 92. years. I has to disprove, on by Moses filence, is a sufficient argument to me, if there were nothing else to disprove it. Laurenillass de origen. For if he vouchfafed to remember the building of Babel, Erec, Achad, Chalne and Nineve Gall. by Nimrod, Noab was a man of too great marke to be forgotten, withall the acts he did in 92. yeeres. But it were a needlesse labour for me to disprove the authoritie of that Berofus, on whom Annius groundeth, feeing fo many learned men have fo demonstratively proved that Fragment to be counterfeit. Besides that, Tatianus the Assprian, in his Oration against the Greekes, avoweth, that the ancient and true Berosus wrote onely three Bookes, dedicated to Antiochus the successor of Seleucus Nicanor : but Annius hath devi- Josephili, fed five Bookes, wherewith he honoureth Berofus. And whereas Berofus handled only the estate of the Chaldeans and Assprians, Annius hath filled this Fragment with the businesse of all the World. And if we may believe Eusebius better than Annius, then all the Kings of the Latines (before Aneas) confumed but 150. yeeres: whereas no man hath doubted, but that from Noah to Eneas arrivall into Italy there past 1126. (after the least rate of the Hebrew account) and (after Codoman) 1291. For Janus (who was the first of their Kings) lived at once with Ruth, who marryed Book in the Worlds yeare(as fome reckon) 27176 after the Floud 1064 and Noah dyed 350. yeares after the Floud: and so there past betweene Janus of Italie and Noah furnamed Janus 704. yeeres. For Saturnus succeeded Janus, Picus after Saturnus, Fannus after Picus, and Latinus followed Fannus: which Latimes lived at once with Tautanes the 27. King of Afgria; with Pelafgus of Peloponnefus; with Demophoon of Athens; and Sampson Judge of Ifrael. Now all these five Kings of the Latines having consumed but one hundred and fiftie years; and the last of them in the time of Sampson: then reckoning upwards for one hundred & fiftie years, and it reacheth Ruth. with whom Fanus lived.

True it is, that the Greekes had their Janus; but this was not Noah; fo had they Ion the some of Xuthus, the some of Deucalion, from whom they draw the Iones, who were Exch 27.19.13. indeed the children of Javan, the fourth some of Japheth. For the yulgar Translation and to the place (where the Hebrewe word is Javan) writes Greece, and the Septuagint, Hellas; which is the (for Javan) Hels same. So had they Medus the son of Madea, whom they make the Parent of the Medes, lada: and (for though they were descended of a far more ancient Father (to wit) Madai the third son of the plurall fu-

Lastly, we see by a true experience, that the Brittish Language hath remayned among us above 2000 yeeres, and the English speech ever since the invasion of the Angles, and the fame continuance have all Nations observed among themselves, though with some corruption and alteration. Therefore it is strange if either Noah (by them called Janus) had left in Italie his Grand-child Gomer after him, or Tubal in Spaine, that no plaine resemblance of the Hebrew, Syrian, or Scythian (which no time could have quite extinguished)should have beene found in the Languages of those Countries. For which reafons we doubt not but these personall Plantations of Janus, Gomer, Tubal, Gro. in Italie, Spaine, or France, are meerely fabulous. Let the Italians therefore content themselves with the Gracian Janus, which commanded them and planted them, and who preceded the fall of Troy but 150. yeeres (faith Eusebins) which was in the time of Latinus, the fift King: which also Saint Augustine and Justine confirme: and this agreeth with reason, time, and possibilitie. And if this be not sufficient to disprove this vanitie, I may out of themselves adde thus much: That whereas some of them make Vesta (others Camasena), the wife of this Janus, who instituted the holy Fire of the Vestal Virgins in Rome (the Latines and Romans taking from Janus all their Idolatrous and Heathenish Ceremonies) there is no man so impious, as to believe that Noah himselfe. (who is faid by Moses to have walked with God, to be a just man, and whom God of all Mankind made choice of could be either ignorant of the true and only God, or so wicked and ungratefull, to set up or devise any Heathen, Salvage, or Idolarrous adoration, or have instituted any Cere-

monie, contrary to that which he knew best pleasing to God himselfes

That Gomer also and his sonne Togorma of the Posterity of Japheth, were first seated about Asia the lesse: and that from thence they spred Westward into Europe and Northward into Sarmatia.

O turne now to the fons of Noah, and the Worlds Plantation after the Floud: therein I observe, that as both reason and necessitie taught them; so, when they multiplyed in great numbers, and dispersed themselves into the next Countries bordering to their first habitations, and from thence sent forth Colonies elsewhere, it was in such a manner as that they might repayre to each other, and keepe intelligence in by River: because the Land was yet Desart, and over-prest with Woods, Reeds, Bogs, & rotten Marishes. As when Nimrod seated in Babylonia, Chus took the South part of Chal. dea, down the River of Gebon, by which he might passe to & fro from Babylon to his own Plantation: those also, which were of the race of Shem, inhabiting at Ur or Orchoa neer the Lakes of Chaldea, might by the fame river get up to Babylon, and receive fuccour from thence. All which Tract of Land upon Gehon Southward, Moses in the description of Paradise calleth the Land of Chush: because the Dominion and Empire, was then in the hands of Nimrod a Chuste, by whom the children of Shem (which came into that Valley and stayed not in the East) were for a while opprest, till God afterward by the seed of A. braham made them his owne Nation and victorious. Havilah, the brother of Nimred, and fonne of Cush, tooke both Bankes of Tygris, especially on the East side of the River: by which River his people might also passe to and fro to Babel.

The Imperial scate of which Region of Havilah or Susian, was anciently called Chus. an or Chufan, afterward Sufa. Cush himselfe tooke the Bankes of Gehon, and planted those Countries Westward, and Southwest-wardtowards Arabia the Stony, and the Defan, Piel. Afectaba. where Ptolomie placeth the Citie of Chusidia, first Chusia. Seba, and Sheba, with the rest that planted Arabia falix, had Tygris, to convey them into the Persian gulfe, which washeth the bankes of Arabia falix on the East side: fo as those fons of Culb might take Land downe the River as they pleased. Also the Cite of Ninive was by Nimrod founded on the faid river of Tygris; and from thence a Colo nie past to Charran, standing also upon a navigable branch of Euphrates. In like manne did Japheths sonnes settle themselves together, and tooke their seates in Asia the lesse from whencethey might indifferently stretch themselves Northward, and Westward into the next parts of Europe, called the Isles of the Gentiles. And it feemeth very agree able to reason, that both Gomer, Magog, and Tubal, fate downe first of all in that part a Syria, to the North of Palastina and Phanicia: and from thence Gomer or his children fpred themselves into Iberia: & the Magogians more Northerly into Sarmatian. The fit Gomerians, and first Planters in Afia the leffe, held the Country of the Cymmerians (with nesse Herodotus) the same Region which was afterward by the Gallo-Greeks called Gal tia, to whom Saint Paul wrote his Epiftle fo intituled. This Nation of the Cymmeria (whom the invincible Scythians afterwards dispersed, and forced from their first Plan tations) gave names to divers places, as to the Mountaines about Albania (called C+ merini) and to the Citie of Cymmeris in Phrygia: also Bosphorus Cymmerius took apellation from this Nation, in the out-let whereof was also a Citie of that name, and Cymmerian: which Plime faith(mistaking the place) had sometime the name of Cerbeijn but Cerberion was a Towne in Campania, so called of the unhealthfull waters savouring of Brimstone, which Augustus caused to be cleansed by letting in the water of the lake Lucrinus.

The children of Tubal ranged as farreas Iberia, to whom the Moschici were Neigh bours, which others write Melhech. The Prophet Exechiel (coupling them together) leth Gog the Prince of Meschech and Tubal. For these Meschi (which Prolomie callet Moschi) inhabit Syracena a Province of Armenia, directly South from the Mountain Moschici, in the Valley betweene the Mountains Moschici, and the Mountaines Paris des : out of whose North part springerh the River Phases; from the East part Araxis; all from the West Euphrases: and of this Meschech are descended also the Moscowians (late Melanthon) and it may be, that in procede of time fome of them inhabited those Re gions alfo: For Mefhech (faith Melantthen) fignificth extendens, enlarging or firetchin forth. Togorma also at first did inhabite amongst his parents and kindred: The Togormans were also called Giblei, a people neighbouring the Sydonians in Gabala, a Tetrarchie of phanicia, the fame which Plinie calleth Gaben: from whence Salomon had his most excellent Masons, which hewed stones for the Temple of Hierusalem. Thence the Togormi- LKing at. ans firetched into the leffe Armenia, whose Kings were hence called Tigranes, and their Junin Genzol Cities Tigranokarta: of which Cities Tigranes, subdued by Lucullus the Roman, built one, veris, Hierofolymitanus hath planted the Togormians in Barbary; forgetting the prophesse of E-Kekiel against the Tyrians: They of the house of Togorma, brought to thy Faires, horses, and Jude 17.14 horse men, and mules, which could not well be driven over the whole length of the Mediterran Sea, but from the neighbour Countries by land. But Josephus takes them for the parents of the Phrygians; which I doe not deny, but they might be in the ensuing ages: and so might the Tubalines be of the Spaniards; but it was from Iberia, and many hundred veeres after the twelfth of Nimrods reighe. The Jewes conceive that the Turkes came of those Togormians, because their Emperor is called Togor. The Chaldrans make them the Fathers of the Germanes. But Laonicus affirmes, that the Turkes descended of the Grim Tartar, which borders Muscovia. But for these subderivations it were infinit to examine them. Onely of the first and second plantation, and of the first Nations after the floud, is the matter which I labour to discover; and therein to open the ignorance of some, and the corruption of other fabulous Writers. And this we must Note, that those grand-children of Noah which were of a more quiet, or (perchance) of leffe understanding, and had Note: not therefore the leading of Colonies fent out, their proper habitations could be hardly knowne: onely reason hath taught us, that they dwelt among the rest, and were covered with the fame of others, who tooke on them the Conduction and Dominion over the

Of Javan the fourth fon of Japheth: and of Mesceh of Aram, and Meshech of Japheth.

F Javan the fourth forme of Japheth came the Iones, which were afterwards called the Greekes: and fo the Latine & Greeke Interpreters for Javan write Greece as in Esay: Et mittam ex iis qui salvati fuerint ad gentes, in mare, in Italiam, & Graciam: And I will fend those that escape of them to Nations in the Sea, in Italy and in Greece. The Geneva here useth the word (Tarshish) for Tarsus, a City in Cilicia, though Tarfis in many places be taken for the Sea. The Tigurine and the Geneva life the names Syria, to the North of Palastina and rnameia: and rom thence owner of his Challen Tubal and Javan, and not Italy and Greece: keeping the fame Hebren words. Of the Iones past on into Asia the lesse, as those of Magog and Tubal did; from whence the Tubalini. The fall were the Athenians, though the state of the state o without Ancesters, and growing (as it were) out of the soile it selfe: who abounding in people, sent Colonies into Asia the lesse, of whom came the Iones of those parts. Others derive the Athenians from Ion the son of Xuthus, the son of Deucalion; but the antiquity of Javan marres the fashion of that supposition, who so many yeers preceded Xuthus, low or Devealion. Paufanias tels us that Xuthus stole out of Thessaly with all his Fathers treafire, and his Brothers portions, and arriving at Athens, he was graciously received by Eriaheus, who gave him his Daughter in marriage; of whom he received two fonnes. Ion and Achaus, the supposed Ancesters of the Athenians: (For Attica was called Ionia, aith Plutarch in the life of Thefeus;) who, when he had joyned Megara to Attica, erected pillar in that Ist hoos or Strait, which fastneth Pelopomesus to the other part of Greece : Writing on that part which looketh towards the East, these words: Hac non funt Peloconnesus, ast Ionia. These Countries are not of Peloponnesus, but of Ionia: and on the other fide which looked towards the South, and into Pelopoinefus, this: Thefe parts are Peloponsefus, and not Ionia.

Strabo out of Hecataus affirmeth that the Iones came out of Afia into Greece; which is contrary to the former opinion. That the Iones of Greece transporting certaine companies into Asa the lesse, the name of lones was thereby therein retained. And though Strabo knew no more thereof than he learned of the Greekes themselves, yet I finde this conecture of Hecateus reasonable enough. For though it were to him unknowne, yersure I m that Asia the lesse had people before Greece had any : and that Javan did not flie from Babylonia into Greece, but tooke Asia the lesse in his passage; and from thence past over the neerest way, leaving his owne name to some maritimate Province on that side, as hee did to that part of Greece fo called. But yet Strabo himselfe beleeved, that Ionia took the name from Ion the son of Xanthus: for so much he had learned from themselves; which was also the opinion of Pausanias. True it is, that the Greekes in after-times cast themselves into that part of Asia the lesse, opposite unto them, which they held for divers veeres. And how soever the Greekes vaunt themselves to be Fathers of Nations, and the most ancient; yet all approved Historians (northeir owne) deride and disprove their pride, and vanity therein. For this dispute of Antiquity (among prophane Writtes) rested betweene the Scythians and the Egyptians, as Justine out of Trogus, in the warre between the Vexerus of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia, witnesseth: which preceded farre the reigne of Ninus, and was long before the name of Greece was ever heard of. And it is also manifest, that in Cecrops time the Greekes were all salvages, without law or religion, living like brute beasts in all respects: and Cecrops (faith Saint Augustine) lived together

Lib. 18.de Civi Deic.10.

The fixth fonne of Japheth was Mesheck, whom the Septuagint call Mesech: (a part of those Nations commanded by Gog the chiefe Prince of Meshech and Tubal.) But this we must remember, that betweene Mefech the sonne of Aram, and Meshech (or Mosech) the some of Japheth, there is little difference in name, and both by divers Interpreters diverfly written. Montanus with the Vulgar writeth Mesceb, the sonne of Aram, Mes , the Geneva, Mash, Junius, Mesch. But it may begathered out of the 120. Pfalme , that eyther Melbech the sonne of Japheth, was the parent of those people, or gave name to that Province wherein David hid himfelfe: or elfe (which may rather feeme) that it tooke name from Mest the sonne of Aram. For David bewayling his exile (while he lived among a barbarous and irreligious People)useth these words: Woe is me that I remaine in Mesech, and dwell in the Tents of Kedar: which Junius converteth thus: Hei mihi quia peregrino tam din : habitotanquam Scenita Kedareni : The Septuagint gives it this sense : Woe is me because my habitation (or abode) is prolonged, who dwell with the Inhabitants of Kedar: with which this of the Latine agreeth; Heu mihi, quia incolatus meus prolongatus est, habitavi cum habitantibus Kedar: The Ghaldaan otherwise, and in these words: O me miserum, quia peregrinatus sum Asianis, habitavi cum tabernaculis Arabum ; O wretch, that I am, for I have travailed among those of Asia: I have dwelt in the Tabernacles of the Arabians. But howsoever or which soever conversion be taken for the best, yet all make mention of Ke dar : which is a Province of Arabia Petraa; and the Chaldean putteth Afia in stead of Mi fech, but the Hebrew it selfe hath Mesech. And if it be to be taken for a Nation, (as it is mol likely because it answers to Kedar, the name of a Nation) seeing Mesh the sonne of Aram, 1. Chron. 17. is called Meshec, it is indifferent whether this Nation took e name from Me sheeh or Melh, both bordering Judaa, and like enough to be commanded by one Prince; for fo Exechiel makes Mesech and Tubai. But as for those that take Mesech out of the word Mosoch (given by the Septuagint) to be the Muscovian : fure they presume much upon the affinity of names, as aforefaid. And fure I am that David never travelled so farre North (for to him Mufcovia was utterly unknown) but about the border of Kedar (it may be) was often in all the time of his perfecution: the fame being a City on the Mountains & Sanir or Galaad. And yet Arias Montanus makes Mosoch the Father of the Muscovias: and herein also Melanchton runnes with the tide of common opinion, and fets Mesech in Muscovia, though with some better advice of judgement; as, first seated in Cappadicia, and from thence travelling Northward : expounding the places of the 120. Pfalme, (He) mihi quod exulo in Mesech)to signifie, Gentis ejus feritatem insignem esse; That the ferit of that Nation exceeded: which fiercenesse or brutality of the Muscovians, David neverproved, or (perchance) never heard of. But the fame ferity or cruelty which those Northerne Muscovians had, may aswell be ascribed to the Arabians and Kedarens. For this Country tooke name of Kedar the second sonne of Ismael, of whom a people of equal fierceness to any of the world were begotten, both in those times and long after, even to this day (if the Arabians, Ismaelites, and Saracens, may be accounted one people:) the same being foreshewed by the speech of the Angell to Hagar, Gen. 16.v. 12. And he shall be a wilde man : his band shall be against every man, & every mans hand against him. Now Arabia the Defart (faith Pliny) confronteth the Arabians Cochlei on the East, and the Cedrai Southward, both which joyne together upon the Nabathai. So it appeareth (as hefore) that Mefech, Tubal, Gomer, Togorma, and Magog, neighboured Canaan and Ifrael. and that Kedar also did joyne to Mesech: all which were Regions of Syria, or of Asia the leffe, commanded by the Successors of Selencus, enemies of the re-establishment of Israel and Juda. But (as I have already faid) it might well be, that long after the first plantation the issue of Mesech (or Mosoch) might passe into Cappadocia, and thence into Hyrcania, and give names, both to MaZega in the one, and to the Mountaines Moschici in the other, and from thence might fend people more Northerly into Muscovia, & so all opinions saved. But all falvage Nations over-growne and uncultivated, doe (for the most part) shew a late plantation, even as Civility, Letters, and magnificent Building, witnesse antiquity.

Tiras, the leventh sonne of Japheth, which Montanus reckons among the sonnes of Go- Montan Chief mer, was the Father of the Thracians, as all Authors (worthy the examination) affirme. Josephus was the first that determined hereof: and because the Scriptures are altogether filent, what part of the world Tiras peopled, the conjectures are indifferent, and give no ground at all of dispute. It followeth now to speake of the sonnes of Gomer, which were three, of Ascanez and Riphath, the two elder Sonnes of Gomer.

Ascanez, Riphath, and Togorma.

6. V III.

Scane was the Father of those which the Greekes call Regini, (faith Josephus) but he gives no reason why.

Eusebius makes Ascane the Father of the Goths. The Jewes in their Thargum make him the roote of the Germane Nation; but their expositions are commonly very idle. Pliny findeth Ascania in Phrygia, neerethe Rivers of Hilas and Cios: Melanchton being of the same opinion, that the Tuiscones were descended of the Ascanez: (for Tuis-Meanchanean) cones, faith he, is as much to fay, as of the Ascanez, praposito articulo die Ascanez) & that the word fignifieth a Religious Keeper of fire: it being an ancient superstition to pray at the fire of Sacrifices, as afterwards at the Tombes of Martyrs. Not farre from Phrygia was the lake Ascania knowne by that name in the Romanes time. And among the Kings which came to the fuccour of Troy, was Ascanius (Deo similis, faith Homer) like unto God: Homellades because he was beautifull and strong: for in the same manner doth Virgil grace Aneas, 0s bumer: [4; Deo similis; in face and bodylike one of the Gods: Virgil also remembreth such a River, together with the Hils Gargara: as, Illas ducit amor trans Gargara, transq; sonantem vire Georgis Ascanium; Appetite leads them both over the Mountains Gargara, and the roaring Ascanius. But this Pliny maketh more plaine in the description of Phrygia. For he placeth the City of Brillion upon the River Afcanius, which is adjoyning to Mysia, and is neere the border of the Trojan Empire: and the Lake Afrane, he directs us to finde by the description of Prusia, founded by Hannibal at the foot of Olympus, which lieth farre within the Countries of Bithynia: and then from Prusia to Nicea are accounted 25. miles; in which way this Lake Iveth, even betweene Prusia and Nicea. And so Junius (as I conceive him) takes them of Ascane, to be the Inhabitants of Pontus, and Bithynia, and those North parts of Asia. Stephanus de Urbibus makes it a City of Troas, built by Ascanius the son of Aneas; faying, that there was another of that name in Myfia. Of Afcania a Lake of Bithynia, Pto. lomy witneffeth : and Strabo giveth Afcania both a Lake, a River, and a Towne in My Gaz neere unto Cio; which also agreeth with Pliny. For Pliny findeth Prusia (before spoken of) neere Cio, and calleth the Islands before Troy, Ascanes.

Now, whether these places tooke name of Ascanez the son of Gomer, or of Ascanius o the sonne of Aneas, it might be questioned : sure it is, that Ascanius which brought succour to the Trojans, could not take his name from Aneas fon, who was then either exceeding young, or rather unborne : and it feemeth that the Countries whence those fuccours came, were not out of any part of Phrygia or Myla, but farther off, and from the North parts of all Afia the leffe, which by Hieremy is called Afcane, by the figure Synecdoche, as Junius thinketh. Out of those testimonies therefore which deceive not, we may confidently determine. For of the Prophet Hiereny wee shall learne of what Nation the Ascanez were, whose words are these: Set up a Standard in the Land, blom the against her, &c. meaning against the Babylonians. Ararat was Armenia the greater, as most Interpreters consent, so called of the Mountaines of Ararat which runne through it: Minni the leffer Armenia: Armenia being compounded of Aram and Minni. For Minni was the ancient name, (faith Junius and others before him:) and Aram anciently taken for Syria, which contained all that Tract from Euphrates to the Sea-coasts of Phanicia, and Palastina; and therefore Mesopotamia being in elder times but a Province of Syria, the Scriptures difference it in the story of Jacob and Esan, and call it Aram padan. Then if these two Nations were of the Armenians and Ascanez joyned with them (who altogether united under Cyrus and Darius, came to the spoyle of the Babylonian Empire) we shall erre much to call Askenez Germany or Almaine: for we heare of no fwart Ruttiers at that 10 fiege. But the Askenez were of those Nations which were either subject or allied to the Medes: of which if any of them came afterward into Phrygia, I know not : for the disperfion of Nations was in after-times without account. But for the opinion of Eusebius, who makes them to be Goths; or that of Josephus, who cals them Rhegini; or of the Jewes, who will have them to be Almaines; when they confirme it either by Scriptures or Reafon, I will thinke as they doe.

Of Riphath the second sonne of Gomer there is mention in the first of Chronicles. Beroaldus and Pererius thinke that he wandered farre off from the rest of his Brothers, and therefore no memory of his plantation. But I fee nothing to the contrary, but that he might seate himselfe with the rest of his Family: for there wanted no roome or soyle in n those dayes for all the soones and Grand-children of Noah. Therefore I take it to be well understood, that the Riphei were of Riphath, which the Greekes afterwards (according to Josephus) called the Paphlagones : and Riphei (faith Melanchton) fignifieth Gyants. These people were very famous in the North parts, and in Sarmatia: the most of number and power among them, Sarmatarum gens maxima Heneti, The greatest number of the Sarmatians were the Heneti; who fpake the ancient Polae: which being first called Riphei (for the love of some of their Leaders or Kings) changed their names and became Heneti, (a custome exceeding common in those times) and dwelt first in Paphlagonia, as Homer witnesfeth, and so doth Apollonius in his Argonauticks: Now, when these Riphei (afterward Heneti) fought new Regions, they came along the shores of Euxinus, and filled the Northpart of Europe, containing Russia, Lituania, and Polonia. From thence they crost thwart the Land, and peopled Illyria, defirous (faith Melanchton) of a warmer foile of Fruit and Wine. These Heneti or Veneti, whom Melanchton taketh to be one people, filled all that Land betweene the Baltick and Adriaticke Sea; and to this day the name of the Gulfe Vinedicus is found in Russia. This Nation, after they were possest of Lituania and Polonia, disturbed the plantation of the Boii and Hermondurii. Therefore, it seemeth to me, that of Riphath, came the Riphei, afterward Heneti; and fo thinketh Arias Montanus, first seated in Paphlagonia, but in course of time Lords of Sarmatia, and those other parts before remembred, chiefly betweene the Rivers of Vistula and Albis. The name (faith Melanchton) fignifieth Wandering or Wanderers, or Nomades: a people which lived by White-a meats and fruits as (indeed) all Nations did in the first Ages.

Of the third sonne of Gomer, Togorma, I have spoken already; now therefore of Javans

of foure sonnes of Javan: and of the double signification of Tharsis, either for a proper name, or for the Sea.

F Elifa or Elipha, came the Aoles: and of this Elifa, all the Greekes were called so Hellenes, faith Monsanus. Melanchton makes Elifa the Father of the Aoles in A-lia side: others of Elis in Peloponnesus; or of both. And seeing the Greekes were descended in generall of Javan, it is probable that the Aoles & the Elei, tookename of Elifa, his eldest some. Exebiel in the 27. speaking of Tyre, nameth the Isles of Elifa; Hyeacynthus & purpura de insulis Elisa fasta sunt operimentum tuum: Blue Silke and Purple, brought from the Isles of Elifa, was thy covering. The Chaldaans for Elifa write Italia but the Vulgar, the Tigurine, the Geneva, and Junius, keepe the word Elifa: and so I thinke they might doe with reason. For there was not found any such Purple Dye in Italia.

in those dayes, nor fince, that I can read of: but those Isles of Elifa, were by a better conjecture the Isles of Greece; and the best Purple was found afterward at Tyre it selfe: and before that, among the Cyclades, and on the coast of Getulia.

Tharfis, the second Sonne of Javan, inhabited Cilicia, of which Tharfis is the Metro. polis. Montanus for Tharfis in Cilicia, understands Carthage in Africa; but (reserving the respect due to so learned a man) he was much mistaken in that conjecture. The Chaldwar Paraphrast puts Carthage for Tharsis, but it hath no authority nor warrant of reason there. in. So likewise, where it is written, that the Ships of Salomon went every three yeares to Tharfis, and brought thence Gold, Silver, Elephants teeth, &c. the Chaldean Paraphrast translates Tharsis (Africa.) But Salomons Ships were prepared in the Red Sea at Eson-Gaber, in the Bay of Elana, neere unto Madian, where Jethro (Moses Father in Law) inhabited a Province of Arabia Petraa, Idumaa, or of the Chusites; and they favled to the higher part of the East India. For it had beene a strange Navigation to have spent three veares in the passage betweene Judea and Carthage, or any other part of Africa, which might have beene fayled in fixe or ten dayes. And if fo great riches might have bin found within the bounds of the Mediterran Sea, all the other neighbouring Princes would foon have entertained that Trade also. But this enterprize of Salomon is in this fort written of in the first of Kings: Also King Salomon made a Navie of Ships in Esion. Gaber, which is beside Elath and the brinke of the Red Sea in the Land of Edom and Hyram sent with the Na-20 vie his servants, that were Mariners, and had knowledge of the Sea, with the servants of Salomon: and they came to Ophir, and fet from thence 420. Talents of Gold, &c. But as the Nations about Pontus thought no Sea in the world like unto their owne, and doubted whether there were any other Sea but that onely: (whereof it came, that Pontus was a word used for the Sea in generall) so, because the Israelites and the Phanicians knew no other Seathan that of the Mediterran in the beginning; and that the people of Tharfis had the greatest Shippes, and were the first Navigators in those parts with such Vessels, they were therefore called men of the Sea: and the word Tharsis used often for the Sea. And whereas it is faid that the Shippes of Salomon went every three yeares to Tharfis, that phrase is not strange at all; for wee use it ordinarily wheresoever we navigate, (namely) that the Kings Ships are gone to the Sea, or that they are fet out every yeare, or every three yeare to the Sea, and therefore Tharfis was not therein named, either for Carthage. Africa, or India, but used for the Sea it selfe. But in this place Tharsis is truely taken for Tharfis, the chiefe City in Cilicia, founded by Tharfis the second some of Javan; or by his Successors in memory of their first Parent. To this City arrived Alex. Macedon, before he gave the first overthrow to Darius, and casting himselfe into the River to bathe and wash his body, he fell into an extreme Fever, and great danger of death: and in this City of Tharsis was S. Paul borne. Now this agreeth with the reason and nature of a Plantation. For (Gomer and his other fonnes inhabiting Afia the leffe, and that part of Syria adjoyning) Javan, who was to passe over the Sea into Greece, tooke the edge of the o fame Coast, and first planted the Iones on that shore : gave the Islands betweene Asia the lesse and Greece, to Elisa, and lest Tharsis upon the Sea-side in Cilisia; of whom that City tooke name.

The third fonne of Javan was Cethim, of whom were the Romanes and Italians, faith Beroaldus, but I allow better of Melanchtons opinion, who makes Cethim the Father of the Macedonians, Cethim is a voyce plurall (faith he) and fignifieth percussores, though in that respect it may be meant by either. But it seemeth more probable, that the place of Efay 23. (according to Melanchton) had relation to Alexander and the Macedonians: Hae calamitas ab Esai pradicta est, qui capite vicessimo tertio inquit, venturos esse eversores Tyri ex terra Cittim: This calamity (faith Melanchton) was foreshewed by Esai the Prophet, who in the three and twentieth Chapter pronounced, that the Deferoyers of Tyre were come out of Cittim. And although the children of Israel esteemed all men Islanders, which came to them by Sea, and separate from that Continent; (and so also Cittim might be taken for Italy, faith Beroaldus) yet we must take the first performance of the former Prophesie, which tooke effect by the destruction of the Tyrians by Alexander, who after 7. Moneths fiege, entred that proud City, and cut in pieces feven thousand princiall Citizens; strangled two thousand, and changed the freedome of 13. thousand others into bondage and flavery. Now, that Macedon was taken for Ceshim, it doth appeare plainely in the first of the Machabees, in these words: After that Alexander the Macedonian, the some of Philip, went forth of the Land of Cethim, and slew Darius King of the Persians, and Medes. Josephus sets Cethim in the Isle of Cyprus, in which (saith he) there remained Medes. Josephus sets Cethim in the Isle of Cyprus, in which (saith he) there remained the City Citium, the Countrie of Zeno the Philosopher (witnesse Laertius;) which City Pintus upon Ezechiel assirtmenth, that it stood in Saint Hieromes time. So it may be that all the Islands in ancient times by the Hebrewes were called the Islands of Cethim: that all the Islands in ancient times by the Hebrewes were called the Islands of Cethim: that sense might Cyprus be so called also; and yet because Tharsis was the very next and in that sense might cyprus, and directly over against it, it is also very probable, that Cethim dwelt by Port to Cyprus, and directly over against is, it is also very probable, that Cethim dwelt by his brother Tharsis: and sinding that Island too streight for his people after they were increased, and that the rest of the Coasts, both on Asia side and Greece, were inhabited Macedonia. It is stather and Brothers, he sent Colonies over the Egean Sea, and inhabited Macedonia.

Dodanim the fourth sonne of Javan, and the youngest Brother (by the most opinions) fare downe at Rhodes, as necre Cethim, Tharfis, and Elifa, as he could. For Dodanim and Rhodanim are used indifferently by many Translators: the Hebrew (D) and the Hebrew (R) are so like, as the one may easily be taken for the other, as all Hebricians affirme. There is also found in Epirus the City of Dodona, in the Province of Molosia. And as Cethim, when he wanted foyle in Cyprus: fo Dodanim (feated in a far leffe Island) did of necessity fend his people farther off; and keeping alongst the Coast, and finding Peloponnesus in the possession of Elija, he passed a little further on the Westward, and planted in Epirus. And though the City of Dodona was not then built, or (perchance) not so ancient as Dodanim himselfe, yet his Posterity might give it that name in the memory of their first 10 Parent, as it hapned all the World over. For names were given to Cities, Mountaines, Rivers, and Provinces, after the names of Noahs children and grand-children; not in all places by themselves, but by their succeffors many yeares after: every of their Families being desirous to retaine among them by those memories, out of what branch themselves were taken, and grafted elsewhere. And because great Kingdomes were often by new Conquerers newly named, and the greatest Cities often fired and demolished, therefore those that hoped better to perpetuate their memories, gave their own names, or the names of their Ancestors, to Mountaines and Rivers, as to things (after their judgements) freest from any alteration.

Thus then did Javan settle himselse and his children, in the edge and frontier of Asia the lesse, towards the Sea-shore: and afterward in Greece, and the Islands and neighbour Provinces thereof, as Japheth their Father had done in the body of the lesse Asia, together with Javans brethren, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Tubal, Mesech, and the rest round about him. And in like fort did Chush (the sonne of Cham) people Babylonia, Chaldea, and the borders thereof towards the West and South-west: and the sonnes of Chush (all but Nimrod, who held Babylonia it selfe) travelled Southward in Arabia falia, and South-westward into Arabia petraa: the rest of his children holding the Regions adjoyning to Nimrod. Migraim the Brother of Chush in like manner tooke the way of Egypt: and his brother Canaan the Region of Palastina adjoyning. The sonnes of Canaan had their portions in Canaan, of whom all those Nations carne, which were afterward the Enemies both to the Hebrews, and to those of the sons of Shem, which spread themselves towards the West, and the borders of the Mediterran Sea: of which I shall speake hereafter. But first of the sonnes of Cham or Ham; which were foure:

Chush, Mizraim, Phut, and Canaan.

That the feat of Chush the eldest son of Hum, was in Arabia, not in Æthiopia: and of strange Fables, and ill Translations of Scripture, grounded on the mistaking of this point.

Of Josephus his Tale of an Athiopesse wife of Moses, grounded on the mistaking of the seate

Hat Ham was the Father of the Egyptians, it is made manifest in many Scriptures, as in the 105. Plalme, verse 51. Then Israel came to Egypt, and Jacob was a stranger in the land of Ham: and in the 78. Psalme, He slew all the first borne in Egypt, even the beginning of their strength, in the Tabernacles of Ham. There is alfo found a great City in Thebaida, called Cheramis: (as it were the City of Ham) of which name Herodotus also discovers an Iland in the same Region. But because Chash is more in Eg. the elder sonne of Ham, it agreeth with order to speake first of him. Now though I tope. have already in the description of Paradise handled this question, and (I hope) proved that Chush could not be Ethiopia: yet seeing it commeth now to his turne to speake for himselse, I will adde some farther proofe to the former. For the manifestation hereof fers many things ftraight, which had otherwife very crooked constructions, and sensedefle interpretations. Surely, howfoever the Septuagint and Josephus have herein failed, that Chush could not be Athiopia, but Arabia: (to wit) both that Arabia called Petraa. and a part of Arabia the Happy and the Defart : which Regions Chush and the Chustes presently planted, after they left Babylonia to Nimrod, wherein they first sate down all together. And there is nothing which fo well elecreth this Controversie, as the true interpretation of the place, Num. 12. v. 1. where Mofes his Wife is called a Chufite; together with some places which speake of Nabuchodonofors Conquests. For whereas Tolephus and the Septuagint in the place Num. 12. v. 1. as also elsewhere, understand Chush for Athiopia, we must give credit to Moses himselfe herein; and then it will appeare that Josephus was grofly mistaken, or vainely led by his owne invenion. For Josephus prefitming that Chulh was Athiopia, and therefore that the Wife of Moles (which in Scripture, Num. 12. ver. 1. is called a woman of Chufb) was a woman of the land of Athiopia, faineth that Tharbis the Daughter of the King of Athiopia, fell in love with the person and same of Moses, while he besieged Saba her Fathers City; and to the end, to obtaine Moses for her Husband, she practifed to betray both her Parents, Country, and Friends, with the City it felfe, and to deliver it into Mofes hands. The Tale (if it be worth the reciting) Iveth thus in Folephus. After he hath described the strength of the Athiopian City Meroe. which he faith at length Chamby fes called fo from the name of his Sifter; (the old name being Saba) he goeth on in these words: Hic sum Moses desidere exercitum otiosum agrè ferret, hoste non audente manus conserere, tale quiddam accidit. Erat Athiopum Regi filia aniquete nomine Tharbis, oc. which tale hath this fenfe in English: When Moses was grieved that his Army lay idle because the Enemy besieged durst not sally and come to bandy-strokes, there happened this accident in the meane while. The Athiopian King had a Daughter called Tharbis, who at some assaults given beheld the person of Moses, and withall admired his valour. And knowing that Moses had not only up-held and restored the falling estate of the Egyptians, but had also brought the conquering Athiopians to the very brinke of subversion : these things working in her thoughts, together with her owne affection, which daily increased, shee made meanes to send unto him by one of her trustiest servants to offer her selfe unto him, and become his Wife Which Moses on this condition entertained, that she should first deliver the City into his possession; whereunto she condescending, and Moses having taken oath to per= forme this contract, both the one and the other were instantly performed.

†. II.

A dispute against the tale of Josephus.

His Tale(whereof Moles hath not a word) hath Josephus fashioned, & therein also utterly mistaken himselse, in naming a City of Arabia for a City of Athiopia: as he names Æthiopia it felfe to have bin the Country of Moses his Wife, when (indeede)it was Arabia. For Saba is not in Athiopia, but in Arabia, as both Strabo and all other Geographers, ancient and moderne, teach us, saying, that the Sabrans are Arabians & not Athiopians; except Josephus can perswade us, that the Queene of Saba which came from the South to heare the wifedome of Salomon, were a Negro, or Blacke-Moore. And so though Damianus à Goes speake of certaine Letters to the King of Portugall from Prester 3ohn, of the Abissines: wherein that Æthiopian King would perswade the Portugals that he was descended of the Queene of Saba and of Salomon; yet it doth no where appeare in the Scriptures, that Salomon had any Son by that great Princeffe: which had it beene true, it is likely that when Sishac King of Egypt invaded Roboam, and fackt Hierusalem, his Brother (the Sonne of Saba and Salomon) who joyned upon Egypt, would both have impeached that enterprize, as also given aide and succour to Roboam against Jeroboam, who drew from him ten of the twelve Tribes to his owne obedience. Neither is it any thing against our opinion of Moses his Wife, to have beenean Arabian, that the Scriptures teach us, that Mofes married the daughter of Jethro Pricft of Midian or Madian: which standing on the North Coast of the Red Sea, over against the body of Egypt, and neere Esion-Gaber, where Salomon provided his Fleet for India, in the Region of Edom, may well be reckoned as a part of Arabia, as the Red Sea is called Sinus Arabicus. For Edumaa joyneth to the Tribe of Juda by the North, to Arabia Petras by the East, to the Mediterran by the West, and to the Red Sea by the South-east. And if we marke the way which Moses tooke when he left Egypt, and conducted Israel thence, it will appeare that he was no stranger in Arabia: in the border whereof, and in Arabia it selfe, he had formerly lived fortie yeares; where it seemeth, that besides his carefull bringing up in Egypt, he was instructed by Jethro in the Egyptians learning. For Josephus confesseth, and Saint Ste. to phen confirmeth, that he was learned in all the wisedome of the Egyptians. But on the other fide, this Text makes much against Josephus, where it is written in Exodus the second Therefore Moses fled from Pharao, and dwell in the Land of Madian or Midian, and not in Æthiopia. And in the third Chapter it is as plaine as words can expresse, in what Region Madian was, where it is written, When Moses kept the sheepe of Jethro his Father in Lan Priest of Madian, and drawe the Flocke to the Defart, and came to the Mountaine of Godin Horeb. Now that Mount Horeb is not in Athiopia, every Infant knoweth. And if we may beleeve Moses himselfe, then was not the Wife of Moses purchased in that manner which Josephus reporteth (which was for betraying her Countrey and Friends) neither had she the name of Tharbis, but of Sippora, or Zippora: neither was she a Negro, but a Madianitesse. And as God worketh the greatest things by the simplest meanes: so it pleased him from a Shepheard to call Moses, and after him David, and by them to deliver his people first and last. For Moses, sitting by a Well (as disconsolate and a ftranger) defended the daughters of Reguel from the other shepherds, and drew them Water to water their sheepe: upon which occasion (by God ordained) he was entertained by Jethro, whose Daughter he married : and not for any betraying of Townes or

From hence also came Jethro to Moses at Rephidim, not farre from Idumaa, and finding the insupportable government of such a multitude, he advised him to distribute this weightie charge, and to make Governours and Judges of every Tribe and Familie. And if Jethro had beene an Athiopian, it had beene a farre progresse for him to have passed through all Egypt with the Wife and Children of Moses and to have found Moses in the border of Idumaa: the Egyptians hating Moses and all that favoured him. But the passing of Moses through Arabia Petraa (which joyneth to Madian) proveth that Moses was well acquainted in those parts, in which the second time he wandred forty yeares, and did by these late travailes of his, seeke to instruct the children of Israel in the knowledge of one true God, before he brought them to the Land of plenty and reft. For he found them nourished up with the milke of Idolatry, and obstinate in the Religion of the Heathen, and finding that those stiffe plants could not be bowed or declined, either by perswasion or by miracle, he ware them out in the Defarts, as God directed, and grafted their branches anew, that from thosehe might receive fruit, agreeable to his owne desire, and Gods Commandements.

Lastly, this opinion of Josephus is condemned by Augustinus Chrisamensis, where also he reprehendeth Apollinaris, who avowed that Moses had married both Tharbis and Sephora: His owne words have this beginning: Mentitur etiam Apollinaris auas uxoru habuisse Moses, & c. Apollinaris also lyeth in affirming that Moses had two nives : and who dothnot perceive these things fained by them? for it is manifest that the Wife of Moses was Zephora, Daughter to the Priest or President of Madian: and that Madian cannot bet taken for Ethiopia beyond Egypt ; being the same that joyneth to Arabia: so farre Chrysa-

Chush ill expounded for Athiopia. Ezech. 29.10.

Now as Chush is by the Septuagint converted Athiopia, and the wife of Moses therefore called Athiopis a: so in the conquest of Nabuchodono for is Athiopia written for Arabia. For by the words of Ezechiel, it is manifest that Nabuchodonosor was never in Athiopia. Behold (faith Ezechiel, speaking of the person of this great Affrian) I come upon thee and upon thy Rivers, & I will make the Land of Egypt utterly waste and desolate. from the Tower of Sevench, even to the borders of the blacke. Moores: which last words should have beene thus converted: From the Tower of Seveneh to the borders of the Chufites or Arabians: betweene which two is fituated all Egypt. For to fay from the borders. of Seveneh to the Athiopians, hath no sense at all Seveneh it selfe being the border of Egypt, confronting and joyning to Athiopia, or the Land of the blacke-Moores. So as if Nabuchodonofors conquest had beene but betweene Seveneh and the border of Athiopia. it were as much to fay, and did expresse no other victory than the conquest of all that Land and Countrey, lying betweene Middlesex and Buckingham, where both the Countries joyne together; or all the North parts of England, betweene Barwick and Scotland; for this hath the fame fense with the former, if any man fought to expresse by these two bounds, the Conquest of England: Barwick being the North border of England, as Seveneh or Syena is the South bound of Egypt, seated in Thebaida, which toucheth Athiopia. But by the words of Exechiel it appeareth, that Nabuchodonofor never entred into any part of Athiopia, although the Septuagint, the Vulgar, the Geneva, and all other (in effect) have written Athiopia for Chush.

Another place of Ezechiel, cap. 30. verf.9. in the like manner mistaken.

Nd as the former; so is this place of Exechiel mistaken, by being in this fort converted: In die illa egredientur nuncii à facte mea in trierions un contest consumer consumer confidentiam: Which place is thus turned in English by the Geneveans: In that opin confidentiam: Which serves in ships to make the carelesse Moores affraid. Now day shalthere Messengers goe forth from me in ships to make the carclesse Moores affraid. Now the Latine for (ships) hath the Greek word Trieres for Triremes, which are Gallies of three bankes, and not ships. But that in this place the Translation should have beene (as in the former) amended by using the word Chush or Arabia for Athiopia or the black-Moores. every man may fee which meanely understandeth the Geography of the World, knowing that to passe out of Egypt into Athiopia there neede no Gallies or Ships, no more than to passe out of Northampton into Leicestershire: Athiopia being the conterminate Region with Egypt, and not divided so much as by a River. Therefore in this place of Exechel it was meant, that from Egypt, Nabuchodonofor should fend Gallies alongst the coast of the Red Sea, by which an Army might be transported into Arabia the Happy and the Stony (sparing the long wearisome march over all Egypt, and the Defart of Pharan) which Army might thereby furprise them unawares in their security and confidence. For when Nabuchodonosor was at Seveneh within a mile of Athiopia, he needed neither Galley nor Ship to passe into it; being all one large and firme Land with Egypt, and no otherwise parted from it, than one In-land shire is parted from another : and if hee had a fancy to have rowed up the River but for pleasure, he could not have done it: for the fall of Nilus (tumbling over high and steepy Mountaines) called Catadupa Nili, were at hand.

Lastly, as I have already observed, the sonnes of every father seated themselves as neer together as possibly they could, Gomer and his sonnes in Asia the lesse; Favan and his fonnes in Greece, and the Ilands adjoyning; Shem in Persia and Eastward. So the Sonnes and Grand-children of Chulh from the River of Gehon (their Fathers first seate) inhabited upon the fame, or upon fome other contiguat unto it, as Nimrod and Havilah on the one fide, and Saba, Sheba, and Sabtecha (with the rest) did on the other side. And to conclude in a word, the Hebrewes had never any acquaintance or fellowship, any warre, treaty of peace, or other intelligence with the Athiopian black-Moores, as is already remembred in the Chapter of Paradife.

of Scripture, Esay 18. Vaterra Cymbalorum alarum qua est trans flumina Athiopia; or according to the Septuagint in these words: Vaterra navium alarum qua est trans sluvios Athiopia: Woeto the land shaddowing with wings, which is beyond the Rivers of Athiopia fending Embassadours by seaseven the vessels of reeds upon the waters. Vaterra umbrosa ora. Woeto the Land of the Shadie coast, fairh Junius. The former Translators understand it in this fense; That the waters are shaddowed with the fails, which are significatively called the wings of the ships; the other, that the coast of the Sea was shaddowed by the height

But to the purpose: That this Land here spoken of by the Prophet Esay, is Egypt, no In. terpreter hath doubted. For they were the Egyptians that fent this message to the Israe. 19 lites which E ay repeateth, and by the former translation every man may fee the transpofition of Kingdomes: for hereby Egypt is transported unto the other fide of Æthiopia,& Athiopia set next unto Judaa, when it is the Land of Chush and Arabia indeed that lyeth betweene Judaa and Egypt, and not Athiopia, which is feated under the Equinottial Line. And of this, Beroaldus asketh a materiall question, (to wit) what Region that should be, of which the Prophet Speaketh, and placeth it beyond the Rivers of Athiopia. Nam de ignota agi regione dici nequit, For it cannot be faid that hetreateth of an unknowne Region. Now if Æthiopia it selfe be under the Equinottial line, with whom the Jewes had never any acquaintance, why should any man dreame that they had knowledge of Nations far beyond it againe, and beyond the Rivers of Athiopias except we shall impiously thinke that the Prophet spake he knew not what, or used an impertinent discourse of those Nations, which were not discovered in 2000 yeares after, inhabiting as farre South as the Cape of good Hope, commonly knowne by the name of Bona esperanza.

That upon the like mistaking both Terrhaca in the fory of Senacherib, and Zera in the story of Afa are unadvisedly made Athiopians.

Nd by this translation is the story of Senacherib utterly mistaken in the cause of his retrait. For Senacherib was first repulsed at Pelusium, at the very entrance of Egypt from Judga: when having certaine knowledge that Thirrhaca, (which all the Interpreters call King of Athiopia) was on the way to fet on him, he began to withdraw himself: and fearing to leave his Army in two parts, he sent threatning Messengers to Ezechia King of Juda, perswading him to submit himselfe: the Tenor whereof is se down in the second of Kings in these words: Have any of the gods of the Nations delivered his Land out of the hands of the King of Ashur? Where is the god of Hamab, Erc. By which proud Embaffage, if he had obtained entrance into Jerusalem, he then meant to have united that great Army before Jerusalem, commanded by Rabsekeb, with the other which lay before Pelusium, a great City upon the branch of Nilus next Arabia. For Senacherib had already mastered the most part of all those Cities in Judaa & Benjamin with a third Army, (which himselfe commanded) being then at the fiege of Lebna. But upon the rumor of that Arabian Army led by their King Thirrhakeh (whom Fosephus calls That fices) Rabsa keh hasted from the siege of Hierusalem, and found Senacherib departed from Lachis, & st downe before Lebna, which was afterwards called Elenthoropolis, as fome have supposed But while he had ill successe at Pelusium and seared Thirrhakeh, God himselfe whomse least feared, strook his Army before Jerusalem by the Angel of his power, so as 158000 were found dead in the place, as in the life of Ezechias is hereafter more largely written And that this Army of Thirrhakeh was from Arabia, Fofephus himself makes it plaine. For he confesseth in the tenth Booke, the first Chapter of the Jewes Antiquities, that it was come to Senacheribs knowledge, that the Army which was a foote (both to relieve the Egyptians and the Jewes) marched towards him by the way of the Defart: Now the Defare which lay indifferent betweene Hierusalem and Pelusium, was that of Pharan or Sur, which also toucheth on the three Arabia's, to wit, the Stony, of which it is a part: the Defart, and the Happy; and by no other way indeed could the Arabians come on to fuccour either Pelusium or Hierusalem. But that there is any Desart betweene Pelusium and the South part of Egypt, hath never yet beene heard of, or described by any Cosmographer or Historian. So then this description of the second of Kings, versithe ninth, hath the same mistaking as the rest. For here the word (Chush) is also translated Æthiopia; and in this fense have all the Interpreters, (but Junius) expressed the beginning of the minth Verse

He heard olfo men say of Thirrhakeh King of Athiopia, &c. whereas it should have beene thus converted with Junius: Audiens autem de Thirrhakeh Rege Chushi; He beard also of Thirrakeh King of the Chushites. For they were the Chustes and Arabians, whose Houses and Cities were next the fire, and upon whom the very smoake of Juda flaming was blowne, being their neerest Neighbours: and so were not the Athiopian black-Moores plints. 1923 under the Equinottiall, whom neither war nor peace (which discovereth all Regions) ever found out, faith Pliny. For this King was no more King of Athiopia than Zerah was, who invaded Afa King of Juda, with an Army of a Million, and three thousand Charriots. Indeed, how fuch an Army & those Charriots should passe through all Egypt, (the Kings To of Egypt being mighty Kings) let all men that know how these Regions are search, and how farre distant, judge. For Princes doe not easily permit Armies of a Million to runne through them; neither was there ever fuch strength of Black-Moores heard of in that part of the World, or elsewhere. Neither are these Athiopians such travailers or Conquerors; and yet is this King Zerab also called King of Athiopia. But the word Chulb being first so converted for Athiopia, the rest of the Interpreters (not looking into the Teates of Kingdomes, or the possibilities of attempts, or invasions) followed one another in the former mistakings.

Oncerning these words in that eighteenth Chapter of Esay, Navium alarum; Winged hips, (so the Septuagint turne it) or Cymbalo alarum (according to the Latine fayles whiftling in the windes, or terra umbrofa ora (after Junius) the Land of a shaddowed coast, or the Land shaddowing with wings, as our English Geneva hath it. The two first interpretations of the Septuagint and S. Hierome, have one sense ineffect. For the failes are commonly called the wings of a ship; and we use to say ordinarily when our thips faile flowly, that the wanteth wings: (that is) when her failes are either wome or too narrow: and we also use the same phrase of the winde whistling in the failes. And it may be that the Egyptians emploied so many of those small ships, as their fails were faid to give a shaddow over the Red Sea. But to make both interpretations good, Pintus (upon Esay) affirmeth, that the word (Sabal) doth fignific both to shaddow and to gingle (which is) to make a kinde of Cymbaline found: fo as the meaning of this place faith Pintus) is this? Woe to thee, O Egypt, which doest promise to others safeguard, under the shaddow of thy wings which (indeede) feemeth to agree with the argument of the eighteenth Chapter of Efay: and this phrase is often elsewhere used, as in the sitxeenth Psalme: Sub umbra alarum tuarum protege me; Defend me under the shaddow of thy wings. The Boates of reede spoken of are of two kindes; either of basket-willow covered with hides (as anciently in Brittaine) or a Tree made hollow in the bottome, and built upon both fides with Canes. Of the one o fort I have seene in Ireland, of the other in the Indies.

6. X I. Of the plantation and antiquities of Egypt.

That Mizraim the chiefe planter of Egypt: and the rest of the sonnes of Ham, were seated in order one by another.

He fecond sonne of Ham was MiZraim; (who according to the place of a fecond brother) was sent somewhat farther off to inhabite. For Chush first possess Chaldea on the West side of Gehon chiesly: and from thence, as he increased in people, so he entred Arabia, and by time came to the border of the Red Sea, and to the Southeast-fide of Judaa. MiZraim his brother (with Phut) past over into Africa. MiZraim held Egypt and Phot (as athird brother) was thrust farther off into Mauritania. Canaan tooke the Sea-coast, and held the side of Palastina: and these source brothers possess all that Tract of Land, from Gehon in Chalden, as farre to the West as the Mediterrane Sea: comprehending all Arabia Deferta, and Petran, all Canaan which embraceth Galilan, Samaria, and Judaa; with the two Egypts, whereof the neather is bounded by Memphis on the South, and by the Mediterrane Sea on the North: and Thebaida (called the upper Egypt) Aretheth it selfe toward the South as far as Syene, the border of the Ethiopians or black-Moors. All the rest of the coast of Africa Westward, Phut peopled; which brothers had not any other Nation or Family that dwelt between them. And in the fame manner did all their fons againe, and all the fons of the rest of Noahs children, fort themselves.

†. I I. Of the time about which the name of Egypt began to be knowne: and of the Egyptians Lunarie veeres, which made their antiquities feeme more fabulous.

His flourishing Kingdome possest by Mizraim, changed her ancient name, & became Egypt, at such time as Agyptus (otherwise Ramesses, as some thinke) the son of Belus, chased thence his elder brother Danaus, shifting him into that part of Greece now called Morea, by whom the Argives were made Danai, abandoning their proper names: which happened 877. yeeres after the Floud, in the time of Josua, as S. Augustine conjectureth out of Eusebius. But in Homers Odysses it appeareth that the Egyptians were fo called at the time of the Troian Warre. And before this, Egypt was knowne by divers other names, as Oceana, Aria, Ofiriana, &c. And Manethon (whom Josephus citeth in his first booke against Appion) numbreth all the Kings of Egypt after Moses departure, who confumed 393. yeeres. By which other men conjecture, that the Egyptians tooke on them that name 330 yeeres after Josua, and about 1000 yeeres after the Floud. Butwhere 30. Cophus in the same booke taketh I frael to be those Hyclos, which he also calleth Pastores or Shepherds, which are faid to have reigned in Egypt 511. yeeres: whom also he calleth his Ancestors, (meaning the Ancestors of the Jewes) in this I am sure he was grosly deceived or that he vainly boasted : for the Israelites had no such Dominion as Manethon faineth, nor abode in Egypt follong a time by many yeeres.

Of the Egyptian Antiquities there are many fancies in Trogus, Herodotus, Plato, Diod. Siculus, Mela, and others. For they affirme (faith Pomp. Mela) that there had reigned in Egypt 330. Kings before Amasis, who was contemporary with Cyrus; and that they had .. memory and story of 13000. yeares; and that the Stars had foure times changed their course, and the Sunne twice set in the East. These Riddles are also rise among the Athewians and Arcadians, who dare affirme, that they are more ancient than Jupiter and the

The Arcadians the earth inhabited Ere yet the Moone did shine, or Iove was bred.

But for those 13000. yeares it may well be true; seeing it is certaine that the Egyptians reckon their yeeres by Moneths, which makes after that account not above 1000.01 1100 yeeres, whether we take their Moneths or Lunary yeeres to have beene of the first kinde of 27 dayes and eight houres; or otherwife 29. dayes and twelve houres; or after any other of those five diversities of their Lunary yeeres.

> t. III. Of certaine vaine affertions of the Antiquity of the Egyptians.

TErardus Mercator in his Chronology, reasoneth for the Egyptians Antiquity in this manner: That the fixteenth Dynally (where Eufebius begins to reckon the Egypti-ans times) had beginning with the generall Floud: and that therfore the first of the other fifteene reached the Creation, or foone after it. To which conjecture of Mercator, Percrius maketh this answer; That therein Mercator was first deceived, because he taketh it for granted, that the beginning of the fixteenth Dynasty was at once with the general Floud: which Eusebius maketh 292 yeeres after, and in the time of Abraham. Secondly's Mercator maketh the beginning of the shepherds Dynastia (being in number 17.) in the time of their first King, Saltu, to have beene in the yeere of the World 1846. which Ensebius findeth in the Worlds age 2140. For the 16. Dynastia was begun but in the 292. yeeres after the Floud, as they account, and continued 190 yeeres. Thirdly, whereas Mercator makethevery Dynastia to endure 115 yeers, Eusebins reckoneth many of them at lesse than 100. yeeres: for the 28. had but fixe yeeres, the 29. but 20. and the 30. but

CHAP. S. S. 11. + . 4. of the History of the World.

Now Annius in his Supplement of Manethon affirmeth, That all these 15. Dynasties lafled but 162. yeeres: and that the first of the 15. began but in the 131. yeere after the floud: fo as where Mercator makes all the 15.to precede the floud, and the 16. to have beenethen in being at the time of the floud, Annius makes them all after it. But the contrariety of falshood cannot be hidden, though disguised. For Annius had forgotten his former Opinion and affertion, that it was in the 131. yeere that Nimred, with the former of Noah, came into the Valley of Shinaar: so he forgets the time which was consumed in the building of Babel: and that before the confusion of Speech there was no dispersion, nor far-off plantation at all. And though he hastily conveyed Gomer into Italy, and Tubal into Spainc, in the tenth yeere of Nimrods reigne: (which was ten yeeres after his arrivall into Babylonia) yet herein he is more unadvised. For he makes Egypt posses, and a government established in the very first yeere of the arrivall of Nimrod into Shinaar, beforeall partition, or any expedition farre off or neere in question: for from thence (that is, from Babel) did the Lord (catter them upon all the earth,

Against Pererius: that it is not unlikely but that Egypt was peopled within 200 yeeres after the Creation; atleast, that both it, and the most parts of the World were peopled before the Ut whereas Pererius feeketh to overthrow this Antiquity of the Egyptians touching their Dynasties, (which Eusebins doth not altogether destroy, but lessen) I doe not find any great strength in this opinion of Pererius; (to wit) that it was either unlikely or impossible that Egypt should be peopled within 100.or 200. yeeres after Adam, in the first Age. And whereas he supposeth that it was not inhabited at all before the generall Floud, I doe verily beleeve the contrary : and that not onely of Egypt, but the better part of all World was then peopled: Pererius his words are these; Quomodo enim primos mundi ducentos, veletiam centum annos Adami proles adeò multiplicari potnit, ut ad Egyptum usq. habitandum & complendum propagata sit, &c. For how could the children of Adam be so multiplied in the first two hundred, or in the first hundred yeers of the World, and spropagated as to inhabite and fill Egypt ? for allowing this (faith Pererius) we must also confesse, that there were then both the Assyrians and other Nations.

Now feeing that the Scriptures are filent herein, and that it is no point of our faving beleefe, it is lawfull for every man to be guided in this and the like questions by the best reason, circumstance, and likelihood; and herein, as in the rest, I protest that I doe not gainfay any mans opinion out of any croffing or cavilling humours: for I thinke it the part of every Christian, rather to reconcile differences, where there is possibilty of union, than out of froward fubtlety, and prejudicate refolvednesse; to maintaine factions

First therefore, for this opinion, that Egypt was not planted so soone after Adam, no, not at all before the Floud, I say, that there is no reason why we should give a lesse increase to the sonnes of Adam, than to the sonnes of Noah. For their length of life, which exceeded those which came after the Floud double, and (after a few yeeres) treble, is an infallible proofe of their strength and ability, to beget many Children: and at that time, they observed no degrees of kindred, nor consanguinity. And that there was a speedy increase of people, and in great numbers, it may in some fort appeare by this, that Cain, who (being fearefull that the death of Abel would have beene revenged on him) withdrew himselfe from the rest, which were afterward begotten, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, and there, by the helpe of his owne issues, built a City, (called Enoch) after the name of his first-borne. Now if it be gathered that Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinaar with so many multirudes, as sufficed to build the City and Tower of Babel: and that to this increase there was given but 130. yeeres by Berofus, and after the account of the Scriptures (reckoning, as it is commonly understood, by the birth of Arphaxad, Selah, Heber, and Phalegh) but one hundred and one yeere: I fee no cause to doubt, but that in the infancy of the first age, when the bodies of men were most perfect, even within 130. yeeres, the same (if not a greater) number might be increased; and so within 70. yeers after (that is, by fuch time as the World had ftood 200 yeeres) aswell Asyria, Syria, and Egypt might be possest before the Floud, as they were within the same or lesse time after it. Neither dothit agree with the circumstance or true Story of the Babylonian and Assert rian Empire, that all those people, which were increased in the first hundred or 130. yeers after the Floud, came into Shinaar and Babylonia. For that ever Noah himselfe came out of the East, as there is no Scripture or Authority to prove it, so all probable conjecture and reason it selfe denies it. Againe, those multitudes and powerfull numbers, which self miramis (but the third from Nimrod) found in India, confidered with her owne Army of three Millions, (and she left not all her Kingdomes empty) doe well prove, that if the World had such plenty of people in so few yeeres after the Floud, it might also bee as plentifully filled in like time before it. For after their owne account Ninus governed Babylonia and Affria but 292. yeeres after the Floud of Noah. And these Troupes of Semiramis were gathered out of all those Easterne Kingdomes, from Media to the Mediterra Seaswhen there had now past from the floud to the time of this her invasion, somwhat less or more than 360 yeeres: for much more time the true Chronologie cannot allow; though I confesse, that in respect of the strange greatnesse of Semiramis Army, and the incredible multitudes gathered, this is as short a time as can well be given. And if but one halfe be true of that which is faid, That her Army confifted of 1300000. Footmen, and 500000 Horsemen, it must needs be, that long before Semiramis Reigne, the greatest part of Alia (whence her huge Army was gathered) was full of people: yea Arabia it felfe (much part whereof is barren)must long before this time of Semiramis have been plentifully people when Ninus having a determination to make himselfe Master of all Nations, entred not withstanding) in League with the King thereof: whom therefore he either feared, or fought his affiftance. And if Arabia were then so well replenished, I see no cause but Egy might also be peopled. Now if we may believe Trogus Pompeius (Epitomiz'd by Jufin) Egypt was a most flourishing and magnificent Nation before Ninus was borne. For thek be his owne words, speaking of Ninus. Fuere quidem temporibus antiquioribus Vexois Rex Agypti, erc. But there were in times more ancient Vexoris King of Egypt, and Tanis king of the Scythians: of which the one invaded Pontus, the other Egypt . And how full people all that part of the world was, the Conquests of Ninus witnesse, who subdud with no small force the Armenians, the Medes, and afterward the Battrians ; yea, all the wholebody of Asia on this side India. For Diodorus out of Ctesius numbreth the Arms wherewith Ninus invaded Zoroaster, at 1700000. Footmen, and 200000. Horseman and the Stories generally shew, that though Zoroasters Armie was farre short of this, y it was greater than any that those parts of the World ever fince beheld. But to what of should I seeke for forreigne authority: for no man doubteth but that Egypt was possible by MiZraim, the sonne of Ham; and that it was an established Kingdome, filled withme ny Cities in Abrahams time, the Scriptures tell us. And fure, to prepare and cultivead folate & overgrown ground, to beautifie it with many Cities, Lawes, and Policies, came be esteemed a labour of a few daies: and therefore it must be inhabited in a lesse time that 200. yeeres after the Floud; and in the same time (if not in a shorter) before the Floud so if so many Millions of men were found within 300. yeeres after the generall Floud; so as not onely Babylon, and Affyria, Bactria, Armenia, Media, Arabia, Egypt, Palastina, yel the farre-off Lybia on the one fide, and India on the other, and Scythia (inferiour to new ther)were all filled: into what small corners could then all those Nations be compress which 1656. yeeres brought forth before the Floud even necessity, which cannot be to listed, cast the abundance of mens bodies into all parts of the knowne world; especially

Or what a strange increase did the long lives of the first Age make, when they continued 800 or 900 yeeres. Surely, we have reason to doubt, that the World could not containe them, rather than that they were not spred over the World. For let us now reckon the date of our lives in this Age of the World: wherein if one exceede 500 veeres, ten for one are cut off in that passage, and yet we finde no want of people; nav weknow the multitude fuch, as if by warres or pestilence they were not sometimes takenoff by many thousands, the earth with all the industry of man could not give them food. What strange heapes then of soules had the first Ages, who enjoyed 800 or 900. veares, as aforefaid? These numbers, I say, cannot be counted nor conceived. For it would come to the same reckoning in effect, as if all those which have beene borne in Brittaine fince 3. or 4. hundred yeeres before the Norman Conquest (faving fuch as by accident or by violence were cut off) were now alive; and if to these there were added as many as by Polygamy might have beene increased. For (to omit, that the Gyants and mighty ones of the first Age observed no law of Matrimony) it is to be thought that those Lovers of the world and of pleasure, when they knew the long and liberall time which Nature had given them, would not willingly or hastily present themselves to any danger which they could flye from or eschew. For what humane argument hath better perswasion to make men carelesse of life, and searclesse of death, than the little time which keepes them a funder, and that fhort time also accompanied with so many paines and diseases, which this envious old Age of the Worldmingleth together, and soweth with the feedes of Mankinde ?

Now if that Berofus or Annius may bee alleadged for fufficient Authours, whom Pererius himselfe in this question citeth, then is it by them affirmed, and by Fosephus confirmed, that the City of Enoch was feated neere Lybanus in Syria: and if other parts of Syria were peopled in Cains time, I fee no cause why Palastina (which is also a Province of Syria) and Egypt (which neighboureth it) could be left defolate both all the life time of Cain, and all those times betweene his death and the Floud, which were by estimation 700. or 800. yeares. And fure though this Fragment of Berofus with Annius his Comment be very ridiculous in many places (the ancient Copies being corrupted or lost) yet all things in Berofus are not to bee rejected. Therefore Saint Hierome for fucls Authors gives a good rule: Bona corum eligamus, vitemus contraria; Let us choose what is good in them, and rejett the rest. And certainely in the very beginning of the first Booke, Berofus agreeth (in effect) with Moses, touching the generall Floud: and in that first part Berosus affirmeth, that those mighty men and Gyants which inhabited Enoch, commanded over all Nations, and subjected the universall Worlds and though that phrase (of all the World) be often used in the Scriptures for a part thereof; as in the second of the Acts, That there were dwelling at Hierusalem Jewes, menthat feared God of every Nation under Heaven: yet by the words which follow in Berofus, it is plain, that his words & fensewere the same : for he addeth, from the Sunnes rising to the Sunnes setting; which cannot be taken for any small part thereof. Againe, we may fafely conjecture, that Noah did not part and proportion the World among his sonnes at adventure, or left them as Discoverers, but directed them to those Regions which he formerly knew had been inhabited. And it cannot be denyed that the earth was more passable and easieto travell over before the Floud, than after it. For Pererius himselfe confesseth, that Attica (by reafon of mud and slime which the water left upon the Earth) was uninhabited 200. yeeres after Ogiges Floud; whereby we may gather, that there was no great pleasure in passing into farre Countries, after the generall Deluge, when the earth lay (as it were) incopfed for 100. or 130. vecres together. And therefore was the face thereof in all conjecture more beautifull, and leffe cumbersome to walke over, in the first Age, than after the generall overflowing.

Of the words of Moses, Gen. 10. v. ultimo, whereupon Pererius grounded his opinion.

Aftly, whereas Pererius drawes this Argument out of the last Verse of the tenthos Genesis; And out of these were the Nations divided after the floud: Quo significatur atalem divisionem non fuisse ante diluvium; By which it appeareth (faith Pererius) that there was no fuch division before the Floud; which hee also feeketh to confirme out of the eleventh of Genesis, because the division of tongues was the cause of the dispersion of the people. This consequence, quo significatur, & c. seemeth to me very weak: The Textit selfe rather teacheth the contrary: For out of these (saith Moses) were the Nations divided in the earth after the Floud; inferring, that before the Floud the Nations were divided out of o thers, though after the Floud out of these only. But whatsoever sense may be gathered from this place, yet it can no way be drawne to the times before the Floud, or to any plantation or division in that age: for if there were none else among whom the earth could be divided after the Floud, but Noahs Sonnes, wherein doth that necessary division controule the planting of the World before it : And whereas it is alledged that the confufion of speech was the cause of this dispersion; it is true, that it was so for that present: but if Babel had never beene built, nor any confusion of Languages at all, yet increase of people and time would have enforced a farther-off and general Plantation: as Berolus faves well, that when Mankinde were exceedingly multiplyed, Adcomparandas novas sedes necessitas compellebat, They were driven by necessitie to seeke new Habitations. For w finde (as it is before faid) that within 300. yeeres after the Floud, there were gathered rogether into two Armies, fuch multitudes as the Valley about Babylon could not have fustained those numbers, with their increase, for any long time; all Asia the greater and the leffer; all Scythia, Arabia, Palastina, and Agypt, with Greece, and the Islands therefore Mauritania and Lybia, being also at that time fully peopled. And if we believe Berosus then not onely those parts of the World, but (within 140. yeeres after the Floud) Spain. Italie and France were also planted: much more then may we thinke, that within 1656. veeres before the Floud, in the time of the chiefe strength of Mankind, they were replenished with people. And certainely seeing all the world was overflown, there were people in all the World which offended.

A conclusion resolving of that which is most likely touching the Agyptian Antiquities: with Comewhat of Phut (another Sonne of Ham) which peopled Lybia.

Herefore for the Antiquity of the Egyptians, as I do not agree with Mercator, not judge with the Vulgar, which give too much credit to the Egyptians Antiquities! fo I doe not think the report of their Antiquities fo fabulous, as either Pererimon other men conceive ir. But I rather incline to this, that Egypt being peopled before the Floud, and 200. or 300. yeeres, more or leffe after Adam, there might remaine unto the Sonnes of Mizraim some Monuments in Pillars or Altars (of stone or mettall) of their former Kings or Governours: which the Egyptians having added to the List and Roll of their Kings after the Floud, in succeeding time (out of the vanity of glory, or by some corruption in their Priests) something beyond the truth might be inserted. And that the memory of Antiquitie was in such fort preserved, Berofus affirmeth it of the Chaldens, and so doth Epigenes. For they both write, that the use of Letters and the Art of Astronomie was knowne to the Babylonians 3634. yeeres before Alexanders Conquest: and this report Annius findeth to agree and reach to the time of Enoch, who was borne 1034! yeeres before the Floud, and wrote of the Worlds destruction, both by Water and Fire; as also of Christ his comming in judgement, as Saint Jude hath witnessed. But leaving these Antiquites to other mens judgements, and every man to his ownereason, I will conclude this Plantation of Egypt. It is agreed by all, that it was peopled by Millrain, and that it tooke the name of Egypt from Egyptus the fonne of Belus, as aforefaile Being divided into two Regions, that part from Memphis or Nicopolis to the Medterran Sea, was called the inferiour Egypt; surnamed also Delta: because the severall branches of Nilus breaking afunder from one body of the River, gave it the forme of the Greeke letter Delta, which is the forme of a Triangle. That branch, which ran roward the North-east and embraced the Sea, next unto the Desarts of Sur and Pharan, had on it the City of Pelusium, where Senacherib was repulsed: The other branch, which veelded it selfe to the Salt-water towards the North-east, is beautified by that famous City of Alexandria: The upper part of Egypt is bounded betweene Memphis and Syene neere Ethiopia, and had the name of Thebaida, of that ancient City of Thebes; which(according to Homer) was adorned with 100. Gates, and therefore called Civitas centum portarum; and by the Greeks Diospolis; in the Scriptures No-hamon, which fignifieth multitudes of Inhabitants, exceeding beliefe. Josephus cals Egypt Merfin of Milyaim: and He. Jost i. Anicis Hero. Enlerge. rodotus affirmes that it had once the name of Thebais.

Phut the third sonne of Ham tooke the next portion of Land to his brother Mizrain. and inhabited Lybia: whose people were anciently called Phutei, (faith Josephus) & Pliny mentioneth the River Phut in Mauritania: which River from the Mountain Atlas (known 1564) to the Inhabitants by the name of Dyris) he maketh to be distant the space of two hundred miles. It also appeareth in the thirtieth Chapter of Ezechiel, that Phut, Chulb, & Lud were contermini and Affociates with the Egyptians.

6. XII. Of the eleven somes of Canaan, the fourth some of Ham.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan: with the names of his eleven formes.

Anaan (the fourth sonne of Ham) possest all that Region called by the Romanes Palastina: in the Scriptures Galilaa, Samaria, and Judaa; in the later times known by the name of the Holy Land and Jurie: the limits whereof are precifely fer downe by Moses, Genesis the tenth, Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon as thou goest to Gerar untill AZZah, and as thou goest unto Sodom and Gomorrha, and Admah & Zeboim, even unto Lasha. Now how soever these words of the Hebren Text (as thou goest) be converted, Moses meaning was that Gerar was the South bound of Canaan, and Zidon the North; Sodome and Gomorrha the East, and the other Cities named stood on the Frontiers thereof. For Gerar standeth in a right Line from Gazain the way of Egypt, the uttermost Territory of Canaan Southward: and this was properly the Land of Canaan.

Now the fons of Canaan which possess this Country, and inhabited some part of the borders thereof, were in number eleven:

1. Zidon.

2. Heth or Chethus.

3. Febuli or Febulæns.

4. Emori or Emoreus, or Amoreus.

5. Girgeshi or Girgeseus.

6. Hevi or Chivens.

7. Arki or Harkeus.

S. Seni or Sinaus.

9. Arvadi or Arvadaus.

10. Zemari or Samareus, or TZemareus.

11. Hamathi, or Hamatheus, or Chamathaus.

Of which the most renowned were the Hethites, Gergesites, Amerites, Hevites, Jebusites, and Perizzites: which Perizzites were descended of Zemari or Samareus, or from some ofhis.

t. 11. Of the portions of Zidon and Heth. I Idon the first borne of Canaan, built the famous City of Zidon in Phanicia, which afterward fell in partition to the Tribe of Affer: for Affer, Labulon, & Nephtali had a great part of the ancient Phanicia diffributed among them; but the Afferites could never obtaine Zidon it felfe.

Hevites, and the Jebusites. The Hittites inhabited about Berfabe, and towards Hebron neer the Torrent Befor, and about Gerar, which Mofes maketh the uttermost limit of Canaan having the Defart of Pharan to the South: for about Berfabe (otherwise Puteus jurameni) foure miles from GaZa dwelt Heth and his Posterity, as far to the Northeast as Hebron, & Mamre 3& of Ephraim the Hittite did Abraham buy the field of Sarahs buriall. Of which Nation Rebecca bewailed her selfe to Isaac, saying, That she was weary of her life for the Daughters of Heth. The Giants Anakim were of the fe Hittites, a strong and sierce Nation, 10 whose entertainment by the kings of Ifrael against them the Syrians greatly feared: as in the feventh of the Kings; Ifrael hath hired against us the Kings of the Hittites.

The second some of Canaan was Heth or Cethus: of whom came the Hethites: or Hin. tites, one of those seven principall Nations (commanders of Canaan) appointed by God to be rooted out; namely, the Gergesites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizzites, the

6. III. Of the Jebusites and Amorites:

TEbuseus, the third sonne of Canaan, of whom came the Jebusites, and whose principall I feat was Jebus, (afterward Hierufalem) were also a valiant and stubborne Nation, and held their City and the Country neere it, till such time as David by Gods affistance recovered both: yet were not the Jebusites extinguished, but were Tributaries to Solomon, Amoreus was the fourth sonne of Canaan, of whom the Amorites tooke name, who inhabited that Land to the East of Jordan below the Sea of Galilee, having Arnon and the Mountaines of Galaad on the East, and Jordan on the West: of whom Og (King of Basan) and Sihon (overthrowne by Moses) were Princes.

The Amerites had also many other habitations dispersed within the bounds of Canaan: as behinde Libanus in the edge of Calosyria, or Syria Libanica. They had also their being in the Mountaines of Juda, and in Idumaa neere the Metropolis thereof, called Duma. And hereofit came that all the Canaanites were sometime called Amorites: as in Genesis the fifteenth: For the wickednesse of the Amorites is not yet full. And that this was also a powerfull Nation, wee finde in the Prophet Amos: Yet destroyed I the Amorite before them, whose heighth was like the heighth of a Cedar, and hee was strong as the Oake.

t. IIII. Of the Gergesites, Hevites and Harkites.

THe fift fonne of Canaan was Gergefius or Gergefion, (otherwife Girgafi) who inhabi ted on the East side of the Lake of Tiberias, or the Sea of Galilee, where Ptolomy sets the City Gerasa, which Josephus cals Gesera, in the Territory of Decapolis. Here it was that Christ disposses the possessed with Divels; and the Gergesises defired him to depart their Coatts: because their Swine, filled with the evill spirits, drowned themselves in the Sea of Galilee. Gergeseus also built Beritus (sometime Geris) afterward Fælix Julia, three miles from the River Adonis in Phanicia: in which the Romans held a Garrison: andto which Augustus gave many large priviledges.

Heveus the fixth fon, and Father of the Hevites, inhabited under Libanus neer Emath. These Hevites, howsoever the Capht horim expelled a good part of them (as in Deuterone) my the second is remembred) yet many of them remained all the warre of Josua, and afterward to the time of Solomon. For God was not pleased utterly to root out these Nations, but they were fometimes made Tributaries to the Ifraelites, and at other times ferved (in their falling away from the true worship of God) to afflict them: for as it is written, Judges the third: They remained to prove Israel by them, whether they would obeythe

The feventh fonne was Araceus or Harki, who between the foote of Libanus and the Mediterran Sea, (over against Tripolis) built the City of Archas, Arce, or Arca, afterwards

t. V. Of Sini and Arvadia

I neus the eight fon, Hierofolymitanus fets at Caparorfa, which Ptolomy finds in Justen par far from Jehus to the South theyard friend 7. dea, not far from Jebus; to the South thereof, faith Junius. But it is more probable. that Sineus founded Sin, which S. Hierome cals Sim: Ptolomy, Simyra: Mela and Plimy. Simyrus: Brochard, Sycon; (called Synochis) neere Arca. Pererius thinkes that Sineus inhabited the Defarts of Sinai, or thereabout; but hereof there is no other certainty than the report of Brochard, who took view of all these places, affirming, that Sineus built Synochis. as Zidon built Zidon. There is also another Nation of Cini written with the letter C. otherwise Kenai) who descended of Hobab the son of Raguel the Madianite, who assisted the Israelites in their conduction through the Wildernes of Pharan. But these Cinei were admitted among the Ifraelites, and had a portion of Land with the Nephralims, befide Judge their habitations with the Amalekites: against these Cinai, Balaam prophecied, that they Fostigadia should be destroyed by the Allyrians.

The ninth fonne was Aradeus or Arvadeus, who in the Ile of Aradus built the City Gutty Pilo Arados: opposite against which Hand on the Maine of Phanicia, they founded another City of that name, which for opposition was afterwards called Antaradus. To this City came S. Peter (faith Clement) and in this Ile preached the Gospell, and founded a Church inhonour of our Lady: but we finde no fuch worke of his in the Atts of the Apostles. Both these two were very famous, and places of skilfull Sea-men: whom Ezechiel remembreth in his prophecies against the Tyrians: The inhabitants of Zidon and Arvad were capation

F Samareus, or Zemari, the tenth fon there are divers opinions. Some think that he inhabited in Calofyria at Edeffa, and founded Samarain, which in Fosua is placed in the Tribe of Benjamin. There is also Samarajim (of the same orthography) upon the Mountains of Ephraim (faith Beroaldus) mentioned in the fecond of Chr.c. 12, v. 4. Beroal in through which the Latine converteth amisse (faith he) by Semeron. The Hierosolymitan Paraphrast makes Samareus (of whom were the Periz ites) the parent of the Emissani, which Pling cals the Hemisseni, in Colospina; and it may be that it was their first habitation, and that they afterwards inhabited those other places before remembred. But that they founded Samaria, both the Hebrew Orthographie, and this place in the first of Kings (speaking * Kinze as of Omri) disproveth: And he bought the Mountaine Samaria or Shemeron of one Shemer, for two talents of silver, and built in the Mountaine, and called the name of the City which heebuilt, after the name of Shemer, Lord of the Mountaine, Samaria. But of all these places I shall speake more at large in the conquest of the holy Land, by the children of Ifrael. Of whomfoever the Samaritanes were descended, sure I am, that they were ever a perfidious Nation, and base: for as long as the state of the Jewes stood up, they alwayes called themselves Tewes; when it suffered or sanke, they then utterly denyed to be of that Nation or Family; for at fuch time as they were returned from their first captivities they became a mixt Nation; partly of the Colonies of the Affgrians, and partly of the Naturals.

t. VII. of Hamathi.

He last of Canaans sons was Hamatheus, or (according to the Hebrew) Hamathi, of Hamath, (faith Beroaldus:) of which (the afpiration taken away) the fame is pronounced Emath, wherof Hamatheus was present. Josephus & S. Hierome confound Emath with Antioch: northat Antioch which standeth on the River Orontes, on the frontier of Comagena, between the Mountaine Caffins and the Province of Pieria, and Seleucis, of which Saint Peter was Bishop, and in which Saint Luke and Ignatius were borne; but Ansiech, furnamed Epiphania, as Berealdus Supposeth, which standeth betweene

Deut.I. NHM.X 34

Apamea and Emesa in Cassiotis. Yet, indeed, Emath cannot be taken for either: for both that Antioch upon Orontes, and that which neighboureth Emela, are farther off feated from Canaan, than ever any of those Nations straggled. And whereas S. Hierome setteth

Emath, which he confoundeth with Epiphania, in the Tribe of Nephtali; it is manifest, that Epiphania, which standeth to the North of Emesa, hath all the Province of Laodicea betweene it and any part of the Land divided. And if Libanon it selfe were not shared a mong the Tribes, then could not Epiphania belong unto them: for both the Provinces

Landicea and Libanica, are betweene Epiphania and any part of the holy Land: and therefore Emath fo taken could not be a part of Nephtali, as in the thirteenth of Josas directly proved. For Josua counting the lands that remained unpossest, reckoneth all Mount is Libanon towards the Sunne-rifing, from Baalgad under Mount Hermon, until we come to Hamath. And this reason (among others) is used, that Emath was not in Nephtalim, or any way belonging to the children of Ifrael: because Davidaccepted the presents of To-bu King of Emath, and (therewithall) conditions of peace: which hee would not have done, if that Territory had ever belonged to the children of Ifrael, but would have recovered it without composition, and by strong hand, as he did the rest. But this Argument (as I take it) hath no great weight. For if the promise which God made, be considered, as it is written in Deuteronomy, then might Emath be comprehended, though feated altogether without the bounds of the Land promifed, according to the description of Moles Cap. 11. 0.24. and Josea: for Emath is indeed situate on the other side of the Mountaine of Hermon, which joyneth to Libanus: and is otherwise called Iturea. But whereas Hamath is named in Josuathe 19. v.35. and written in the Latine conversion Emath, therein (faith Beroaldus) was S. Hierome miltaken. Emath or Itures is that over the Mountaines, and the City in Nephralim should be written Hamath: and so the Septuagint (understanding the difference) write it Ammath and not Emath, the fame which indeed belongeth to the

That most of the sonnes of Chush were feated in Arabia the happy : and of the Sabaans that robbed Job: and of the Queene that came to Salomon.

Eba or Saba was the eldest sonne of Chush, the eldest sonne of Ham; to make a difference betweene Him and his Nephew Sheba, the sonne of his brother Raama, or Regma, (or Ragma after Montanus:) his name is written with a fingle (S)Samech, and Shebathe fonne of Regma with an (S) afperate, which is the Hebrew Schin. Seba the eldest sonne of Chush, Regma his brother, and Sheba the sonne of Regma, possest both the shores of Arabia Fælix. Saba tooke that part toward the Red Sea, as neerest his Father Chush, and the Land of the Chusites: Regma and Sheba the East coast of the fame Arabia, which looketh into the Gulfe of Persia; of which Pliny: Sabai, Arabim populi, propter thura clarissimi ad utraq maria porrectis gentibus habitant; The Sabeans, people of Arabia, famous for their Frankincense, extending their Nations, dwell along both the Seas, (to wit) the Persian, and the Arabian or Red Sea. This Countrey was afterwards called Arabia, à populi mistione, faith Postellus. To this agreeth Ptolomy, who fetteththe City of Saba towards the Arabian or Red Sea, & the City Rhegama towards the Per fian with whom also we may leave Sabta: for so much Montanus gathereth out of Prolom?

because he remembreth a Nation (called Stabai) neere the Persian Sea; and Massabatha which descended of them. But Montanus hath sent Regma, or (as he cals him) Rhama, into Carmania, for which I fee no reason. Josephus, who onely attended his owne fancies: hath banished Saba or Seba to the border of Ethiopia. But Beroaldus thinkes it strange. rhatthe Sabæi, which stole away Jobs Cattle, should runne through all Egypt, and all Arabia Petraa, and finde out Job in Traconitis, betweene Palastina and Calosyria, 1200. milesoff. Now as this conjecture was more than ridiculous, so doe I thinke, that neither the Sabai on the Red Sea, northose toward the Persian Sea, could by any meanes execute the stealth upon 30b, which soever Beroaldus shall take for neerest. But these were rhe Sabæi of Arabia the Defart, where Guilandinus Melchior affirmethout of his owne experience, that the Citie Saba is feated: the fame which Ptolomy calls Save, now Semifcafac: and from this Saba in Arabia the Defart, came those Magi or Wife men, which worthipped Christ, faith Melchior, whose words are these: The Magicame neither out of Me-Copotamia (as Chryfostome, Hierome, and Ambrose supposed) nor out of Arabia the Happy, as many wise men doe beleeve, but out of Saba in Arabia the Desart: which City, when my selfe was there, was (as I judged it) called Semifeafac. And to approve this opinion of Guilan... dinus, is appeareth that these Sabai were neighbours to Fob, and lay fit to invade and rob him. For both the other Nations (as well those on the Persian Sea, as those on the Red Sea) are fo dif-joyned with large Defarts, as there is no possibilitie for strangers to passe them, especially with any numbers of Cattell, both in respect of the Mountaines, of the fands, and of the extreme want of water in those parts: Whi nec homines, nec bestia videntur, nec aves, imò nec arbores, nec gramen aliquod, sed non nisi montes saxosi, altisimi, asperimi: Where there are found neither men, nor beasts, no not so much as birds, or trees, nor any passure or graffe, but onely sharpe, and high, stonie, and craggie mountaines. Beroaldus and Pererius conceive, that the Queene of Saba which came to vifit Solomon, was of the Sabai on the East side of Arabia Fælix; but the contrarie seemeth more probable, and that she was Queen of Saba towards the Red Sea: for Solomon at that time commanding all that part of Arabia Petraa, betwixt Idumaa and the Red Sea, as farre downe as Midian or Madian. and Ezion Gaber: and this Queene of Saba, which inhabited the West part of Arabia Fælix, being his neighbour, might without any far travell enter his Territories, free from all danger of furprise by any other Prince or Nation. But to avoid tediousnesse, it is manifest that Seba or Saba, Sabta, Raama, or Regma, with his Sonnes Sheba and Dedan, and Sabteca, were all the possessors of Arabia the Happy, and the Defart: only Havilah and Nimrod dwelt together on the East fide of Chush, who held Arabia Petraa. Now for Sabta, there is found of his name the City of Sabbatha or Sabota in the same Arabia: of which both Plinie and Ptolomy; who withall nameth Sabotale, Plinitz 2173 within the wals whereof there were fometimes found fixtie Temples. Ezechiel joyneth Ptolitabe. the Father and the Sonne together, The Merchants of Sheba and Raama were thy Mer- Executarian chants. And that they were the Easterne Arabians, their merchandise witnesseth, formerly repeated in the Chapter of Paradife. For Josephus his fancies, that Saba was the Parent of the Ethiopians about Meroe, and Sabta of the Ethiopians Astabari, they be not worthy any farther answer than hath already beene given: especially seeing these Cities. preserving the memorie of the names of Saba, and of Sabta in Arabia, were yet remaining in Ptolomies time, though in some letters changed. As also in the coasts adjoyning, the names of other of the brethren of the familie of Culh, with little alterations are preserved. In Arabia the Defart is found the Citie Saba or Save, (now Semiscasae) with the Citie of Rhegana for Rhegma: and the Nation by Ptolomie himselfe called Raabeni of Raamah. In Arabia the Happie is found the Citic of Rhegama, and Rabana; which also keepeth the found of Rhegma, the Citie of Saptha or Saptah, not far from the East-coast of Arabia: as also the Metropolis and chiefe Citie in the bodie of the South part of Arabia, called without defference or alteration Sabatha, and to the West of Sabatha towards the Red Sea the great Citie of Saba; and the Nation adjoyning, Sabai: and to the South thereof againe toward the streight entrance of the Red Sea, the Region of Sabe. To all these his brothers and nephewes which were feated on the East fide of Arabia, Havilab by the passage of Tigris was a neighbour, to whom he might passe by Boate even unto Rhegma the Citie of Raama, or Rhegma, fet neere the River of Lar towards the mouth of the Persian Sea, which stood in Prolomies time.

CHAP.8. $.14:

Josephus his opinion of Dedan, one of the iffue of Chush, to have beene feated in the West A: thopia, diffroved out of Ezechiel and Hieremy.

Nd whereas Josephus (whom in this S. Hierome followeth, as not curious herein) fent Dedan the son of Raamah into West Athiopia, it is strange that Ezech. should couple Sheba, Raamah, and Dedan together; Dedan in the 15. Verse, and Sheba, and Raamah in the 22. Verse, to be the Merchants of Tyre, if Dedan had dwelt in West Athiopia, which is diftant from Raamah and Sheba (the habitation of his father and brother) h above foure thousand miles. Besides which, the merchandise that the Dedanites brought to Tyre doth not make them naked Blacke-moores. For they of Dedan (faith Ezechiel) were thy Merchantsin precious clothes for thy Chariots; and these Westerne Æthio. pians never faw cloth, till the Portugals, seeking those Coasts, traded with them: the merchandise of the Countrie being Hides, Elephants teeth, some Gold and Amber, Civet Cars, and Rice, but nothing at all of any manufacture: & all these they exchanged for linnen or iron chiefly.

But inthose dayes the West part of Africa within the body of the land was knowne onely by imagination and, being under the burnt Zone, was held uninhabitable. And therefore that the Negroes of the West Athiopia, which inhabite about Serra Liona, or Niger, could either passe by Sea or Land to Tyre, in the bottome of the Mediteran Sea, were a strange, or rather a soolish fancy. Now to put it out of dispute that Dedanalso dwelt by the rest of the children of Chush, which seats they held by that name in the time of Hieremy the Prophet, let us heare Hieremy his owne words: Fly, ge Inhabitants of Dedan, for I have brought the destruction of Elanupon him. Hereby it appeareth, that Dedan was a Neighbour to the Idumeans: and Idumea is a Province of Arabia Petres: and Dedan which dwelt on the North part of Arabia falix, joyned in that part to Petras the feat of his Grand-father Chulh; which neighbourhood and fellowship of Dedan and the Idumaans, is also confirmed by Ezechiel: I will stretch out my hand upon Edom, and destroy Man and Beast out of it, and I will make it desolate from Teman: and they of Dedan shall fall by the sword.

Of the iffue of Mizraim: and of the place of Hieremie, Chap. 9. Verf. 7.

Free Chulh, it followeth to speake of Mizraims sonnes, whose names (faith Saint Augustine) were plurall, to fignifie the Nations, which came of them. Ludim, the elder fon of Mizrain, was the Father of the Lybians in Africa: and thereft monly a figne of of his Brothers dispersed themselves into all the Regions adjoyning. Among the sons theplurallium of Shem there is also Lud; but he is differenced from Lud the sonne of Mizrain by the fingular number : the sonne of Shem being written Lud; the sonne of Mizraim, Ludim and yet these Names and Nations are often confounded, notwithstanding the apparent difference both of Names and Nations. For, that Ludim the sonne of Mizraim was the Parent of the Lybians in Africa, and that he was feated not farre from Mizrain his father, appeareth by the Prophet Hieremy, who joyned them in this forttogether: Come up yet Horses, and rage ye Chariots, and let the valiant mencome forth, the Blacke-moores, and the Lybians which beare the shield: for those Nations assisted the Egyptians, being of one Parent descended. And in Exechiel, Phut and Lud are joyned together. Athiopia (or Chush) faith Ezechiel, c. 30. v. 3. and Phut, and Lud, and all the common people, and the men of the Land that are in league, shall fall with them by the sword: which is as much to say, as the sons of Chulh, (which were the Chusites) the sonnes of Mizraim, (which were the Egyptians) and the Lybians (descended of his sonne Lud) with other the Inhabitants of Egypt and Africa, shall fall together. Hierofolymitanus finds also in Africa a Nation of the Lydians. And I beleeve it: because Hieremy joyneth the Lybians, and Lydians together in the place before remembred. But Lybia in Africa is by the Hebrewes called Ludim (faith Arias Montanus) though 2 Chron. 12.3. they seeme to bee called Lubim or Lubai, a name somewhat neerer the word Lybies, and by which it may seeme that the truet writing is, not Libyes, but Lybies. Neither is it here to be omitted, that Pintus (upon the thirtieth of Exechiel) understandeth that which is spoken in the third Verse of Lud. nor tobe meant of the Lybians at all: for he will have this threatning to be meant against the people of Lyda, a City (faith he) between Egypt and Palastina, which opinion I could not millike if the City of Lyda were so seated. But Lyda (which should be written Lydda with adouble D, and is the fame City which was afterward Doifpolis, in which S. Peter cured Eneas of the palfey) standeth neere the Torrent Gaas, not faire from Joppethe Port of Hierusalem. Yet it is not impossible but that this City might have Lud for the Founder. For there are many Cities of one name founded in all the Regions of the World, and farreasunder; as after the names of Alexander, Selencus, and Antiochus, many Cities called Alexandria, Seleucia, and Antiochia, so of divers others. S. Hierome maketh Lebabim to be the Father of Libya, who was the third sonne of Mizraim; and so doth Postellus; and either opinion may be true.

of the History of the World.

The rest of Mizraims sonnes have no proper Countries given them in the Scriptures. faving Cassum and Captorim, of whom came the Philistims, whom the Scriptures call Pelelet.

These Cassubim inhabited Cassiotis a Region lying in the entrance of Egypt from Palas fina, in which the Lake Sirbonis, and the Mountaine Cassim are found, not faire from whence Pompey was buried.

Caphtorim seated neere Castuhim in that Tract of Egypt called Sethrotis, next faire from Pelulium. Strabo calls it Sethrotis; Stephanus and Pliny, Sethroitis, of the City Sethron: which Ortelius takes to be the same which Ptolomy calls Hercules parva. Of the Callubim and Gaphtorim came the Philistims, which are called by the Septuagint Allophyli (which is) Alienigena, Strangers, or of a strange kindred. These Philistims inhabited the South part of the holy Land towards Egypt, of whom Palastina tooke name. For the Hebrewes (faith Isidore) doe not use the letter (P) but in stead of it (ph.) Their principall Cities were Ga-Za, Afcalon, Azotus, Geth, and Accaron: and the people of them called Gafai, Afcalonita, Azotii, Gethai, and Accaronita: Isidore affirmes, that Ascalon was first called Philistim; and of that City the Country adjoyning. But where I sidore had it, I know not.

The first knowne King of the Philistims was that Abimelech, who had a liking to Abrahams wife; with whom Abraham made a covenant and league. This Abimelech dwelt indeed at this time in Gerar; but it is written that he was also King of the Philistims, in these words: Wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech King of the Philistims unto Gerar. Now in Ensurpointie regard that this or some ancienter Abimelech governed the commonwealth greatly to his 33. Pfalmeglory, the rest of his successors called themselves by the same name. The Philistims the 29.0 feet commanded that Tract of land upon the mediterran Sea to the Northward, from the Ca-thel. Alle of Pilgrims (otherwise Calarea Palastina, or Stratons Tower) which was the Southborder of Phanicia, to Gafa, or to the River of Egypt. The Anakims or strong Gyants were of the fe Philiftims: & Goliah was of Geth, one of the five Cities above named. They had sometimes five Kings, faith Lyranus. They mastered the Israelites at severall times above 150. yeeres, and kept them Tributaries, till they were weakened by Sampson and Samuel; but in the end this yoke was taken off by David; and laid on themselves.

It is objected, that because these Cities and the Countries adjoyning, were held by the fonnes of Mizraim, therefore did the Ifraelites dispossesses the sonnes of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, by forcing those places.

To this faith Pererius, that although the Palastines or Philistines held it in the time of Josua, yet at the time of the promise it was possest by the Canaanites; as in the second of Deuteronomy. The Hevites dwelt in the Villages unto Gaza. And what marvell, if the Canmanites being the greater part) the denomination were from them? For that the Philistims were of Caphtor, and so of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, besides Moses, the Prophet Hieremy witnesseth: The Lord will destroy the Philistims: the remnant of the iffue of Caph- Mountain ? tor: and in like manner in the ninth of Amos, the Philiftims are faid to be the reliques of Caphtorim: Have not I brought up Israel out of the Land of Egypt, and the Philistims from Americani Caphtor, and Aram from Kir? fo I reade this place with divers of the learned. For whereas the Vulgar hath & Palastinos de Cappadocia, & Syros de Cyrene, this conversion Beroaldus condemneth; where Caphtor is taken for Cappadocia, and Cyrene for Kir. For Cyrene is a City directly West from Egypt, betweene Prolomais or Barce and Apollonia : but Kir in Asia under the Astrians: Junius hath it Kir, and not Cyrene: and so hath the Geneva.

Sap. 16. v.g.

But Pererius calls Caphtorim Cappadocia, according to the Vulgar translation, to which he is bound: and yet it is not altogether improbable if he mean Cappadocia in Palæstina. Of which feein and not that Cappodocia by the Sea Pontus in the North of Afia the leffe. For whether they inhabited Sethreites, or Cappadocia of Palæstina, it is not certainly knowne. And fure in this maner he may expound Cappadocia to be ambiguous, aswell as he doth Cyrene: taking it here not for Cyrene in Africa, but for a place in Media. For it is written in the second of Kings, that Teglatphalasser King of the Assyrians carried away the inhabirants of Damascus into Kir : and so Josephus seemes to understand this Kir for Cyrene in Media, calling this Cyrene, Media Superior: for it was the manner and policy of the Affyrians to transplant the people conquered by them, as they did the Samaritans or If it raelites, and other Nations. And hereof it came that Kir was called Syro-Media: because the Syrians by the Affyrians were therein captived.

Gf the issue of Sem.

†. I. of Elam, Affur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

It remaineth laftly to speake of the Sons of Sem, who are these:

- 1. Alam, or Elam,
- Ashur,
- Arphaxad.
- Lud, and

He posterity of Sem, Moses recountethafter the rest: because from them he proceedeth in order with the Genealogie and Story of the Hebrewes: (For of Some was Abraham descended.)

Of these five sonnes, the Scriptures remember the length of the life of Arphaxadonly, and only the children of him & Aram; the rest are barely spoken of by rehearfall of their names, faving that it may be gathered, that Affur (who was supposed to found Ninive) was also said to be the Father of the Assyrians, whose issues, and the issues of Cham, in stantly contended for the Empire of the East: which sometimes the Assyrians, somtimes the Babylonians obtained, according to the vertue of their Princes. This is the common opinion, which also teacheth us, that all the East parts of the World were peopled by Affur, Elam, and Lud (faving India) which I beleeve Noah himselfe first inhabited : and to whom Ophir and Havilab the fons of Jottan afterward repaired, Hi filii Sem ab Euphralia fluvio partem Asia usq and Oceanum Indicum tenuerunt; These sons of Sem (faith S. Hierome) held all those Regions from Euphrates to the Indian Ocean.

Fol. Ant. 1.1.1.7.

Cap. 8.verf.2.

Of Elam came the Elamites, remembred, Atts 2. ver. 9. and the Princes of Persia; which name then began to be out of use and lost, when the Persians became Masters of Babylonia: the East Monarchy being established in them. Some prophane Writers distinguish Elam from Perfia and make the Elamites a people apart. But Sufa (which the Scriptures call Susan)in Elam was the kings seate of Persia (witnesse Daniel:) And I saw (faith he)# a vision, & when I saw it, I was in the Palace of Susan, which is in the Province of Elam. This City is embraced by the River Eulæus (according to Ptolomy) in Daniel, Ulai: and feated in the border of Susiana. Ashur (as most Historians believe) the second son of Sem, was Father of the Assyrians, who disdaining the pride of Nimrod, parted from Babel, and built Ninive, of equal beauty and magnitude with Babylon, or exceeding it. But we shall in due place disprove that opinion. Every mans hand hath beene in this Story, and therefore I shall not need herein to speake much: for the Assyrians so often invaded and spoiled the Israelites, destroyed their Cities, and led them Captives, as both in Divine and Humane letters there is large, and of ten mention of this Nation.

But howfoever Herodot us and D. Siculus extend this Empire, and honour this Nation with ample Dominion; yet was not the state of the Assyrians of any such power, after fuch time as Sardanapalus lost the Empire. For Senacherib who was one of the powers fillest Princes among them, had yet the Mountaine Taurus for the utmost of his Dominion toward the North-east, and Syria bounded him toward the West, not with standing these valuets of Senacherib in Esay the 37. Have the gods of the Nations dilivered them Volta whommy Fathers have destroyed: as Gozan, and Haran, and Reseph, and the children of Eden whichwere at Telassar? Where is the King of Hamath, and the King of Arphad, or the King of the City Sepharuaim, Hena and Joah? All these were indeede but petty Kings of Cities, and small Countries as Haran in Mesopotamia: Resept in Palmyresa: Hamath or Emath in Ituraa, under Libanus: the Isle of Eden: Sepher, and others of this fort. Year Natuchodonofor, who was most powerfull, before the conquest of Egypt, had but Chaldea, Mesopotamia, and Syria, with Palastina, and Phanicia parts thereof. But in this question of Affar, I will speake my opinion freely when I come to Nimrod, whose plantation I have omitted among the rest of the Chusites, because he established the first Empires from whom the most memorable story of the World taketh beginning.

Of Arphaxad came the Chaldeans, faith Saint Hierome, and Josephus; but it must be those Chaldeans about Ur: for the sonnes of Cham possess the rest. It is true that he was the Father of the Hebrewes: for Arphaxad begat Shela, and Shela, Heber, of whom

And that Lud, the fourth sonne of Shem, gave name to the Lydians in Afia the leffe, is the common opinion; taken from Josephus and S. Hierome; but I fee not by what reason he was moved to straggle thither from his friends.

of Aram, and his Sonnes.

Ram the fift and last Son of Shem was the Parent of the Syrians : of which Damas cus was head. Their name was changed from Aram or Aramites by Syrus (faith 100078) Eusebius out of Josephus) which Syrus lived before Moses was borne; the same Eusepand which others call the fon of Apollo. Mejopotamia also being but a Province of Syria, had the name of Aram Naharajim, which is as much to fay; as Syria duorum fluviorum; Syria compassed with two Rivers, (to wit) Tigris & Euphrates. The Scriptures call it Mesopotamia, Syria, and Padan Aram: and the Greekes Mesopotumia simply.

Arife and get thee to Padan Aram (faith Ifaac to Jacob) to the house of Berbuel thy mother's Cenas a See father, and thence take thee a wife. Strabo also remembreth it by the ancient name of Aram Deut. 23.4. or Aramea, as these his owne words converted witnesse: Quos nos syros vocamos, 1919 Jungs.

Syri Aramenios & Arameos vocant, Those which we call Syrians (faith he) themselves call Paralles Psiloso.

Strablis.

Against this opinion, that Aram the some of Sem was the Father and Denominator of the Syrians in generall 2 (and not onely of those in Syria Inier-amnis, which is Mesopotamia) some reade. Genes. 22:21. Kemuel, the Father of the Syrians: where other out of the originall read Kemuel, the fonne of Aram: Neither is it any inconvenience for us to understand the word (Aram) here, not for the Nation, but for the name of some one of note; the rather because in the History of Abraham and Isaac (which was in time long before Kemuels Posterity could be famous) we finde Mesopotamia called Aram; and that with an addition: fometimes with Naharajim, and fometimes of Padan, to diffinguish it from another Aram, which (as it feemes) then also was called Aram. For whereas Junius thinks in his notes upon Gen.25.20. that Padan Aram ought to be restrained to some part of Mesopotamia. (to wit) to that part which Ptolomy calls Ancobaritiss so called from the River Chaboras, which dividing it, runneth into Euphrates) the promifcuous use of Padan Aram, and Aram Naharajim (which latter appellation question lesse comprehends the whole Mesopotamia) may seeme to refine this opinion: especially seeing the signification of this appellation agreeth with the whole Region. For it fignificth as much as the yoke of Syria, which name agreeth with this Region: because the two Rivers, (as it were) you ked together goe along it. The Reliques of the name Padan appeare in the name of two Cities in Ptolomy, called Aphadana: (as Junius hath well noted) the one upon Chabor as, the other upon Euphrates.

uz or Hus inhabited about Damaseus, and built that City, faith Josephus and S. Hie. rome. But Tostatus mistaking this opinion, both in them and in Lyra, who also followeth Josephus, affirmeth that Abrahams Steward ElieZer was the Founder thereof, though it were likely that Hus the eldest son of Aram dwelt neare unto his father, who inhabited the body of Syria. For Hus was a Region of the fame, adjoyning to Arabia the Defart, and h to Batanea or Traconitis, whereof the Prophet Hieremy : Rejoyce and be glad O daughter of Edomibat dwellest in the Land of Hus. Hus therefore is seated beyond Jordan, in the East Region of Traconitis, adjoyning to Basan, having Batanea Gaulonitis, and the Mountaine Seir to the East, Edrai to the South, Damaseus North, and Fordan West: havingin it many Cities and people, as may also be gathered out of Hieremy : And all forts of people and all the kings of the Land of Hus. In this Region dwelt Job, descended of Hus, the some of Nahor, the brother of Abraham (faith S. Hierome) and married Dina the Daughter of Facob faith Philo.

Hul the second fon of Aram, S. Hierome makes the Father of the Armenians: and Gi ther the third fon, Parent to the Acarnanians or Carians: which opinion, (because I finder not where to fethim) I do not disprove, though I see no reason why Gesher should leave the fellowship of his owne brethren, and dwell among Strangers in Asia the lesse. Junius gives Hul (whom he writes Chul) the Defart of Palnayrena, as far as Euphrates, where Ptolimie fetteth the City of Cholle.

Gether (faith Josephus) founded the Battrians: but Josephus gave all Noahs children fea thers, to carry them far away in all hafte. For mine owne opinion, I alwayes keep the rule of Neighbourhood, and thinke with Junius (to wit) That Gether feated himfelfeneare his brothers, in the body of Syria, and in the Province of Cassiotis, and Seleucis, when Ptolomy placeth Gindarus, and the Nation by Plinie called Gindareni.

Junius also giveth to Mes or Mesch the North part of Syria, between Cilicia and Me fopotamia, neare the mountaine Massus. The certainty of those Plantations can no other wise be knowne than by this probability, that Aram the father (of whom that great Re gion tooke name) planted his fons in the same Landabout him: for he wanted no score of Territory for himselfe and them; neither then when the World was newly planted nor in many hundred yeares after; and therefore there is no reason to cast them, in the Defart parts of the World, so far afunder. And as necessity and policy held them together ther for a while: fo Ambition (which began together with Angels and Men) inhabiting the hearts of their children, set them as funder. For although these sonnes of Aram, and the fonnes of the rest of Noabs children, kept themselves within the bounds of some on large Kingdome; yet therein every one also sought a Province apart, and to themselves; giving to the Cities therein built their owne names, thereby to leave their memory to their Po sterity: the use of Letters being then rare, and knowne to few.

In this fort did the pride of the Spaniards in America cast them into so many Provide ces: every one emulating and disdaining the greatnesse of other, as they are thereby to this day subject to invasion, expulsion, and destruction: so as (Nova Hispania and Pernexcepted, because those Countries are unaccessible to Strangers) an easie force will calt them out of all the rest.

Mes the fourth son is made the Parent of the Maonians: of whom something hathbit spoken already. Arphaxad the third some of Shem, begat Shelab, and Heber. Heber had two fonnes, Phaleg and Jottan: and in Phalegs time was the Earth divided.

t. III. Of the division of the Earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the sonnes of Heber, of the is of Sem.

He many people which at the division (at Phalegs birth) were then living, and the through Plantation of all the East part of the World (at his death) hath made doubt, whether the Earth were divided at either. The Hebrewes (faith Perwins out of Sedar Holam, one of their Chronicles) affirme that this partition happened at the death of Phaleg: and Phaleg was borne in the yeare after the Floud 101. and lived in all 2201 yeares, which numbers added makes 340. And therefore was it fo many yeares after the Floud, ere the children of Noch severed themselves. But to this opinion of the Hebrewes, and the doubt they make how in fo few yeares as 101. (the time of Phalegs birth) fo many people could be increased, Pererius gives this answer, That if 70 persons of the Family of Jacob increased to 600000 fighting men in 215 yeares, (befides women, children, and impotent persons) how much more is it likely, that so soone after the Floud the children of Noah might in a shorter time bring forth many multitudes, having received the bleffing of God, Increase and multiply, and fill the earth? What strength this answer hath, let others judge : for the children of Ifrael were 70. and had 215. yeares time: and the fons of Noah were but three, and had but 101. yeares of time, to the birth of Phaleg.

Others conceive that Phaleg tooke that name after the division, in memory thereof: as Josephus and Saint Augustine, who reason in this manner. If the division were at Pha- Josephus, Anto legs death (which hapned in the yeare, which is commonly held to be the 48.0f Abra- Aug decivit. ham, but was by more likely computation 12. yeares before his birth) then was the division 38. yeares after Nimus, who governed 52. yeares: in the 43. yeare of whose reigne the earth so peopled in all the East and Northerne parts, as greater numbers have not beene found at any time fince. For Ninus affociating to himselfe Ariaus King of Arabia a people who at that time (faith Diod. Siculus) plurimum opibus atq; armis prastabant. Exceeded both in riches and bodies of men, subdued many Cities in Armenia; received Bar-Zanis into grace; then invaded Media, and crucified Pharnus the King thereof, with his Wife and feven Children; vanquished all those Regions betweene Nilus and Tanais, the Egyptians, Phanicians, the Kingdoms of Syria, and all the Nations of Persia, to the Hyrcanian Sea. For the numbers which followed Ninus (already remembred out of Ctellas) against Zoroaster and others: and Zoroaster on the other side, who made resistance with 400000 prove it fufficiently, that if the division had not happened before the death of Phaleg, there had needed no division at that time at all. For some of them were so ill satisfied with their partitions, as they fought to be mafters of all, and greater Armies were there never gathered than by Ninus and Semiramis: wherefore in this opinion there is little appearance of the truth.

But for that conceit that if the division had beene made at the birth of Phales. there were not then sufficient numbers borne to fill the earth: It was never meant that the earth could be filled every where at the very instant, but by times and degrees. And furely whatfoever mens opinions have beene heerein, yet it is certaine, that the division of tongues and of men must goe neere together with the ceasing of the worke at Babel: and that the enterprize of Babel was left off instantly upon the confufion of Languages, where followed the execution of the division; and so neyther at the birth nor death of Phaleg: for Phaleg was borne in yeare 101. after the Floud, which was the yearethat Nimred came into Shinaar, or ten yeares after he arrived. faith Berofus.

Now if it be objected that Phaleg (the Etymologie of whose name fignifieth division) must have lived without a name, except the name had bin given him at the time of this consustion and partition: to this objection it may be answered, That the change of names upon divers accidents is not rare in the Scriptures: for Jacob was called I frael after he had wrestled with the Angel ; Abraham was first Abram; and Edom, Esau; and that Phales being a principall man in this division had his first name upon this accident changed, it is most probable.

And lastly, whereas the Hebrewes, Saint Hierome and Chrysostome account Heber for a great Prophet, if that by giving his forme the name of Phaleg, he foretold the division which followed to this I say, I doe not finde that Heber deserved any such honour, if he had thereupon so called his sonne: for division and dispersion followeth increase of people of necessity; and this Prophesie (if any such had beene) might also have reference to the division, which afterwards fell amongst the Hebrewes themCHAP. 8. S.15. +.5.

But if we give a reasonable time to the building of the Tower and City of Babel, in which time many people (by reason and by demonstrative proofe) might be increased: and that upon the fall thereof the confusion and division followed (whereupon Phaleg tooke name) then in this opinion there is nothing either curious or monstrous.

But the certaine places of those thirteene Sonnes cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, the words of Mofes being generall: And their dwelling was from Melha as thou goef unto Separ a Mount in the East. Of all the sethirteene Sonnes, there were onely three me morable, (to wit) Sheba, Ophir, and Havilah. Concerning whose names, to avoid confufion, it is to be observed, that among the sonnes of Chush, two of them had also the names of Sheba and Havilah. Abraham had also a third Saba or Sheba, his grand-childe by his wife Ketura. But Seba the sonne of Chush, and Sheba the sorne of Rhegma his Nephew, we have left in Arabia Fælix : and Havilab the fon of Chush upon Tigris. Saba the grandchilde of Abraham was (as some have thought) the Father of the Sab aans in Persia: of which Nations Dionyfius de Orbis fitu, maketh mention. Primum Sabai; post hos sut Passagarda prope vero hos sant Tasci. The first are Sabaans after these be Passagarda; and neere thefe the Tasci. And whereas it is written: But unto the Sonnes of the Concubina which Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts, and fent them away from Isaac his sonne (while he yet lived) Eastward to the East-Countrey : hereupon it is supposed, that this Sabath fonne of Abraham, wandered into Persia: for Persia was accounted the furthermost East Countrey in respect of Judea; which also ovid settethunder the Sun-rising. Yet seeing the rest of Abrahams sonnes seated themselves on the borders of Judaa, I rather choosen leave Saba the sonne of Abraham in Arabia the Defart, where Ptolomy setteth a City of

But Sabathe sonne of Jostan, the son of Heber, (as I conceive) inhabited India itselfe For Dionysius Afer in his Periegesis, (or description of the World) which he wrote in Greeke Verse, among the Regions of India findeth a Nation called the Sabai. Taxilis hot inter medios habitatq, Sabaus, In the middest of these dwellthe Sabai, and the Taxili, saith of Ophir one of Jostans sonnes, and of Peru, and of that voyage of Salomon.

Phir also was an Iuhabirant of the East Iudia, and (as S. Hierome understands it) in one of the llands plentifull with gold, which are now known by the name of Mo lucca. Josephus understands Ophir to be one of those great head-lands in India, which by a generall name are called Cherfonesi, or Peninsula of which there are two very notorious; Callecut & Malacon, Pererius takes it rightly for an Iland, as Saint Hierome doth but he fets it at the head-land of Malacca. But Ophir is found among the Moluccas farther East.

Arias Montanus out of the second of Chronicles, the third Chapter and fixth Verse, oathers that Ophir was Peru in America, looking into the West Ocean, commonly called Mare del Sur, or the South Sea; by others Mare pacificum. The words in the second of the Chronicles are these: And he over-layed the house with precious stones for beauty; and of the coronic and the terror of the gold of Parvaim. Junius takes this gold to be the gold of Havilah, remembred by Moses in the description of Paradise: And the gold of that Land is good: fin-Pinlosus ding a Towne in Characene a Province of Sustana called Barbatia; so called (as he thinks) by corruption for Parvaim: from whence those Kings subjected by David, brought this fold with which they prefented him; and which David preferved for the enriching of

But this fancy of Peru hath deceived many men, before Montanus, and Plessis, who alforcoke Ophir for Peru. And that this question may be a subject of no further dispute: it is very true that there is no Region in the World of that name: fure I am, that at least America hath none, no notany City, Village, or Mountaine fo called. But when Franais Pilarro first discovered those Lands to the South of Panama, arriving in that Region which Atabaliba commanded (a Prince of magnificence, Riches and Dominion inferior to none) some of the Spaniards utterly ignorant of that language, demanding by signes b (as they could) the name of the Country, and pointing with their hand athwart a River. or Torrent, or Brooke that ranne by, the Indians answered Peru, which was either the name of that Brooke, or of water in generall. The Spaniards thereupon conceiving that the people had rightly understood them, set it downe in the Diurnall of their enterprise, and soin the first description made, and sent over to Charles the Emperor, all that West part of America to the South of Panama had the name of Peru, which hath continued ever fince, as divers Spaniards in the Indies affured me; which also Acolta the Teluite in his naturall and morall History of the Indies confirmeth. And whereas Montanus also finderhathat a part of the Indies (called Jucatan) tooke that name of Jostan, who as he fupposethnavigated from the utmost East of India to America: it is most true, that Tucatan is nothing elfe in the language of that Countrey but [What is that?] or [What fay you?] For when the Spaniards ask'd the name of that place (no man conceiving their meaning) one of the Salvages answered Jucatan (which is) What aske you, or What say you? The like hapned touching Paria, a Mountainous Country on the South fide of Trinidado & Margarita: for when the Spaniards inquiring (as all men doe) the names of those new Regions which they discovered, pointed to the Hils a farre off, one of the people answered, Paria, which is as much to fay, as, high Hils or Mountaines. For at Paria begins that marvellous ledge of Mountaines, which from thence are continued to the Strait of Magellan, from eight degrees of North latitude to the 52. of South: and so hath that Country ever fince retained the name of Paria.

The fame hapned among the English, which I fent under Sir Richard Greenevile to inhabite Virginia. For when some of my people asked the name of that Country, one of the Salvage answered Wingandacon, which is as much to fay, as You weare good clothes, or gay clothes. The same hapned to the Spaniard in asking the name of the Iland Trinidado: for a Spaniard demanding the name of that felfe place which the Sea incompassed, they an-Iwered, Caeri, which fignifieth an Iland. And in this manner have many places newly discovered beene initialed, of which Peru is one. And therefore we must leave ophir among the Moluccas, whereabout fuch an Iland is credibly affirmed to be.

Now although there may be found gold in Arabia it selfe (towards Persia) in Havilah, now Susiana, and all alongst that East Indian shore; yet the greatest plenty is taken up at the Philippines, certaine Ilands planted by the Spaniards, from the East India. And by the length of the passage which Salomons ships made from the red Sea (which was three yeares in going and comming) it seemeth they went to the uttermost East, as the Moluccas or Philippines. Indeede these that now goe from Portugal, or from hence, finish that navigation in two yeares, and fornetimes leffe: and Salomons ships went not above atenth part of this our course from hence. But we must consider, that they evermore kept the coast, and crept by the shores, which made the way exceeding long. For before the use of the Compasse was knowned twas impossible to navigate athwart the Ocean; and therefore Salamons thips could not finde Peru in America. Neither was it needfull for the Spaniards themselves (had it not bin for the plenty of gold in the East India Ilands farre above the mines of any one place of America) to faile every yeare from the West part of America thither, and there to have strongly planted, & inhabited the richest of those Ilands: wherein they have built a City called Manilia. Salomon therefore necded not to have gone farther off than Ophir in the East, to have sped worse: neither could he navigate from the East to the West in those dayes, whereas he had no coast to have guided him.

Tostatus also gathereth a fantasticall opinion out of Rabanus, who makes Ophir to be a Country, whose Mountaines of gold are kept by Griffins: which Mountaines Solinus affirmeth to be in Scythia Asiatica, in these words: Nam cum auro & gemmis afstuant. Griphes tement universa, alites ferocissima, Arimapi cum his dimicant, &c. For whereas these Countries abound in gold & rich stones, the Griffins defend the one & the other : a kinde of Fowle the fiercest of all other : with which Griffins a Nation of people called Arimafpi make warre. These Arimaspi are said to have been men with one eye onely, like unto the Cyclopes of Sicilia: of which Cyclopes, Herodotus and Aristeus make mention: and so doth Lucan in his third Booke: and Valerius Flaccus: and D. Siculus in the story of Alexander Macedon. But (for mine owne opinion) I believe none of them. And for these Arimashi, take it that this name fignifying One-eyed, was first given them by reason that they used to wear a vizzard of defence, with one fight in the middle to ferve both eies; and not that they had by nature any fuch defect. But Solinus borroweth thefe things out of Pline. who speakes of such a Nation in the extreme North, at a place called Gisolitron, or the Cave of the Northeast winde. For the rest, as all fables were commonly grounded up on some true stories or other things done: so might these tales of the Griffins receive this Morall: That if those men which fight against so many dangerous passages for gold, or other riches of this World, had their perfect fenses, and were not deprived of halfe their eye-fight (at least of the eye of right reason and understanding) they would contem themselves with a quiet & moderate estate; and not subject themselves to famine, cornin aire, violent heate, and cold, and to all forts of miserable diseases. And though this fable be sained in this place, yet if such a tale were told of some other places of the World where wilde Beafts or Serpents defend Mountaines of gold, it might be avowed. For there are in many places of the world, especially in America, many high and impassable Mountaines, which are very rich and full of gold, inhabited onely with Tygres, Lyons & other ravenous and cruell beafts : unto which if any man ascend (except his strength h very great) he shall be fure to finde the same warre, which the Arima hi make against the Griffins: not that the one or other had any fense of the gold, or seeke to defend that mettall, but being disquieted, or made affraid of themselves or their young-ones, they grow inraged and adventurous. In like fort it may be faid that the Alegartos, (which the Eggs tians call the Crocodyles) defend those Pearles which lye in the Lakes of the Inland: for many times the poore Indians are eaten up by them, when they dive for the pearle. And though the Alegartes know northe pearle, yet they finde favour in the flesh and bloudes the Indians, whom they devoure.

Of Havilah the soune of Jostan, who also passed into the East Indies: and of Mesha and Se pher named in the bordering of the Families of Joctan: with a Conclusion of this discourse touching the plantation of the World.

F Havilab the ionne of Jollan, there is nothing elfe to be faid, but that the general rall opinion is, that he also inhabited in the East India in the Continent, from which ophir past into the Ilands adjoyning. And whereas Ganges is said to water st Havilah, it is meant by Havilah in the East India, which tooke name of Havilah the fon of Jostan:but Havilah, which Pifon compaffeth, was so called of Havilah, the son of Chulh as is formerly proved by this place of Scripture: Saul smote the Amalekites from Havilah as thou commest to Shur, which is before Egypt. But that Saulever made Warre in the East India, no man hath suspected. For an end we may conclude, that of the thirteene sonnes of Jostan, these three, Saba, Havilah, & Ophir; though at the first seated by their brethren about the hill Masius or Mesh, Gen. 10.30. (to wit) betweene Cilicia and Mesopotamia; yet at length either themselves or their iffues removed into the East India, leaving the other Families of Jostan, to fill the Countries of their first plantation, which the Scripture defines to have beene from Mesh unto Sephar. And although S. Hierome take Mesh to be a Region of the East India, and Sephar a Mountaine of the same (which Mountaine. Mantanus would have to be the Andes in Armerica) those fancies are far beyond my understanding. For the word (East) in the Scriptures, where it hath reference to Judga, is never farther extended than into Persia. But Mesch is that part of the Mountaine of Mass in the North of Mesopotamia, out of which the River Chaboras springeth which runneth by Charran: and in the same Region we also finde for Sephar (remembred by Moles) Sipphara by Ptolomy, standing to the East of the Mountaine Massus; from whence Johan having many fonnes, some of them might passe into India, hearing of the beauty and riches thereof. But this was in processe of time.

The other fashion of planting I understand not, being grounded but upon mens imasinations, contrary to reason and possibility. And that this Mountaine in the East was no farther off than in those Regions before remembred, it appeareth by many places of verez. the Scripture where the same phrase is used: as in Numbers 23. Balac the King of Moab hath brought me from Aram, out of the Mountaine of the East; which was from the East part of Mesopotamia. For Balac brought Balaam out of Mesopotamia, (witnesse this place of Deuteronomie:) Because they byred Balaam the sonne of Beor, of Pethor in Aram Naha- capazatra rajim, to curse thee: for Aram Naharajim was Syria fluviorum, which is Mesopotamia.

o as aforefaid. This plantation of the World after the floud doth best agree (as to me it seemes) with all the places of Scripture compared together. And these be the reports of Reason and probable conjecture; the Guides which I have followed herein, and which I have chosen to goe after; making no valuation of the opinions of men, conducted by their owne fancies, be they ancient or moderne. Neither have I any end herein, private or publikes other than the discovery of truth. For as the partiality of man to himselfe hath disquised all things: fo the factious and hireling Hiftorians of all Ages (especially of these latter times) have by their many Volumes of untrue reports left Honor without a Monument. & Vertue without Memory: and (in stead thereof) have erected Statues and Tropheis to those. whom the darkest forgetfulnesse ought to have buryed, and covered over for evermore. And although the length and diffolving Nature of Time hath worne out or changed the Names and Memory of the Worlds first planters after the floud (I meane the greatest number and most part of them) yet all the foot-steps of Antiquity (as appeares by that which hath bin spoken) are not quite worne out nor over-growne : for Babylon hath to this day the found of Babel; Phanicia hath Ziden, to which City the eldest fon of Canaan gavename ; fo hath Cilicia, Tharfis; and the Armenians, Medes, Hiberians, Cappadocians; Phrygians, the Syrians, Idumeans, Libyans, Moores, and other Nations, have preferred from the death of forgetfulnesse forme signes of their first Founders and true Parents.

Of the beginning and establishing of Government.

CHAP. 9. S. I.

T followeth now to entreate how the World began to receive Rule and Government, which (while it had feareity of People) under-went no other Dominion than Paternity and Eldership. For the Fathers of Nations were then as Kings, and the eldest of Families as Princes. Hereof it came, that the word (Elder) was alwayes used both for the Magistrate, & for those of Age & Gravity: the same bearing one fignification almost in all languages. For in the eleventh of Numbers God commanded Moses to gather together 70 of the Elders of the people.

1.Sam.15.7.

Governour over them: the Hebrew bearing the same sense, which the Latine word Senes or Seniores doth. So it is written in Susanna, Then the Assembly believed them as those that were the Elders and Judges of the People. And fo in the words of those false Judges and witnesses to Daniel, Shew it unto us, seeing God hath given thee the office of an Elder. Demostheres useth the same word for the Magistrate among the Grecians. Cicero in Cato givethtwo other reasons for this appellation: Apud Lacedamonios qui amplissimum Ma gistratum gerunt, ut sunt, sic ctiam appellantur Senes; Among the Lacedamonians the chiefe Magistrates, astbey were, so are they called Eldermen: and againe: Ratio & prudentianis essent in senibus, non summum Concilium Majores nostri appellassent Senatum 3 I freason and advisement were not in old men, our Ancestors had never called the highest Councell by the to name of a Senate.

But though these reasons may well be given, yet we doubt not but in this name of (Elders) for Governours or Counsailers of State, there is a figne that the first Governors were the Fathers of Families; and under them the eldeft Sons. And from thence did the French, Italian, and Spaniard take the word (Signor) and out of it (Seignourie) for Lordship and Dominion : fignifying (according to Loyseau) puissance in propriety, or proper power. The kindes of this Seignourie, Seneca makes two: the one, Potestas aut imperium; Power or command : the other, Propriet as aut dominium : Propriety or Mastership : the correlative of the one is the subject, of the other the flave. Ad Cafarem (faith he) potestas omnium pertinet; ad singulos proprietas; Casar hath power over all, and every man propriety in his owne : and againe, Cafar omniaimperio possidet, singuli dominio ; Casar hol. deth all in his power, and every man possesseth his owne. But as men and vice began abundantly to increase: so obedience (the fruit of naturall reverence, which but from excellent feed feldome ripeneth) being exceedingly over-shadowed with pride, and ill examples, utterly withered and fellaway. And the foft weapons of paternall perswasions (after mankind began to neglect and forget the originall and first giver of life) became in all over-weake, either to refift the first inclination of evill, or after (when it became habituall) to conftraine it. So that now, when the hearts of men were onely guided and steered by their owne fancies, and tost to and fro on the tempestuous Seas of the world, while wisedome was severed from power, and strength from charity: Necessity (which bin-3) deth every nature but the immortall) made both the Wife and Foolish understandat once, that the estate of reasonable men would become farre more miserable than that of beafts, and that a generall floud of confusion would a second time over-flow them, did they not by a generall obedience to order and dominion prevent it. For the mighty, who trusted in their own strengths, found others againe (by interchange of times) more mighty than themselves: the seeble fell under the forcible; and the equall from equall received equall harmes. Infomuch that the licentious diforder (which feemed to promife a liberty upon the first acquaintance) proved upon a better triall, no lesse perillous than an unindurable bondage.

These Arguments by Necessity propounded, and by Reason maintained and confirmed, perswaded all Nations which the Heavens cover, to subject themselves to a Master, and to Magistracy in some degree. Under which Government, as the change (which brought with it leffe evill, than the former mischieses) was generally pleasing: so time (making all men wife that observe it) found some imperfection and corrosive in this cure. And therefore the same Necessity which invented, and the same Reason which approved fovereign power, bethought it selfe of certaine equall rules, in which Dominion(in the beginning boundlesse) might also discerne her own limits. For before the invention of Lawes, private affections in supreme Rulers made their own fancies both their Treafurers and Hangmen: measuring by this yard, and waighing in this ballance, both good and evill.

For as wisedome in Eldership preceded the rule of Kings; so the will of Kings forewent the inventions of Lawes. Populus nullis legibus tenebatur : arbitria principum prolegibus erant; The people were not governed by anyother lawes than the wils of Princes. Hereof it followed, that when Kings left to be good, neither did those mens vertues value them which were not fancied by their Kings, nor those mens vices deforme them that were. Amor interdum nimis videt, interdum nihil videt ; Love fees one while too much, another while flarke nothing. Hence it came to passe, that after a few yeares (for direction and restraint of Royall power) Lawes were established: and that government which had this mixture of equality (holding in an even ballance fupreme power and common right) acquired the title of Regall: the other (which had it not) was knowne for Tvrannicall: the one God established in favour of his people: the other he permitted for their affliction.

In the infancy of this Regall authority, Princes as they were chosen for their vertues onely so did they measure their powers by a great deale of moderation. And therefore (faith Fabius Pictor) Principes, quia justi erant, & religionibus dediti, jure habiti Dit & De aumo Catilia ditti - Princes because they were just and religious, were rightly accounted and called Gods. parts.

And though (fpeaking humanely) the beginning of Empire may be afcribed to Reafor and Necessity; yet it was God himselfe that first kindled this light in the mindes of men, whereby they faw that they could not live and be preferved without a Ruler and Conducter: God himselfe by his eternall providence having ordained Kings; and the law of Nature Leaders, and Rulers over others: For the very Bees have their Prince; the Decre their Leaders; and Cranes (by order imposed) watch for their owne safety. The pareses most High beareth rule over the Kingdomes of Men; and appointeth over it whom soever he Dams, 222 plasfeth. By me (faith Wisedome, spoken by the Sonne of God) Kings reigne; By me Princes Irov. 8.152 rule; and it is God (faith Daniel) that settethup Kings, and taketh away Kings. And that Daniel. this power is given from God, Christ himselfe witnesseth, speaking to Pilate Thou Tolon 19.24; couldest have no power at all against me except it were given thee from above.

o It was therefore by a threefold Justice that the World hath beene governed from the beginning (to wit) by a Justice naturall: by which the Parents and Elders of Families governed their Children, and Nephewes, and Families; in which government the Obedience was called naturall Piety: Againe, by a Justice divine, drawne from the Lawes and Ordinances of God; and the Obedience hereunto was called Confcience: And lastly, by a Justice civill, begotten by both the former; and the Obedience to this we call Duty. That by these three those of the eldest times were commanded, and that the rule in generall was Paternall, it is most evident : for Adam being Lord over his owne Children, instructed them in the service of God his Creator; as we reade, Cain and Abel brought Oblations before God, as they had beene taught by their Parent, the Father of

Of the three commendable forts of Government with their opposites: and of the degrees of hus mane fociety.

Hat other Policy was exercised or State sounded after such time as mankinde was greatly multiplied before the Floud, it cannot be certainely knowne, though it feeme by probable conjecture, that the fame was not without Kings in that first Age: it being possible that many Princes of the Egyptians (remembred among their antiquities) were before the general Floud: & very likely, that the cruell Oppressions in that Age proceeded from some tyranny in Government or from some rougher forme of Rule, than the Paternall.

Berofus ascribeth the rule of the World in those dayes to the Gyants of Libanus, who Berofus mastred (faith he) all Nations from the Sun-rising to the Sun-set. But in the second Age of the World, and after fuch time as the rule of Eldership failed; three severall forts of Government were in feverall times established among men, according to the divers natures of Places and People.

Mankinde.

The first, the most ancient, most generall, and most approved, was the Government of one, ruling by just Lawes, called Monarchy: to which Tyranny is opposed, being also a fole and absolute Rule, exercised according to the will of the Commander, without reipector observation of the Lawes of God, or Men. For a lawfull Prince or Magistrate (faith Ariffotle) is the Keeper of Right and Equity and of this condition ought every Magistrate to be, according to the rule of Gods word: Judges and Officers shalt thou make Deuts 5.2 thee inthy Cities: And these shall judge the people with right eous judgement.

The second Government is of divers principall Persons established by order, and ruling by Lawes, called Aristocracy, or Optimatum potestas; to which Oligarchia (or the particular faction and ulurpation of a few great-ones) is opposed; as the Desem viri, or Trium viri, and the like.

Now as touching the beginning and order of policy fince the fecond increase of Mankinde, the same grew in this sort: First of all, every Father, or eldest of the Family, gave Lawes to his owneissues, and to the people from him and them increased. These, as they were multiplied into many Housholds (man by nature loving society) joyned their Cottages together in one common Field or Village, which the Latins call Vicus; of the Greeke which the singuistic hath divers waies and paths leading to it. And as the first House grew into a Village, so the Village into that which is called Pagus, (being a society of divers Villages) so called of the Greeke why, which significe ha Fountaine: because many people (having their habitations not far as funder) dranke of one Spring or Streame of water. To this word the English Hundreds, or (as some thinke) Shires, answereth not unsity.

But as men and impiety began to gather strength, and as emulation and pride between the Races of the one and the other daily increased fo both to defend themselves from out-rage, and to preferve fuch goods as they had gathered, they began to joyne and fet together divers of their Villages, invironing them first with bankes and ditches, and afterwards with wals: which being fo compaffed were then called Oppida; either ab opponendo se hostibus, Because wals were opposed against Enemies; or ab opibus, because thither they gathered their riches for safety and defence : as also they were called Urbes, ab orbe because when they were to build a City, they made a Circle with a Plough (saith Varn) therewith measuring and compassing the ground which they went to inclose or fortific. And although #rbs and Civitas be often confounded, yet the difference was anciently in this, that urbs fignified no other than the very wals & buildings, and Civitas was taken for the Citizens, inhabiting therein: fo called of Civis, and that, ab eo quod multitudo coivis, of comming together. But all inhabitants within these wals are not properly Citizens, but onely fuch as are called Free-men: who bearing proportionably the charge of the City, may by turnes become Officers and Magistrates thereof: the rest goe under the named Subjects, though Citizens by the same generall name of Subjects are also knowne. For every Citizen is also a Subject, but not every Subject a Citizen: perhaps also some Citizen (as the chiefe Magistrate, if he be to be termed one of the Citizens) is no Subject; but of this we neede not stand to inquire. The word (Magistrate) is taken à Magistro, from a Master, and the word (Master) from the Adverbe Magis (as also Magisteria, Precept of Art) or else from the Greeke word (Megistes:) and so the Greekes call them Megistants whom the Latines call Magnates, or Magistratus.

The office and duty of every Magistrate Aristotle hath written in few words. A Magistrate or Prince (saith he) is the keeper of right and equity, but the same is best taught by so Saint Paul, who expressed both the cause efficient, and finall, (that is) by whom Magistrates and Princes are ordained, together with their duties and office. A Magistrate is the Minister of Godfor thy wealth; but if thou doe evill, seare: for he beareth not the sword for nought. For he is the Minister of God, to take vengeance on him that doth evill. He also teacheth in the same place; That every soile ought to be subject to the higher powers, because they are by God ordained, and that whosever resisteth that power, resisteth God, the giver and fountaine thereof: and shall not onely be therefore subject to the judgement and condensation of Man, but of God: For ye must be subject (saith he) not because of wrath onely, but also for conscience sake.

The examples are not to be numbred of Gods punishments upon those that have resigned Authority, by God ordained and established. Neither ought any Subject therefore to resist the power of Kings, because they may be taxed with injustice or cruelty: for it pleaseth God sometimes to punish his people by a tyrannous hand: and the Commandement of obedience is without distinction. The Prophets and Christ himselfe subjected themselves to the power of Magistracy. Christ commanded that all due to Casar should be given unto him: and he payed Tribute for himselfe and Peter. Hieremy commanded the Israelites (even those that were Captives under Heathen Kings) to pray for them and for the peace of Babylon. So Abraham prayed for Abimelech, and Jacob blessed the King of Egypt: Andit is acceptable in the fight of our Saviour (faith Paul) that yee make Supplicate nons and Prayers for Kings, and for all that are in authority: and if for fuch Kings as were Idolatrous, much more for Christian Kings and Magistrates. And so much did Saint Chrylostome in his Homily to the people preferre Monarchicall Gouernment, as he rather commended the rule of Kings (though Tyrants) than that they should be wanting: Prestat Regem tyrannum habere quam nullum; Better a tyrannous King, than no King: to which also Tacitus subscribeth: Prastat (faith Tacitus in the first of his History) sub malo principe este quam nullo ; It is better to have abad Prince than none at all. And be they good Kings (which is generally prefupposed) then is there no liberty more fafe, than to serve them: Neg enim libertas tutior ulla est (faith Claudian) quam Domino servire bono: No liberta faith he) more (afe for us than to be servants to the vertuous. And certainely how foever in may be disputed, yet is it safer to live under one Tyrant, than under 100000. Tyrants: under a wife man that is cruell, than under the foolish and barbarous cruelty of the multitude. For as Azefilaus answered as Citizen of Sparta that defired an alteration of the Government. That kinde of rule which a man would disdaine in his owne house, were very unfit to governe great Regions by.

Lastly, as many Fathers erected many Cottages for their many children: and as (for the reason before remembred) many Housholds joyned themselves together, and made Villages; many Villages made Cities: so when these Cities and Citizens joyned together, andestablished Lawes by consent, affociating themselves under one Governour, and Government; they so joyned, were called a Commonwealth: the same being sometimes governed by Kings; sometimes by Magistrates; sometimes by the people themselves.

of the good Government of the first Kings.

Ow this first Age after the Floud, and after such time as the people were increased and the Families became strong and dispersed into severall parts of the World, was by ancient Historians called Golden: Ambition and Coverousnesse being as then but greene, and newly growne up, the seeds and effects whereof were as yet but potentiall, and in the blowth and bud. For while the Law of Nature was the rule of mans life, they then sought for no larger Territory than themselves could compasse and manure: they erected no other magnificent buildings, than sufficient to defend them from cold and tempess: they cared for no other delicacy of fare, or curiosity of dyet, than to maintaine life: nor for any other apparrell, than to cover them from the cold, the Raine and the Sunne.

And fure if we understand by that Age (which was called Golden) the ancient simplicity of our Fore-fathers, this name may then truly be cast upon those elder times: but if it be taken otherwise, then, whether the same may be attributed more to any one time than to another, (I meane to one limited time and none else) it may be doubted. For good and Golden Kings make good and Golden Ages: and all times have brought forth of both forts. And as the infancy of Empirie, (when Princes plaied their Prizes, and did then only woo men to obedience) might be called the Golden Age: so may the beginning of all Princes times be truely called Golden. For be it that men affect honour. it is then best purchased; or if honour affect men, it is then that good deservings have commonly the least impediments: and if ever Liberality overflow her banks and bounds; the fame is then best warranted both by policy and example. But Age and Time doe not onely harden and shrinke the openest and most Jovial hearts, but the experience which it bringeth with it, layeth Princes torne estates before their eyes, and (withall) perswadeth them to compassionate themselves. And although there be no Kings under the Sunne whose meanes are answerable unto other mens desires; yet such as value all things by their owne respects, doe no sooner finde their appetites unanswered, but they complaine of alteration, and account the times injurious and yron. And as this falleth out in the Reigne of every King, so doth it in the life of every man, if his dayes be many: for our younger yeares are our Golden Age; which being eaten up by time, we praise those seasons which our youth accompained; and (indeed) the greivous alterations in our felves, and the paines and diseases which never part from us but at the grave make the times feeme so differing and displeasing : especially the quality of mans nature being also such as it adoreth and extolleth the passages of the former, and condemnets the present state how just soever: Fit humana malignitatis vitio, ut semper netera in lande, prasentia in fastidio sint; It comes to passe (saith Tacitus) by the vice of our malignity, that we alwayes extell the time past, and hold a he present fastidious: For it is one of the errours of wayward Age: Quod fint laudatores temporis acti That they are praisers of fore-passed times, forgetting this advice of Salomon: Say not then, Why is it that the former dayes were better then these? for thou doest not inquire wisely of this thing: to which purpose Seneca; Majores nostri questi sunt, & nos querimur posteri querentur, eversos, esse mores, regnare nequitiam in deterius res hominum & in omne nefas labi : Our Ancesters have complained, we to doe complaine our children will complaine, that good manners are gone, that wickednesse doth reigne, and all things grow worse and worse, and fall into allevill. These are usuall the discourses of Age and M isfortune. But hereof what can we adde to this of Arnobius? Nova res quandoq; vetus fiet, & vetus temporibus : quibus capit nova fuit & repentina : What soever is new intime shall be made old: and the ancientest things when they tooke beginning were also new and sodaine. Wherefore not to stand in much admiration of these first times, which the discontenument of present times have made Golden, this we may set downe for certaine, That as it was the vertue of the first Kings, which (after God) gave them Crowns: so the love of their people thereby purchased, held the same Crownes on their heads. And as God gave the obedience of Subjects to Princes: fo (relatively) he gave the care is and justice of Kings to the Subjects; having respect, not onely to the Kings themselves, but even to the meanest of his Creatures : Nunquam particulari bono servit omne bonum; The infinite goodnesse of God doth not attend any one onely: for he that made the small and great, careth for all alike: and it is the care which Kings have of all theirs, which makes them beloved of all theirs; and by a generall love it is, that Princes hold a generall obedience: For, Potestas humana radicatur in voluntatibus hominum: All humane power is rooted in the willor dispositions of men.

6. IV. Of the beginning of Nobility: and of the vaine vaunt thereof without vertue.

Nd with this Supreme Rule and Kingly authority began also other degrees and differences among Subjects. For Princes made election of others by the same Rule, by which themselves were chosen; unto whom they gave place, trust, and power. From which imployments and Offices sprung those Titles, and those de grees of Honour, which have continued from Age to Age to these dayes. But this Nobility, or difference from the Vulgar, was not in the beginning given to the Succession of Bloud, butto Succession of Vertue, as hereafter may be proved. Though at lengthin was fufficient for those whose Parents were advanced, to be knowne for the Sonnes of fuch Fathers: and so there needed then no endevour of well-doing at all, or any contention for them to excell, upon whom glory or worldly Nobility necessarily descended. Yet hereof had Nobility denomination in the beginning, That fuch as excelled o thers in vertue, were so called : Hinc dictus Nobilis, quasi virtute pra aliis notabilis. But after fuch time as the deserved Honour of the Father was given in reward to his Posterty, Saint Hierome judged of the Succession in this manner: Nibil alind video in Nobilitate appetendum, nisi quod Nobiles quadam necessitate constringantur, ne ab antiquorum probitate degenerent; I see no other thing to be affected in Nobility, t han that Noblemen art by a kinde of necessity bound, not to degenerate from the vertue of their Ancestors For if Nobility be Virtus & antique divitie; Vertue and ancient riches, then to exceed in all those things which are extra hominem, as riches, power, glory, and the like, doe no otherwise define Nobility, than the word (animal) alone doth define a reasonableman. Orifhonour (according to L. Pives) bee a witnesse of vertue and well-doing and Nobility (after Plutarch) the continuance of vertue in a Race or Linage: then are tholein whom Vertue is extinguished, but like unto painted and printed Papers, which ignorant men worship instead of Christ, our Lady, and other Saints :men in whom there remaine but the dregs and vices of ancient Vertue: Flowers, and Herbes, which by change of foile and want of manuring are turned to Weedes. For what is found praife-worthy in those waters, which had their beginning out of pure Fountaines, if in all the rest of their course they run foule, filthy, and defiled? Exterra fertili producitur aliquando Cicuta venenosa, er ex terra sterili pretiosum aurum; Out of fruitfull ground Pimin Excel ariseth sometimes poysoning Henbane, and out of barren soyle precious Gold. For as all things confift of matter and forme, fo doth Charron (in his Chapter of Nobilitie) call the Race and Linage but the matter of Nobilitie: the forme (which gives life and perfect being) he maketh to be Vertue, and Qualitie, profitable to the common-weale. For he is truely and entirely Noble, who maketh a fingular profession of publike Vertue, serving his Prince and Countrie, and being descended of Parents and Ancestors that have done the like. And although that Nobilitie, which the fame, Authour calleth perfonall, (the fame which our felves acquire by our Vertue and well defervings) cannot be ballanced with that which is both naturall by Descent, and also personall; yet if Vertue be wanting to the naturall, then is the personall and acquired Nobilitie by many degrees to be preferred: For (faith Charron) this Honour (to wit) by Descent, may light upon first aone, as in his owne nature is a true Villaine. There is also a third Nobilitie which he calleth Nobilitie in Parchment, bought with Silver or Favour: and these be indeed but Honours of affection, which Kings with the change of their fancies wish they knew wel how to wipe offagaine. But furely if we had as much fense of our degenerating in worthimeffe, as we have of vanitie in deriving our felves of fuch and fuch Parents, we should rather know fuch Nobilitie (without Vertue) to be shame and dishonour, than Noblenesse land glory to vaunt thereof. What calamitie is wanting (faith Bernard) to him that is borne Bernar Land. in since, of a Potshare body and barren minde? for (according to the same Father) Dele considerad fucum fuzacis honoris hujus, & male coronat anitorem gloria, & c. Wipe away the painting of this fleeting honour, and the glittering of the ill-crowned glory, that then thou maiest consider by selfe nakedly: for thou camest naked out of thy Mothers wombe. Camest thou thence with thy Mytre, or glistering with Jewels, or garnished with Silkes, or adorned with Feathers or Suffed with Gold? If thou scatter and blow away all these by thy consideration as certain morming clouds, which doe or will soone passe over, thou shalt meet with a naked, and poore, and pretched and miserable man, and blushing, because he is naked, and weeping because he is borne, andrepining because he is borne to labour, and not to honour.

For as touching the matter of all men, there is no difference betweene it and dust: which if thou dost not believe (faith S. Chrysostome) looke into the Sepulchres of Monu- Chrysoma. i. ments of thy Ancestors, and they shall easily personade thee by their owne example, that thou art deinomposita dul and dirt: fo that if man seem more Noble and beautifull than dust this proceedeth not from whe diversitie of his Nature but from the cunning of his Creatour.

For true Nobilitie standeth in the Trade Of vertuous life: not in the fleshly Line: For bloud is brute, but Gentry is Divine.

And how foever the custome of the World have made it good, that Honours be cast by birth upon unworthy Issues: yet Solomon (as wife as any King) reprehendeth the same in his Felllow-Princes: There is an evill (fairh he) that I have feene under the Sun, as an er- Eccles Co rour that proceedeth from the face of him that ruleth: Folly is let in great excellencie.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus: and of memorable things about those times.

That Nimrod was the first after the Floud that reigned like a Soveraigne Lord; and that his beginning seemeth to have beene of just authoritie.

He first of all that reigned as Soveraigne Lord after the Floud was Nimrod, the Sonne of Chush, distinguished by Moses from the rest (according to Saint Augustine) in one of these two respects: either for his eminencie, and because hee was the first of same, and that tooke on him to command others: or else in that hee was begotten by Chush, after his other children were also become Fathers; and of a later time than fome of his Grand-children and Nephewes-Howfoever, seeing Moses in expresse words 10me 01 nis Grand-Child, other mens conjectures to the contrary ought to have calleth Nimrod the Sonne of Chulh, other mens conjectures to the contrary ought to have

This Empirie of Nimrod, both the Fathers and many later Writers call tyrannical: no respect. the fame beginning in Babel, (which is) confusion. But it seemeth to me that Me. lanchton conceived not amisse hereof: the same exposition being also made by the Author of that worke called Onomasticum Theologicum, who affirmes that Nimrod was therefore called Amarus Dominator, Abitter or severe Governour, because his formeof rule seemed at first farre more terrible than Paternall authority. And therefore is he into this respect also called a mightie Hunter: because he tooke and destroyed both Beasts & Theeves. But Saint Augustine understands it otherwise, and converts the word (ante) by (contra) affirming therein, that Nimrod was a mightie Hunter against God: Sie ergo incl. ligendus est Gigas ille, Venator contra Dominum; So is that Giant to be understood, a Hunter against the Lord.

But how soever this word (a mightie Hunter) be understood; yet it rather appearant that as Nimrod had the command of all those, which went with him from the East into Shinaar: fo, this charge was rather given him, than by him usurped. For it no whereis found, that Noah himselfe, or any of the Sonnes of his owne body came with this troup into Babylon: no mention at all being made of Noah (the yeeres of his life excepted) inthe fucceeding Story of the Hebrewes; nor that Sem was in this disobedient troup or among

The fame is also confirmed by divers ancient Historians, that Nimrod, Suphne, and Ji. Etan were the Captaines and Leaders of all those which came from the East. And though Sem came not himselfe so farre West as Shinaar (his lot being cast on the East parts)ye from his Sonnes Nephew Heber, the name and Nation of the Hebrewes (according to the generall opinion)tooke beginning, who inhabited the Southermost parts of Chalden,a bout the Citic of "r; from whence Abraham was by God called into Charran, and thence

And because those of the Race of Sem which came into Chaldea, were no partners in the unbeleeving workeof the Tower: therefore (as many of the Fathers conjecture) did they retaine the first and most ancient language, which the Fathers of the first Age had left to Noah; and Noah to Sem and his Islues: In familia Heber remansit hee lingui; In the Family of Heber this Language remained (faith Saint Augustine out of Epiphanius) and this Language Abraham used; yea, it was anciently and before the Floud the generall speech: and therefore first called (faith Calestinus) lingua bumana: the human tongue.

We know that Goropius Becanus following Theodoret, Rabbi Moses, Agyptius, Vergan, and others is of another opinion; but how foever we determine of this point, we may with good probability resolve, that none of the godly feed of Sem were the chiefe Land ders of this presumptuous multitude. And seeing it is not likely but that some one wa by order appointed for this charge, we may imagine that Nimrod rather had it by july authorities than violence of usurpation.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Nimus were three distinct persons.

DEngo, and out of him Nauclerm, with others, make many Nimrods, Eufebius confounds him with Belw, and fo doth Saint Hierome upon Ofe; and these words of S. Augustine seeme to make him of the same opinion: Ibi autem Ninus regnabat post mortem patris sui Beli, qui primus illic regnaverat 65. annos. There did Ninus reigne af ter the death of his Father Belus, who first governed in Babylon sixtie five yeeres. But it could not be unknowne to Saint Augustine, that Nimrod was the establisher of that Empire: Moses being plaine and direct therein. For the beginning of Nimrods Kingdome (faith he) was Babel, Erec, Accad, and Chaine, in the Land of Shinaar; wherefore Nimrod was the first King of Babel. And certainly it best agreeth with reason, that Ninus was the third, and not one with Nimrod, as Mercator (led by Clement) supposed: for in Nimus time the World was marvelloufly replenished. And if S. Augustine had undoubtedly taken Belus for Nimrod, he would have given him the name which the Scriptures give him, rather than have borrowed any thing out of prophane Authors. And for those words of S. Augustime (qui primus illic regnaverat; Who was the first that reigned there) supposed to be meant by Belus: those words doe not disprove that Nimrod was the Founder of the Babylonian Empire. For although Julius Cafar overthrew the liberty of the Romane commonwealth, making himselfe perpetuall Dictator, yet Augustus was the first established Emperor: and the first that reigned absolutely by soveraigne authority over the Romans, as an Emperour.

The like may be faid of Nimrod, that he first brake the rule of Eldership and Paternity laying the foundation of foveraigne Rule, as Cafar did; and yet Belus was the first, who peaceably, and with a generall allowance exercised such a power. Pererius is of opinion, that Belus and Nimrod were the same, because many things are said of them both agreeing in time: for it was about 200. yeeres after the floud (as they account) that Belus reigned; but fuch agreement of times proves it not. For fo Edward the third, and his grand-child Richard the fecond, were kings both in one yeere: the one dyed; the other in the fame yeere was crowned King.

And yet the opinion (that Nimrod and Belus were one) is far more probable than that of Mercator; who makes Ninus and Nimrod to be the same. For it is plaine that the beginning of Namrods Kingdom was Babel, and the Towns adjoyning but the first and most famous worke of Ninus was the City of Nineves

Now whereas D. Siculus affirmeth, that Ninus overcame and suppress the Babylonians, the same rather proveth the contrarie, than that Ninus and Ninus d were one person. For Ninus established the seate of his Empire at Nineve in Asyria, whence the Babylomians might (perchance) in disdaine thereof fall from his obedience, whom hee recovered againe by ftrong hand; which was case: Babylon being not walled till Semira-

Semiramis with wals of bricke the Citie did inclose.

Further, where it is alledged, that as the Scriptures call Nimred mightie: so Justine hath the same of Ninus, which is one of Mercators arguments; It may be answered, that such an addition might have beene given to many other Kings aswell. For if wee may beleeve fustine; then were Vexoris King of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia, mighty Kings before Ninus was borne. And if we may compare the words of Moses (touching Nimrod) with the undertakings of Ninus, there will be found great difference betweene

For whereas Mercator conceiveth, that it was too early for any that lived about the time of the confusion of languages, to have invaded and mastered those Cities so far removed from Babel, namely, Erec, Accad, and Chalne: which worke he therefore ascribeth to Nimus, as a man of the greatest undertaking; and consequently would have Nimrod to have beenelong after the time, in which we suppose he flourished; and both those names of Nimred and Nimus to belong to one person, to wit, to Ninus: to these things to make some answer. First, I doe not find that supposition true, That ever Nimrod invaded any of these Cities; but that he founded them and built them from the ground, being the first after the floud, that conducted the children of Noah into those parts: and therefore had nothing built or crected to his hands.

Befides, whereas these Cities in many mens opinions are found to stand far away from Babylon, I finde no reason to bring me to that beleefe. The Citie of Accad, which the September 1 tuagint cals Archard; & Epiphanius, Arphal; Junius takes it to be Nisibis in Mesopotamia: for the Region thereabout the Cosmographers (faith he) call Accadent for Assadene. Others understand Nisibis and Nineve to be one City: fo doe Strabo and Stephanus confound it with Charran, but all mistaken. For Nisibis, Accad, and Charran are distinct places. Though I cannot deny Accedene to be a Region of Mesopotamia, the same which Arias Montanus out of S. Hierome calls Achad: and io doe the Hebrewes also call Nishbis, which seemeth to be the cause of this mistaking. As for the City of Erec, which the Septuagent call Orech; S. Augustine Oreg, and Pagninus, Erec, this place Junius understands for Aracca in Sustana: but there is also a City in Camagena called Arace: and indeed likelihood of name is no certaine proofe, without the affiltance of other circumstances.

Concerning the third City (called Chalneh) forme take it for Calinifis: of which Am, Marcellinus. S. Hierome takes it for Selencia; Hierofolymitanus for Ctefiphon: others does thinke it to be the Agram upon Euphrates, destroyed and razed by the Persians. But let Moses be the Moderator and Judge of this dispute, who teacheth us directly, that these Cities are not feated in so divers and distant Regions; for these be his words: And the beginning of his Kingdome (speaking of Nimrod) was Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalnehinth Land of Shinaar: fo as in the Valley of Shinaar, or Babylonia, or Chaldea (being all one) we must finde them. And therefore I could (rather of the two) thinke with Viterbiens, that these foure made but one Babylon, than that they were Cities farre removed, and feverall provinces, did northe Prophet Amos precifely distinguish Chalne from Bah. lon. Goeyou (faith Amos) to Chaine, and from thence goe you to Hamath, and then to Gathe the Philistims. The Geneva translation favouring the former opinion, to set these Cities out of Shinaar, hath a marginall note expressing that Shinaar was here named, not that all these Cities were therein seated, but to distinguish Babylon of Chalde, from Babylon in E. gypt: but I find little substance in that conceit. For sure I am, that in the beginning of Nim. rods Empire there was no fuch Babylon, nor any City at all to be found in Egypt. Babylon of Egypt being all one with the great City of Cairo, which was built long after, not fare from the place where stood Memphis the ancient City, but not so ancient as Babylon upon Euphrates. Now that Chaine is fituate in the Valley of Shinaar, it hath been formerly proved in the Chapter of Paradife. So as for any argument that may be brought to the contrary, from the remote fituation of these three Cities from Babylon, we may continue in our opinion, That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were distinct and successive Kings.

6. III.

That Nimrod, not Affur, built Nineve: and that it is probable out of Efay 23.13. that Affin built Ur of the Chaldees.

TOw as of Nimrod: fo are the opinions of Writers different touching Affar, and touching the beginning of that great state of Babylon and Assyria: a controverfie wearisomely disputed without any direct proofe, conclusion, or certainty But to me (of whom, where the Scriprures are filent, the voyce of Reason hath the belt hearing) the interpretation of Junius is most agreeable; who besides all necessary consequence doth not dis-joyne the sense of the Scriptures therein, nor confuse the under Randing thereof. For in this fort he converteth the Hebrew Text: Erat enim principium regni ejus Babel, & Erech, & Accad, & Chalneb, interra Shinaaris: èterra has processit in Assyriam, ubi adificavit Nineven; (which is) For the beginning of his Kingdome was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Chalneb, in the land of Shinaar: and hee with forth of this land into Affyria, and built Nineve. So as Junius takes Affur in this place, not for any person, but for the Region of Asyria: the land being so called in Moses time, and before it. For certainly, theother construction, (where the word Affar is taken for Affar the sonne of Sem) doth not answer the order which Moses observeth through a the Bookes of Genesis, but is quite contrary unto it. For in the beginning of the tenth Chapter he setteth downe the sonnes of Noah, in these words: Now these are the Generations of the Sonnes of Noah : Sem , Ham , and Japheth, unto whom sonnes wert borne after the floud: then it followeth immediately: The sonnes of Japheth wet Gomer, &c. fo as Japheth is last named among Neahs sonnes, be he eldest or your gest: because he was first to be spoken of: with whom (having last named him) he proceedes and fets downe his iffue, and then the iffue of his fonnes: first, the iffue of Gomer, Japhets eldest sonne; and then speakes of Javan and his sonnes: for of the rest of that Familie he is filent. Anon after he numbreth the sonnes of Ham, of which Chush was the eldest: and then the sons of Chush and Mizraim; and afterward of Cantan; leaving Shem for the last, because he would not dis-joyne the Storie of the Hebrewes. But after he beginneth with Sem, he continueth from thence by Arphaxad, Shela, and Heber, unto Abraham, and so to Jacob, and the Fathers of that Nation. But to have brought in one of the fonnes of Shem in the middle of the generations of Ham, had been eagainst order; neither would Moses have past over so sleightly the erection of the Assiran Empire, in one of the sonnes of Shem, if he had had any such meaning: it being the storie of Shems sonnes which he most attended. For he nameth Nimrod apart, after the rest of the sonnes of Chulb, because he founded the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire: and in the eleventh Chapter he returnes to speak of the building of Babel in particular, having formerly named it in the tenth Chapter, with those other Cities which Namrod founded in shinaar. And as he did in the tenth Chapter, fo also in the eleventh hee maketh no report of Shem, till fuch time as he had finished so much of Nimrod as he meant to touch : and then he beginneth with the iffue of Shem, which he continue th to Abraham and Ifrael. And of Junius opinion touching Affar, was Calvin: to which I conceive that P. Comelor, in historia Scholastica, gave an entrance, who after he had delivered this place in fome other fenfe, he useth these words : Vel intelligendum non est de Assur filio Sem, &c. led Affurtid est, Regnum Asyriorum) inde egressum est, quod tempore Sarug proavi Abraha mi factum eft; (which is) Or elseit is not to be understood of Affur the sonne of Sem, &c. but Affur (that is, the Kingdome of the Affgrians) came from thence (videlicet from Babylon) orwasmade out of it : which happened in the time of Sarug the great grand-father of Abraham. After which he reconcileth the difference in this fort: If you take the ancient Belas (meaning Nimrod) to be the first Erecter of the Assirian Empire, or the first Founder thereof, it is true, Quantum ad initium; Respecting the beginning; but others conceive that it had beginning from Ninus, which is also true, Quantum ad regni ampliationem; Regarding the enlargement of the Empire. To this I may adde the opinion of Epiphanius, confirmed by Gedrenus, who takes Affur to be the fonne of Nimrod: and fo doe doth Methodius, and Viterbienfis, Saint Hierome; and Cyrillus, and now laftly Torniellus: Torniel Annal, who (faith he) took eupon him that name of Affar after he had beaten the Astrians, as far in Gen. 15. Scipio did of Africanus, after his conquest in Africa: and that Assur was a common name to the Kings of Asspria, as it appeareth by many Scriptures, as Psalme 81. Efay 10.065. &c. but to helpe the matter, he makes Nimrod of the race of Shem and the sonne of Irari. But Rabanus Maurus, who was Arch-bishop of Ment in the yeere of Christ 854. an ancient and learned Writer, understands this place with Commelor, or Commestor with him, agreeing in substance with that translation of Junius : to which words of Mofes he giveth this fense: De bacterra Affriorum pullulavit imperium, qui ex nomine Nini, Beli filii, Ninum condiderunt, urbem magnam, &c. Out of this land grew the Empire of the Assyrians, who built Ninus the great Citie, so named of Ninus the Janne of Belus. On the contrarie Calvin objecteth this place of Efay: Behold the land of the Chaldaans, this was no people, Affur founded it by the inhabitants of the Wilderne se; than which there is no one place in the Scriptures, that hath a greater diversitie in the translation and understanding infomuch as Michael de Palatio upon Esay (though in all else very diligent) passeth it over. But Calvin seemeth hereby to inferre, that because Assure founded the state of the Caldaans, therfore also Assur rather than Nimrod established the Affirian Empire, and built Nineve: contrary to the former translation of Funius, and to his owne opinion. Now out of the Vulgar (called Hieromes translation) it may be gathered that Affar both founded and ruined this Estate or City of the Chaldeans, by Esay remembred: unto which Citie, People, or State, he plainly telleth the Tyrians that they cannot trust, or hope for reliefe thence. Or rather it may be taken, that the Prophet maketh this Citie of Chaldaa, and that Estate, an example unto those Phanicians, whom in this place he fore-telleth of their ruine: which Citie of Chaldea being of strength, and carefully defended, was (not with standing) by the Affirians utterly wasted and destroyed: whereby he giveth them knowledge, and foretelleth them, t hat their owne Citie of Tyre (invincible, as themselves thought) should also soone after be over-turned by the same Asfirians: as (indeed) it was by Nabuchodonofor. And these be the words after Hierome: Ecce terra Chaldeorum, talis popolus non fuit, Assur fundavit eam, in captivitatem traduxorunt robuftos ejus, suffoderunt domos ejus, posuerunt camin ruinam, (which is) Behold

Behold the land of the Chaldeans, such a people there were not (or, this was no people, after the Geneva) Assur(or the Assyrians) founded it, they carryed away their strong men captive, they undermined their houses, and ruined their Citie. The Septuagint expresse it but in a part of another Verse, in these words: Et interra Chaldasrum, & hac desolata est ab Assyriis, quoniam murus ejus corruit, making the sense perfect by the preceding Verse, which all together may be thus understood: If thou goe over to Chittim (which is Macedon or Greece) yet thou shalt not rest (speaking to the Tyrians) neither in the Land of the Chaldaans , for this is made desolate by the Assirians because their wals fell together to the ground. Pagni. nus and Vatablus convertit thus: Ecce terra Chasdiim, iste populus non erat illic olim; nam Affur fundavit cam navibus erexerunt arces illius contriverunt edes ejus posuit cam in rui. 19 nam: which may be thus Englished: Behold the Land of the Chaldeans, this people was not once therein inhabiting : for Affur built it a harbour for ships, they erected the Towers theref. and againe brake downe the houses thereof, and ruinated it. Junius in the place of ships fers the word (pro Barbaris) that is, for the Barbarians : and the Geneva, by the Barbarians. But this is undoubted that the Prophet Efar (as may be gathered by all the fense of the Chap. ter) did therein affure the Trians of their future destruction, which (accordingly) fellon them: wherein (for the more terrour) he maketh choice to note the calamities of those Places, Cities, and Regions, by whose Trade the state and greatnesse of the Tyrians was maintained; as by the Cilicians from Tharfis; from the Macedonians, and other Grecians under the name of Cittim; also by the Egyptians, the Chaldaans, and the rest. For Tyren was then the Mart Towne of the World most renowned. And (as it appeares in our difcourse of Paradise) not the least part of her chiefe merchandize came in by the Citie Ur or Urchoa in Cheldea, where the body or chiefe streame of Euphrates (even that stream which runneth through Babylon and Otris, which now falleth into Tygris) had his paffage into the Persian Gulfe: though now it be stopped up. For (as we have heretofore noted) the Arabians (that descended from Sheba and Raamah) dwelling on the east bankes of the Perfian Gulfe, trading with the Tyrians (as those of Eden, Charran, and Chalne did) transported their merchandize by the mouth of Tygris, that is, from Teredon; & of Euphrates, that is, from "r or "rchoa: and then by Babylon, and thence by River and over Land they conveyed it into Syria, and fo to Tyre: as they doe this day to Aleppo. So then Ur of the 3 Chaldees was a Port Towne, and one of those Cities which had Intelligence, Trade, and Exchange with the Tyrians: for it stood by the great Lakes of Chaldea, through which that part of Euphrates ran, which passage is now stopt up. Ejus cursum vetustas abolevit (faith Niger.) And Plinie: Locus ubi Euphratis oftium fuit, flumen salsum; Time hath worm away the Channell of Euphrates: the place where the month thereof was, is a Bay of falt water. These things being thus, certainly (not without good probabilitie) we may expound the Citie of the Chaldees, whose calamities Esay here notethfor terror of the Tyrians, to be the Citie anciently called ur; and (by Hecataus) Camerina; by Ptolomie, urchoa: and by the Greeks, Chaldeopolis, The Citie of Chaldea: which the fonnes of Shem, untill Abrahums time inhabited. And whereas in all the Translations it is said, that Assur both four po ded it and ruined it: it may be understood, that Affar the Founder was the sonne of Shem; and Assur the destroyers were the Assyrians, by whom those that inhabited #r of Chaldaa, were at length oppressed and brought to ruine: which thing God fore feeing, commanded Abraham thence to Carran, and fo into Canaan. And if the Head brew word by Vatablus and Pagninus converted (by ships) doe beare that sense, the same may be the better approved; because it was a Port Towne: and the River so farreup as this Citie of ur was in ancient time navigable, as both by Plinie and Niger appearance reth. And if the word (for the Barbarians) or (by the Barbarians) be also in the Hebrew Text, it is no lesse manifest, that the most barbarous Arabians of the Desart were and are the confronting, and next people of all other unto it. For Chaldea is now cal-so led Arachaldar, which fignifieth defart Lands, because it joyneth to that part of Arabia so called: and Cicero (calling those Arabians by the name of Itureans) addeth, that they are of all other people the most salvage; calling them, Homines omnium maxime

So as this place of Esay, which breedeth some doubt in Calvin, proveth in nothing the contrarie opinion, nor in any part weakeneth the former translation of Junius, nor the interpretation of Comestor and Rabanus. For though other men have not conceived (for any thing that I have read) that Affer is in this place diverfly taken (as for the fonne of Sem, when he is spoken of as a Builder of ur_5 and when as a Destroyer thereof, then for the Asyrian Nation) yet certainely the evidence of the truth, and agreement of circumstances seeme to enforce it. And so this Founding of the Citie of the Chalders by Asur (into which the most of the posterity of Sem that came into Shinaar, and were separate for the Idolatrie of the Chustes and Nimrodians, retired themselves) hath nothing an it to prove that the same Assur built Nineve, or that the same Assur was all one with Ninus; except we will make Affur, who was the sonne of shem, both an Idolater, and the sonne of Belus. For (out of doubt) Nimus was the first notorious sacrificer to Idols: and the first that set up a Statue or Image to be honoured as God. Now if Assar must be fo of that Race, and not of the Familie of Sem, as he must be if he founded Nineve, then all those which seeke to give him the honour thereof, doe him by a thousand parts more injurie, by taking from him his true Parent and Religion.

Besides, if this supposed Assur whom they make the Founder of Nineve (and so the Sonne of Belus) were any other, and not the same with Ninus; then what became of him -Certainely he was very unworthy and obscure, and not like to be the Founder of such an Empire and fuch a Citie, if no man have vouchfafed to leave to posterity his expulsion thence, and how he lost that Empire againe, or quitted it to Ninus: whose acts and conquests are so largely written, and (according to my apprehension) farre differing from truth. It will therefore be found best agreeing to Scripture and to Reason, and best agreeing with the story of that age written by prophane Authors, that Nimrod founded Babel, Erech, and Accad, and Chalne, the first workes and beginnings of his Empire, according to Moles: and that these workes being finished within the Valley of Shinaar, he looked further abroad, and fet in hand the worke of Ninus, lying neere unto the fame streame that Babel and Chalne did: which work his grand-child Nines afterward amplified and finished. as Semiramis (this Ninus his wife) did Babylon. Hence it came to passe, that as Semiramis was counted the Foundresse of the Citie which she onely finished: so also Ninus of Nineve: Quam quidem Babylonem potuit instaurare, She might repair e or renew Babylon, faith S. Augustine. For fo did Nabuchodonofor vaunt himselfe to be the Founder of Babylon alfo. because he built up againe some part of the wall, over-borne by the furie of the River:

which worke of his stood till Alexanders time, whereupon he vaunted thus: Is not this Danas ? great Babel which I have built?

of the Acts of Nimrod and Belus, as farre as now they are knowne.

Ut to returne to the Storie, it is plaine in Moses, that Nimrod (whom Philo interprete transfugium, and Julius Africanus surnamed Saturne) was the establisher of the Babylonian Monarchie, of whom there is no other thing written, than that his Empire in the beginning confifted of those 4. Cities before remembred; Babel, Erech; Accad, and Chalne: and that from hence he propagated his Empire into Affyria; and in Affyria built foure more Cities (to wit) Nineve, Rehoboth, Celah, and Refen. And feeing that he spent much time in building Babel it selfe and those adjoyning, and that his travailes were many ere he came into Shinaar: that worke of Babel (fuch as it was) with the other three Cities, and the large foundation of Nineve, and the other Cities of Affyria which he builded (confidered with the want of materials, and with other impediments) were of greater difficulty than any thing performed by his Successors in many years after: to whose undertakings time had given so great an increase of people; and the examples and patternes of his beginning so great an advancement and encouragement: in whose time (faith Glycas) all these Nations were called Meropes, à sermonis linguarum terraq; divisione; By reason that the earth and the speech were then divided.

Belus, or Bel, or Jupiter Belus, succeeded Nimrod, after he had reigned 114 yeares; of whose acts and undertakings there is little written. For it is thought that, he spent much of his time in dif-burdening the low Lands of Babylon, and drying and making firme ground of all those great Fens and over-slowne Marishes which adjoyned unto it. For any of his Warres or conquests there is no report, other than of his begun enterprise against Sabatius King of Armenia, and those parts of Scothia which Berosus calls Scothia Saga, whose some and successor Barzanes became subject and Tributarie to Ninne, that followed the warre to effect, which was by his Father Belm begun-

That we are not to marvell how so many Kingdomes could be erected about these times: and of Vexoris of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia.

Hat fomany Kingdomes were erected in all those Easterne parts of the World fo soone after Numrod, (as by the storie of Ninus is made manifest) the causes were threefold (namely) Opportunitie, Example, and Necessitie. For opportunitie being a Princesse liberall and powerfull, bestoweth on her first Entertainers many times more benefits, than either Fortune can, or Wisedom ought; by whose presence alone the understanding mindes of men receive all those helpes and supplies, which they either want or wish for: so as every Leader of a troupe (after the division of tongues and dispersion of People) finding these faire offers made unto them, held the power which they possest, and governed by discretion all those people, whom they conducted to their diffined places. For it cannot be conceived, that when the Earth was first divided, mankinde straggled abroad like beasts in a Desert; but that by agreement they disposed themselves, & undertooke to inhabiteall the knowne parts of the World and by diffinct Families and Nations: otherwise, those remote Regions from Babylin and Shinaar, which had Kings, and were peopled in Ninus time, would not have been possest in many hundreds of yeeres after, as then they were; neither did those that were fent, and travelled far off (order being the true Parent of prosperous successe) undertake To difficult enterprises without a Conductor or Commander. Secondly, the Example of Nimrod with whom it succeeded well, strengthened every humor that aspired. Third ly, Necessitie resolved all men by the arguments of common miseries, that without Commander and Magistrate, neither could those that were laborious, and of honested positions, enjoy the harvest of their owne Travailes: nor those which were of little ftrength, secure themselves against forcible violence: nor those which sought afterange proportion of greatnesse, either possesse the same in quiet, or rule and order their own

That these causes had wrought these effects, the undertakings & Conquests of Ninn (the fon of Belus) made it apparent; for he found every where Kings and Monarchies, what way foever his Ambition led himin the Wars.

But Nimrod (his Grand-father) had no companion King, to us known, when he find tooke on him Soveraigntie and fole commandement of all those the children of Noal, which came from the East into Babylonia: though in his lifetime others also raised themfelves to the same estate; of which hereafter. Belus (his sonne and Successor) founds. batius King of Armenia and Scythia, sufficiently powerfull toresist his attempts: which Sie batius I take to be the same, which Justine calls Tanais; and should conjecture, the Mizraim had beene his Vexoris, were it not that I vehemently suspect some errour, (3) Justine placeth him) in the time of that Vexoris, who by many circumstances seemes of me, rightly accounted by the Judicious and Learned Reineccius, all one with the great 34 fostris, that lived certaine Ages after Ninus. This Belus, the fecond King of Babylon, regg ed 65. yeeres, according to the common account.

Of the name of Belus, and other names affines unto it.

Hence this fecond King and Succeffour of Nimrod had the name of Bel, of Belus, question hath been made: for it seemeth rather a name imposed, or (of addition) given by Ninus, than affumed by Belus himselfe.

Cyrillus against Julian calls the Father of Ninus Arbelus, affirming that he was the first of all men that caused himselfe to be called a god: which were it so, then might the name of Belus be thence derived. But Bel, as many Writers have observed, fignifieth the Sunin the Chaldean Tongue; and therefore did Ninus and Semiramic give that name to their Father, that he might be honoured as the Sun, which the Babylonians worshipped as a god. And as this Title was affurned in after-times by divers others of the Chaldaan Princes, and Babylonian Satrapa: fo was it used (in imitation) by the chiefe of the Cartha; ginians and other Nations, as some Historians have conceived.

To this Bel, or Belus, pertaine (as in affinitie) those voyces of Baal, Baalim, Belphegor, Beelphagor, Belsebub, and Beelsephon. Those that are learned in the Hebrew and Chaldman, convert the word Baal by the Latine, Princeps militiæ, Chiefe in the Warre, though Daniel was so called (faith Suidas)Ob honorem explicationis arcanarum rerum; In honour of his expounding fecrets. Saint Hierome makes Bel, Beel, and Baal, to have the fame fignification: Hieroin Ofec. and faith, that the Idoll of Babylon was so called, which Ninus in memorie of his father fet up to be worshipped: to which that he might adde the more honour and reverence, he made it a Sanctuarie and refuge for all offenders. Hence (faith Lyranus) came Idola-Lyrin Sapini trie, and the first use of Images into the World. Isidore doth interprete Bel by Vetus, old Saloment. orancient; adding, that as among the Affyrians it is taken for Saturne and the Sunue: fo 1/14.18.611. in the Punicke or Carthaginian Language it signisieth God: Glycas makes it an Assyrian name properly: and Josephus a Tyrian. He also affirmeth that the Idoll which the Moabites worshipped (by them erected on the Mountaine Phegor, or Peor, and called Baal) is the same which the Latines call Priages, the god of Gardens; which also was the opinion Hieronin of of Saint Hierome. But that the word Bel, or Beel, was as much to fay as God, appeareth by 64.09. the word BeelZebub, the Idoll of Accaron. For Bel, or Beel foundeth (God) and Sebub (Flies or Hornets:) by which name (notwithstanding) the Jewes expresse the Prince of Devils. But the Prophet Ofe teacheth us the proper fignification of this word from the voice of God himselfe; And at that day (fatth the Lord) thou shalt call me Ishi, and shalt call me no more Baalim: for I will take away the name of Baalim out of their mouthes. For although the name of Baal or Bahal, be justly to be used towards God; yet in respect that the same was given to Idols, God hath hated it, and forbad it. And the using of the word Bel among the Chaldeans for the Sunne, was not because it properly signifies the Sun, but because the Surine there was worshipped as a God: as also the Fire was, tanquam So. lis particula. As for the words compounded (before remembred) as Belphegor, and Belsephon, Belsephon is expounded out of Facius, Dominus specula vel custodia. The Lord of the Watch-Tower, or of the Guard: the other word noteth the Idoll, and the place wherein it was worshipped. It is also written Belpeor, or Baalpeor: and Peor (they fay) is as much as Denudavit; and therefore the word joyned expresseth a naked Image. Some there are that call this Belus the sonne of Saturne: for it was used among the Ancients to name the Father Saturne, the sonne supiter, and the Grand-childe Hercules. Saturni di- Autode aquit. cuntur familiarum Nobilium, Regumq; qui urbes condiderunt senissimi; primogeniti corum libs. Joves Junones; Hercules verò nepotes eorum fortissimi; The ancientest of Noble Families and Kings which founded Cities, are called Saturnes; their first-borne, Jupiters and Junoes; their valiant Nephewes, Hercules. But this Belus (faith L. Vives) was famous by reason of his warlike fonne Ninus, who caused his father to be worshipped as a God by the name of Jupiter Babylonius, whom the Egyptians (transported by the Dreames of their An-Diodlas) riquitie) make one of theirs. For Neptune (fay they) upon Libya the Daughter of Epaphus begat this Jupiter Belus, who was father to Agyptus. They adde, that this Bem, carry ing a Colonie to the River of Euphrates, there built a Citie in which he ordained Priests after the Egyptian manner. But were there any Belus the sonne of Epaphus and I so, or of Neptune and Libya, or (with Eusebius) of Teglonus, who after the deatle of Apis married Isis, (Cecrops then reigning in Athens) the same was not this Babylonian Belus of whom we speake, but rather some other Belus, of whom the Egyptians so of the worshipping of Images begun from Belus in Babel.

Sfor the Babylonian Belus, he was the most ancient Belus, and the Inventer of Astronomie, if Plinie say true: from whence the Egyptians might borrow both the name and the Doctrine. Some part of the Temple, in which his Statue or Image was honoured as a God, the fame Author affirmeth that it did remaine in his

Of the Sepulchre of Belas, Strabo writeth thus: Over the River faith he) there are gar-Strabolis ... dens, where they say the ruines of Belus his Tombe, which Xerxes brake up, are yet remaiping. It was a square Pyramis made of Briske, a furlong high, and on every side it had a furlong in breadth. It appears by Cyril against fulian, that he obtained divine worthip yet Listons Juliais.

living: for so he writes of him (calling him Arbelus.) Arbelus, vir superbus & arrogans, primus hominum dicitur à subditis Deitatis nomen accepise: Persever arunt igitur Assprii finitima illis gentes facrificantes ei Arbelus, a man very proud and arrogant, is accounted to be the first of all men that was ever honored by their subjects with title of Deitie; (or with the name of God.) The Affrians therefore, and the bordering nations have perfevered, facrifcing to him. Even Arius alfo, whom Suidas calls Thuras, who succeeded next after Ninias, was made an Idol-god among them, if we credit Suidas.

After Ninus (that is, after Ninias) Thuras reigned (faith Suidas) whom they called after the name of the Planet Mars; a man of sharpe and fierce disposition, who bidding bat. taile to Caucasus of the stocke of Japheth, slue him. The Asyrians worshipped him form their God, and called him Baal (that is) Mars; thus farre Suidas. Neither is it unlikely but that many among Idolatrous nations were Deified in their life-times, or foone after: though I denie not but that the most of their Images and Statue were first erected with out divine worship, onely in memorie of the glorious acts of Benefactors, as Glycas rightly conceiveth; and so afterward the Devill crept into those woodden and brazen carcal fes, when Posteritie had lost the memorie of their first invention. Hereof Isidore speaken in this manner: Quos autem Pagani Deus afferunt, homines fuerunt, & pro uniuscujusq; wi ta meritis vel magnificentia, coli apud suos post mortem caperunt : sed (Damonibus persui dentibus) quos illi pro sua memoria honoraverunt minores Deos existimarunt : ad istaven magis excolenda accesserunt Poetarum figmenta; They were men (faith he) whom the Pagam: affirmed to be gods: & every one for his merits or magnificence began after his death to beh noured of his owne. But at length (the Devils perswading) they accounted them lesser god whose memories they honoured: and the Fittions of the Poets made the opinions (concerning the honour of the dead much more superstitious.

And that the worshipping of Images was brought in by the Pagans, and Heathen Na tions, it is not Isidore alone that witneffeth; but Gregory: Gentilitas (faith he)inventrix & caput est Imaginum; Gentilisme is the inventresse and ground of Images: and Ambrosc; Gen tes lignum adorant, tanquam imaginem Dei The Gentiles adore wood, as it were the Image God. Eufebius also affirmeth as much, and calleth the worshiping of Images a custom borrowed of the Heathen. The like hath Saint Augustine against Adimantus. Et verente (faith Lastantius) ne religio vana sit, si nihil videant quod adorent. They feare their Religio would be vaine should they not fee that which they wor ship.

And (out of doubt) the Schoolemen shift this fearefull custome very strangely. For feeing the very workemanship it forbidden, how can the heart of a wife Christian sail fie it felfe with the distinction of Doulia and Hyperdoulia, which can imply nothing but fome difference of worshipping of those Images after they are made? And it is of a things the most strange, why religious and learned menshould straine their wits to defeat the use of those things, which the Scriptures have not onely no where warranted, buter presly in many places forbidden, and cursed the practisers thereof. Yet this doctrined the Devill was fo strongly and subtilly rooted, as neither the expresse Commandement of God himselfe, I hou shalt not make any graven Image, nor all the threatnings of Most and the Prophets after him, could remove, weed it, or by fear, or by any perswasions led the hearts of men from it. For where shall we find words of greater weight, or of plaint instruction than these : Take therefore good beed to your selves (for yee saw no Image in the day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb out of the midst of the fire that wee corrupt not you felves, and make you a graven Image or representation of any Figure, whether it be the like ufe of Male or Female.

And besides the expresse Commandement, Thoushalt make thee no graven Image, and the prohibition in many Scriptures, fo it is written in the Booke of Wifedome, That the invention of Idols was the beginning of Whoredome: and the finding of them the corruption of life : for they were not from the beginning, neither shall they continue for ever.

And whereas the Schoolemen affirme, that the Prophets spake against the Wo shipping of the Heathen Idols, it is manifest that Moses spake of Images of the living God, and not of Baal and the rest of that nature, For you faw no Image (faith Moses) that day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb. Surely it was excellently faid of Basil; Noli diquam in illo formam imaginari,ne circumscribas eum mentetua : Doe not imagine any form to be in God, lest thou limit or circumscribe him in thy minde too. Now, if the great Bas thought it a prefumption unlawfulll to represent a pattern of the infinite God to our outline thoughts and mindes, how farre doe those men presume that put him under the greazie Penfill of a Painter, or the rustie Axe or other Instrument of a Carpenter or Carver?

For as this dishonour to the infinite and incomprehensible God began in Babel: so did the Devill transport and spred this invention into all the Regions adjoyning; and into Egypt and Greece.

CHAP.10 $.7.

The Romanes for a while refifted the erection of these Idols and Images, refusing to fet them in their Temples for 170 yeeres; observing the Law of Numa, who thought it impictie to resemble things most beautifull, by things most base. But Tarquinias Priscas afterwards prevailing, and following the vanitie of the Grecians (a Nation of all others o under the Sunne most deluded by Satan) set up the Images of their gods; which (as S. Angustine witnesseth) that Learned Varro both bewailed, and utterly condemned: and which Seneca thus derideth; Simulachra deorum venerantur, illus supplicant, genu posito illa adorant; & cum bæc suspiciant fabros qui illa fecere contemnunt; The Images of the gods are worshipped, those they pray unto, with bended knees those they adore; and while they so greatly admire them, they contemne the Handi-craft smen that made them: which also Sedulius the Poet in this fort scoffed at:

Heumiseri qui vana colunt, qui corde sinistro Relligiosa sibi sculpunt simulachra, sunmas Factorem fugiunt, & qua fecere verentur. Quis furor est? que tanta animos dementia ludit? Ut volucrem, turpema; bovem; torvuma; Draconem; Semi-hominema;-canem supplex homo pronus adoret;

Ah wretched they that worship vanities, And confecrate dumb Idols in their heart, Who their owne Maker (God on high) despise, And feare the worke of their owne hands and art. What furie ? what great madnesse doth beguile Mens mindes ? that man should ugly shapes adore Of Birds, or Buls, or Dragons, or the vile Halfe-dogge-halfe-man on knees for aide implore-

And though this device was barbarous, and first, and many yeeres practised by Heathen Nations only, till the Jewes were corrupted in Egypt, yet it is not Seneca alone that laugheth to scorne the ignorant stupiditie of his Nation: but Justin Martyr remembreth how the Sybils inveighed against Images: and Hospinian, how Sophocles taught, that it was permicious to the foules of mento erect and adore those Babels. Strabo and Herodotus witnesse, that the Persians did not ered or set up any Statue of their Gods. Lycurgus nevertaught it the Lacedamonians, but thought it impietie to represent immortall Pnatures by mortall Figures. Eusebius also witnesseth in his fixt Booke de praparatione Evangelica, that it was forbidden by a Law in Serica, or among the Brachmans in India, that Images should be worshipped. The same doe Tacitus and Crinitus report of the ancient Germans. Many other Authors might be remembred that witnesse the disdaine which the Heathen themselves had of this childish Idolatrie: of which Hospinian hath written at large in his Tract, de origine Imaginum. And it was truely said, Omnia mala exempla bonis inities orta sunt, All ill examples have sprung from good beginnings. The Heathenat first made these Status and Images, but in memorie of such remarkeable men, as had deferved best of their Countries & common-wealths: Effigies hominum (faith Pliny) non folebant exprimi, nisi aliqua illustri causa perpetuitatem merentium: Men were not wont to make Pictures, but of men which merited for some notable cause to bee perpetually remembred. And though of the more ancient Papifis, some have borrowed of the Gentiles (as appears in Lastantius) that defence for Images: That Simulachra are proclementis literarum, at per ea discerent homines Deum invisibilem cognoscere: Images say they, (& so before them the Heathen said) are in stead of Letters, whereby men might learne to know the invisible God in which understanding perhaps they no otherwise esteemed them than pictures indeed; yet as that of Baal or Bel set up in memory of Belus the Babylonian, became afterward the most reverenced Idoll of the World, by which so many Nations (and they which were appropriate to God himselfe) were milled and cast away: so those very stocks and stones and painted canvases (called the pictures of Christ our Ladie, & others) were by thousands of ignorant people, not onely adored, but esteemed to have life, motion, & understanding. Originorant people, not of the Book of Wisedome) when we passe through the raging waves, on these stocks more rotten than the Ship that carrieth ris.

This Heathen invention of Images became fo fruitfull in after-times, breeding aninfinite multitude of gods, that they were forced to distinguish them into degrees and or. ders ; as Dit consentes, seu majorum gentium, selecti, Patritii, insigniores, dit medit : Coun. felling gods, or gods of the mightiest Nobilitie, select gods, Patrian, gods of marke, and Com. mon gods (which the Romanes called Medioxum) dir infimi, and terrestriall Heroes, and multitudes of other gods, of which Saint Augustine hath made large mention in his to Booke de Civitate Dei. But (faith Lattantius) among all those miserable soules and rotten bodies, worshipped by men more like to their Idols, did Epimenides Cretensis (by what good Angell moved I know not) erect in the Athenian Fields, Altars to the unknowne God, which stood with the same title and dedication, even to the times of S. Paul: who made them first know to whom these Altars belonged, and opened their eyes which were capable of grace, that they might difcerne the difference betwixt that light which Were capable of graces and the obscure and stinking mist wherein the Devill had so many yeeres led and mis-led them. And it sufficed not that the multitude of these gods was b great in generall, or that every Nation had some one which tooke particular and singular great at general, of that in Crete, Ifis in Egypt, in Athens Minerva, in Samos June, in Papha, care of them, as Jupiter in Crete, Ifis in Egypt, in Athens Minerva, in Samos June, in Papha, Venus, and so of all other parts; but every Citie, and almost every Family had a goda C.p.17. 218-31. part. For, as it is written in the second of Kings, the men of Babel made Succoth Benoth and the men of Cuth made Nergal, and the men of Hamath made Ashima, and the Avin made NibhaZ and Tartak, and the Sephervaims burnt their children in the fire to Adram. lech. All which how plainly hath the Prophet Efay derided . Men cut down Trees, rink them burne a part of them, make readie their meat, and warme themselves by the fire thereof, and of the residue he maketh a god; an Idoll, and prayeth unto it: but God hath shut theires from fight, and their heart from under standing. and to believe S. Paul: who speaketh thus plainly and feelingly, My beloved, flye from

"Nto this Belus succeeded Ninus, the first that commanded the exercise of 16 latrie, the first that injuriously invaded his Neighbour Princes, and the first the without shame or feare committed adulterie in publique. But as of Belus that is no certaine memorie (as touching particulars:) fo of this Ninus (whose Storie is gr thered out of Prophane Authors) I finde nothing so warrantable, but that the sameny be disputed, and in the greatest part doubted. For although that piece of Berofus set of and commented upon by Annius, hath many good things in it, and giveth great light (s Chrytaus noteth) to the understanding of Diodorus Siculus, Dion, Halicarna seus, & others: yet Lodovicus vives, B. Rhenanus, and others after them, have laid open the imperfection and defects of the Fragment; proving directly that it cannot be the same Berosus whichlived in Alexanders time, cited by Athenaus and Josephus: and whose Statue the Athenians crected, faith Plinie. Yet it is from him chiefely, that many have gathered the fuccession of the Babylonian and Assirian Princes, even from Nimred to the eighteenth King Ascatades, & to the times of Josua. For of Metasthenes an Historian, of the Race of the Persian Priests, there are found but certain Papers; or some few lines of the Chaldaan and Af fyrian Monarchies: but he afterwards in the collection of the Persian Kings is not without

Ctesias or Cnidus (a Citie joyning to Halicarnasseus) who lived together with Cyru the younger, and with Artaxerxes Mnemon, gathered his Historie out of the Persian Re cords, and reacheth as far upwards as Ninus and Semiramis: and though in the Storie of Cyrus the younger, Xenophon approveth him in some things, and Atheneus, Paulanius and Tertullian cite him; yet so base and apparent are his flatteries of the times and Princes with whom he lived, and fo incredible are the numbers which he finds in the Armies of Ninus, and especially of Semiramis; as what soever his reports were, times have configmed his workes, faving some very few excerptions lately published.

And therefore in things uncertaine, feeing a long difcourfe cannot be pleafing to men of judgement, I will paffe over the acts of this third Affyrian, in as few words as I can expresse them. S. Augustine affirmes that Ninus mastered all Asia, India excepted. Others fay that he wanne it all, fave India, Battria, and Arabia. For he made Aricus of Arabia the companion of his Conquests, with whom he entred into a straight league of amitie, because he commanded many people, and was his kinsman, and a Chuste, and the neerest Prince confronting Babylonia. His first enterprize was upon Syria, which he might easily fubdue, both because he invaded it on the sodaine, and because it lay next him: and also because the Arabians and their king Aricus (which bordered Syria) affisted him in the Conquest thereof.

The king of Armenia, BarZanes, he forced to acknowledge him, and to aide him in his Warre against Zoroaster: for from Armenia he bent himselfe that way toward the East; but that ever he commanded the leffer Afia, I doe not believe, for none of his Succeffors had any possession therein.

His third Warre was against Pharnus, king of the Medes, whom it is fayd that he overthrew, and cruelly murtherd with his feven Children, though others affirme, that they all died in one battaile against him. Whether he invaded Zoroafter before the building or amplifying of Nineve, or after, it is uncertaine. It is faid that he made two expeditions into Batteria: and that finding little or ill successe in the first, he returned, and set the worke of Nineve forward: and then a second time entred Battria with 1700000. Foot, and 200000. Horse, and 10000 fixe hundred Chariots: being encountred by Zoroaster with foure hundred thousand. But Ninus prevayling, and Zoroaster being slaine, Augdecinic he entred farther into the Countrie, and besieged the chiefe Citie therof, called Battra Dei. or Bactrion (faith Stephanus:) which by a paffage found, and an affault given by Semiramis (the wife of Menon) he entred and possest. Upon this occasion Ninus both admiring her supplied with judgement and valour, together with her person and externall beautie, fancied her so o firongly, as (neglecting all Princely respects) he tooke her from her husband, whose eyes he threatned to thrust out if he refused to consent. He therefore yeelding to the passion of love in Ninus, and to the passion of forrow in himselfe, by the strong persuafions of shame and dishonour, cast himselfe head-long into the water, and died.

CHAP. XI.

Of ZOROASTER, supposed to have beene the chiefe Author of Magick Arts: and of the dievers kinds of Magicke.

That Loroafter was not Cham, nor the first Inventer of Astrologie, or of Magicke: and that there were divers great Magicians of this name.

Oroaster King of the Bactrians, Vincentius supposeth to be Cham the fonne of Noah: A fancie of little probabilitie. For Cham was the Paternall Ancestor of Ninus, the Father of Chus, the Grand-father of Nimrod, whose some was Belus, the Father of Nims. It may be that Vincentius had heard of that booke which was called Scriptura Cham, devised by some wicked Knave, and so intituled: of which Sixtus Senensis hath made the due mention.

It is reported by Cassianus, that Sevenus Abbas gave the invention of Atagicke Calsianinolas. to Cham the sonne of Noah: so did Comestor in his Scholasticall Historie: which Art (faith he) with the 7. liberall Sciences he writin 14. Pillers: seven of which were made of braffe, to refift the defacing by the waters of the Floud; and 7.0f bricke against the injurie of fire. There was also another devised discourse, which went under the title of Prophetia Cham. Cassianus out of Serenus hath somewhat like to this of Comestor. These be Cassianus words: Cham (filius Noah) qui superstitionibus istis & sarrilegis fuit artibus infectus, sciens nullum se posse super his memorialem librum in Arcamprorsusin. ferre, in quaerat cumpatre justo, &c. Cham (the sonne of Noah) who was infested with these Superstitions, and sacrilegious Arts, knowing that be could not bring any booke or memoriall of that nature into the Arke, wherein be was to remaine with his godly Father, caused the Precepts and Rules thereof to be graven in metall and hard stone.

S. Augustine noteth that Zoroaster was said to have laught at his birth, when all other children weepe; which prefaged the great knowledge which afterward he attayned unto: being taken for the Inventer of naturall Magicke and other Arts; for the Corrupter, to faith Plinie and Justine. But I doe not thinke that Zoroaster invented the doctrine of the Horoscopes or Nativities: or first found out the nature of herbs, stones, and mineralls, or their Sympatheticall or Antipatheticall workings; of which, I know not what King of Chaldea is also made the Inventer. I rather thinke that these knowledges were far more ancient, and left by Noah to his fonnes. For Abraham who had not any acquaintance with Zoroafter, (as Josephus reporteth) was no leffe learned heerein than any other in that age, if he exceeded not all men then living: differing from the wisedome of aftertimes in this, that he knew and acknowledged the true cause, and giver of life and vertue to Nature and all Naturall things; whereas others (forgetting Gods infinite, dispersed, and universall power) admired the instruments, and did attribute propera ftrength to the things themselves, (from which the effects were sensible) which belonged to that wisedome, Which being one, and remaining in it selfe, can doe all things, and

Now whether this Zoroafter (over-throwne by Ninus) were the same which was so excellent a Naturalist, it is doubted For Zoroaster the Magician, Ctesias calls Oxyartes, whom Plinie finds of a later time. And if Zoroafter were taken away by a Spirit (being in the middest of his Disciples) as some Authors report, then Zoroaster, slaine by Ninns, was not the Magician: which is also the opinion of Scaliger.

Againe Josephus and Cedrenus affirme, that Seth first found out the Planets, or wandring Starres, and other Motions of the Heavens : for if this Art had beene invented by Zoroa. 3 fer, he could not have attained to any fuch excellencie therein, in his owne life-time; but being a man (as it feemeth) of fingular judgement, he might adde fornewhat to this kind of knowledge, and leave it by writing to posteritie.

But of this Zoroafter there is much dispute: and no leffe jangling about the word and ert of Magicke. Arnobius remembreth foure, to whom the name of Zoroafter, or Zoroafter was given: which by Hermodorus and Dinon feemeth to be but a cognomen, or name of art, and was as much to fay, as aftrorum cultor. The first, Arnobius calleth the Bactrian, which may be the same that Ninus overthrew: the second, a Chaldean, and the Astronomer of Ninus: the third was Zoroaster Pamphylius, who lived in the time of Cyrus and his familiar: the fourth, Zoroaster Armenius, the Nephew of Hostianes, which followed at Xerxes into Greece: betweene whom and Cyrus there past threescore and eighteent yeares. Suidas remembreth a fift, called Personedus sapiens : and Plato speaketh of Zoroafer the fon of Oromasdes; which Picus Mirandula confirmeth.

Now of what Nation the first and chiefe Zoroafter was, it is doubted. Plinie and Lattius make him a Persian. Gemisthius or Pletho, Ficinus and Steuchius, make him a Chaldaan. But by those bookes of one Zoroaster, found by Picus Mirandula, it appeareth plainely, that the Author of them was a Chaldean by Nation, though the word (Chaldean) was as often given to the learned Priests peculiarly, as for any distinguishment of Nations. Porphyrius makes the Chaldai and Magi divers; Picus the same. But that this Zoroaster was a Chaldean both by Nation and Profession, it appeareth by his Bookes, se which (faith Picus) were written in the Chaldean tongue; and the Comment in the same language. Now that the Magi and they were not differing, it may be judged by the name of those bookes of Zoroaster, which in an Epistle of Mirandula to Ficinus, he faith, tobe intituled, Patris Ezre Zoroaftris, & Melchior magorum oracula.

Of the name of Magia: and that it was anciently farre divers from Conjuring and Witch-

TOw for Magick it selfe; which Art (faith Mirandula) pauci intelligent, multi re-picalen juit prehendunt; Few understand, and many reprehend; Et sicut Canes ignois semper allatrant; As Dogs barke at those they know not: so they condemne and hate the things they understand not: Ithinke it not amisse (leaving Ninus for a while) to speake fomewhat thereof.

It is true that many men abhorre the very name and word (Magos) Because of Simon Maeus, who being indeed, not Magus, but Goes, (that is) familiar with evill fpirits, usurped that title. For Magicke, Conjuring, and Witchery, are far differing Arts, whereof Plinie being ignorant scoffeth therat. For Nero (faith Plinie) who had the most excellent Ma-plin.l.30.bill gicians of the East fent him by Tyridates King of Armenia, who held that Kingdome by Nat.

Magus is a Persian word primitively, whereby is exprest such a one as is altogether popular ea conversant in things divine. And (as Plato affirmeth) the Art of Magicke is the Art of Apul. worshipping God: To which effect Apolloniss in his Epistles expounding the Word Platoin Alcie; o (unyos) faith, that the Persians called their gods ways: whence he addeth that Magus is either sign of on segment ms sear (that is) that Magus is a name sometime of him that is a God by nature; sometimes of him that is in the service of God in which latter sense it is taken, Math. 2. v. 1. And this is the first and highest kind: which Piccolominie calleth piccol de Doffer divine Magicke : and these did the Latines newly intitle Sapientes or Wisemen: For, the Properbitge feare & worship of God is the beginning of knowledge. These Wisemen the Greeks call Phi- John Hag. lofophers: the Indians, Brachmans: which name they fomewhat neerely retaine to this day, calling their Priefts Bramines; among the Egyptians they were termed Priefts, with the Hebrewes they were called Cabalists, Prophets, Scribes, and Pharisees: amongst the Babylonians they were differenced by the name of Chaldwans and among the Persians. Magicians : of whom Arnobius (fpeaking of Hoftanes, one of the ancient Magicians) modernio fits. Magicians: of whom Arnovies (Ipeaking of responses, one of the analysis in music Falicis useth these words: Et verum Deum merita majestate prosequitur, & Angelos ministros Dei, mutic Falicis sed veri, ejus venerationi novit assistere. Idem damonas prodit terrenos, vagos, humanitatis 366, inimicos; Sosthenes (for fo M. Falix called him, not Hostanes) ascribeth the due majestie to the true God, & acknowledgeth that his Angels are ministers and messengers which attend the worship of the true God. He also bath delivered that there are Devils earthly and wandering, and enemies to mankinde.

His Majestie also in his first Booke of Demonologie c. 3. acknowledgeth, that in the Perfiantongue the word (Magus) imports as much as a contemplator of divine and heavenlie sciences; but unjustly so called, because the Chaldeans were ignorant of the true divinitie. And it is also right which His Majestie avoweth, that under the name of Magicke all other unlawfull Arts are comprehended, and yet doth His Majestie distinguish it from Necromancie, Witchcraft, and the rest: of all which he hath written largely and most learnedly. For the Magicke which His Majestie condemneth, is of that kinde where removelee ites of the Divell is a partie. Daniel in his fecond chapter nameth four kindes of those Wife- cap. 1. men: Arioli, Magi, Malefici, and Chaldet. Arioli the old Latine translation calleth Sophistas: Vatablus and Pagninus Genethliaces, or Physicos, or Philosophers, or (according to the note Of Vatablus) Naturalists: Nempe funt Magi apud Barbaros, quod Philosophi apud Gracos (scilicet) divinarum humanarumq : rerum scientiam profitentes : For the Magi are the same with the Barbarians, as the Philosophers are with the Gracians (that is) men that professe the knowledge of things both divine and humane. The Greeke & the English call them Inchanters , Junius, Magicians ; Castalion, Conjecturers : in the Syrianthey are all foure by one name called Sapientes Babylonis , The Wifemen of Babel.

The second fort Varablus, Pagnin, Junius, and our English, call Astrologers; Hierome and the Septuagint, Magicians.

The third kind are Malefici, or Venefici; in Hierom, Págnin, and the Septuagint, Witches or Poyloners: in Jumus, er aftigiatores of Sorcerers, as in English.

That Witches are also rightly so called Venefici, or Poysoners; and that indeed there is a kinde of Malefici, which without any Art of Magicke or Mecromancie use the helpe of the Devill to doe mischiefe, His Majestie confirmeth in the first Chapter of his second Booke : speaking also in the fift Chapter of their practice, to mixe the powder of dead bodies with other things by the Divell prepared; and at other times to make pictures of Waxe, or Clay, or otherwise (as it were Sacramentaliter) to effect those things, which the Devill by other meanes bringeth to passe.

The fourth, all Translators call Chaldaans: who tooke upon them to foretell all things to come, as well naturall as humane, and their events: and this they vaunted to performe by the influences of the Starres by them observed, and understood.

Such were, and to this day partly (if not altogether) are the corruptions, which have made odious the very name of Magicke, having chiefly fought (as is the manner of all to impostures) to counterfeit the highest and most noblest part of it, yet so as they have also crept into the inferior degrees.

A fecond kind of Magicke was that part of Astrologie, which had respect to sowing and planting, and all kinds of agriculture and husbandrie : which was a knowledge of the motions and influences of the Starres into those lower Elements.

Phile Judeus goeth farther, affirming, that by this part of Magicke or Aftrologie, toge. ther with the motions of the Starres and other heavenly bodies, Abraham found out the knowledge of the true God, while he lived in Chaldaa: Qui contemplatione creaturarum cognovit Creatorem, (faith Jo. Damascen) Who knew the Creator by the contemplation of the creature. Josephus reporteth of Abraham, that he instructed the Egyptians in Arithm. ticke and Astronomie, who before Abrahams comming unto them knew none of thesesciences.

And so doth Archangelus de Burgo, in desence of Mirandula against Garfias: Alexander & Eupolemon dicunt, quod Abraham santtitate & sapientia omnium prastantisimus Chaldaos primum, deinde Phanices, demum Agypties facerdotes Aftrologiam & divina docuerit; Alexander (faith he meaning Alexander Polyhistor) and Eupolemon affirm. that Abraham the holyest and wisest of men, did first teach the Chaldeans, then the Phanici-ans ; lastly, the Egyptian Priests, Astrologie and divine knowledge.

The third kind of Magicke contayneth the whole Philosophie of nature : not the brabblings of the Ariftotelians, but that which bringeth to light the inmost vertues, and draweth them out of Natures hidden bosome to humaneuse: Virtutes in centro centri la tentes . Vertues hidden in the center of the center, according to the Chymifts. Of this for were Albertus, Arnoldus de villanova, Raymond, Bacon, and many others: and before these in elder times, and who better understood the power of Nature, and how to apply things that worke to things that suffer, were Zoroaster before spoken of: Apollonius Tyaneus membredby S. Hierome to Paulinus; in some mens opinion Numa Pompilius among the Romans : among the Indians, The spian : among the Egyptians, Hermes : among the Babylo. mians, Budda : the Thracians had Zamolxis : the Hyperboreans (as is supposed) Abbans & the Italians, Petrus Aponensis. The Magick which these men profest, is thus defined: Me gia est connexio à virosapiente agentium per naturam cum patientibus, sibi congruentent Spondentibus, ut inde opera prodeant won fine corum admiratione qui causam ignorant: Megich is the connexion of naturall agents and patients, answerable each to other, wrought by anis man, to the bringing forth of such effects, as are wonderfull to those that know not their cause. In all these three kindes, which other men divide into foure, it seemeth that Zorosfa Town mundo was exceedingly learned: especially in the first and highest. For in his Oracles he confesseth God to be the creator of the Universall: he beleeveth of the * Trinity, which he could not investigate by any naturall knowledge: he speaketh of Angels, and of Paradift. approveth the immortalitie of the foule : teacheth Truth, Faith, Hope, & Love, discourfing of the Abstinence and Charitie of the Magi: Which Oracles of his, Pfellus, Ficinal, Patritius, and others have gathered and translated.

Of this Zoroafter, Eufebius in the Theologie of the Phanicians, using Zoroafters Owne words : Hac ad verbum (cribit (faith Eusebius) Deus primus incorruptibilium, sempittinus,ingenitus,expers partium, sibiipsi simillimus, bonorum omnium auriga, muneranonexpectans, optimus, prudentissimus, pater juris, fine doctrina justitiam perdoctus, natura per fectus, sapiens, sacranatura unicus inventer &c. Thus writeth Zoroafter word for word. God the first incorruptible, everlasting, unbegotten, without parts, most like himselfe, the guidt of all good, expecting no reward, the best, the wifest, the father of right, having learned justice without teaching perfect, wife by nature, theonly inventer thereof.

Sixtus Senenfis speaking of the wisedome of the Chaldenns, doth distinguish those wife men into five orders, (to wit) Chascedim, or Chaldwans: Asaphim, or Magicians: Chartumim : (which he translates Ariolie, or Sophists) Mechasphim, or Malefici, or Venefici, Witches, or Poyloners; and Gazarim, Augures, or Aruspices, or Diviners.

Chascedim were those which had the name of Chaldaans, which were Astronomers ? Hi calorum motus diligentissime spectarunt; These did most diligently contemplate the motions of the heavens: whom Philo in the life of Abraham describeth.

Asaphim were in the old Latine translation called Philosophers: of the Septuagint and of Hierome, Magicians: Qui de omnium tam divinarum quam humanarum rerum causis Philosophatisunt . Who discoursed of the causes of all things, as well divine as humane : of whom Origen makes Balaam (the fon of Bear) to be the first: but Laertius ascribeth the Laertist invention of this art to Zoroastres the Persian.

Chartumim, or Inchanters, the Disciples (faith Saint Augustine, Plinie, and Justine) of another Zoroastres: who corrupted the admirable wisedome of the Magi, which he re-

CHAP.II. S.2.

Mechasphim, or Venefici, or Witches, are those which we have spoken already out of His Majesties booke of Damonologia.

Gazarim.or Aruspices (after Saint Hierome) which divine from the entrailes of beasts flaine for facrifices: or by Gazarim others understand Augures, who divine by the flying.

By this distinction we may perceive the difference betweenethose wise mer, which the kings of Babylon entertained; and that the name and profession of the Magi among the ancient Persians was most honest. For as Pencer truely observeth, Praerant religioni Per-Pencer delle sica ut in populo Dei Levita, studiisq, vera Philosophia dediti erant : nec quisquam Rex Per- mag sul, 136, 136, farmm poterat effe, qui non antea Magorum disciplinam scientiama; percepisset . The Magi (faith he) were the chiefe Ministers of the Persian Religion as the Levites among Gods people, & they were given to the fludies of true Philosophie neither could any be King of the Persians. who had not first beene exercised in the mysteries and knowledge of the Magi. Sixtus Senensis. in the defence of Origen against Polychronius and Theophilus, hath two kinds of Mazicke. his owne words are these: Et ne quem moveant pramisa Polychronij & Theophili testi- Biblio sollaria monia, sciendum est duplicem esse Magiam, alteram ubiq; ab Origine damnatam qua per fadera cum damonibus inita aut vere aut apparenter operatur; alteram ab Origine laudatam. qua ad practicen naturalis philosophia pertinet, docens admirabiles res operari ex applicatione mutua naturalium virtutum ad invicem agentium ac patientium. That the teltimonies of Theophilus and Polychronius (laith he) may not move any man, it is to be understood that Magicke is of two forts, the one every where condemned by Origen; which worketh (whether truely or feemingly) by covenants made with Devills: the other commended by Origen: which appertaineth to the practicke part of natural Philosophie, teaching to worke admirablethings by the mutuall application of naturall vertues, agent and suffering reciprocally

This partition Hierome doth embrace in the first of his Commentaries upon Daniel: where confidering of the difference which Daniel makes betweene these four kinds of wife Men formerly remembred, he useth this distinction: Ques nos hariolos: caterà imondiès (idest) incantatores interpretati sunt, videntur mihi esse qui verbis rem peragunt: Magi, qui de singulis philosophantur; malesici, qui sanguine utuntur & victimis & sepe contingunt corpora mortuorum : porro in Chaldais Genethliacos significari puto, quos vulgo Mathematicos vocant. Consuetudo autem communis Magos pro maleficis accipit, qui aliter habentur apud gentem fuam eo quod fint Philosophi Chaldaorum : & ad artis hujus fcientiam Reges quoq: et Principes ejusalem gentis omnia faciunt: unde er in nativitate Domini Salvatoris ip si primum ortum ejus intellexerunt, & venientes sanctam Bethlehem adoraverunt puerum, stella desuper ostendente; They whom we call Sorcerers, and others interpret Ino chanters, seeme to me such as performe things by words; Magicians, such as handle every thing philosophically; Witches, that use bloud and sacrifices, and often lay hands on the body of the dead : further among the Chaldrans I take them to be fignified by the name of Conjecturers upon nativities whom the vulgar call Mathematicians. But common custome takes Magicians for Witches who are otherwise reputed in their owne Nation: for they are the Philosophers of the Chald cans: yea King and Princes of that Nation doe all that they doe according to the knowledge of this Art : whence at the nativitie of the Lord our Saviour they first of all understood his birth, and comming unto holy Bethlebem, did worship the Childe: the Starre from above sheming him unto them. By this therefore it appeareth that there is, great difference betweenethe doctrine of a Magician, and the abuse of the word. For though some Writers affirme, that Magus hodie dicitur, qui ex fædere facto utitur diaboli opera ad rem quamcung; That he is called a Magician now-adaies, who having entred league with the Divell, ufeth his helpe to any matter : yet (as our Saviour faid of Divorce) it was not so from the beginning. For the Art of Magicke is of the wisedome of Nature; other Arts which undergoe that title, were invented by the falfhood, subtlety, & envie of the Devil. In the latter there is no other doctrine, than the use of certaine ceremonies, Per mala fidem: By an evill faith: in the former no other ill, than the investigation of those vertues and hidden properties which God hathgiven to his creatures, and how fitly to apply things that worke, to things that fuffer. And though by the Jewes those excellent to Magicians, Philosophers, & Divines, which came to worship our Saviour Christ, weretermed Mechaschephim, or Mecasphim; yet had they no other reason than common custome therein. Consuetude autem communis Magos pro maleficis accipit ; Common custome (faith S. Hierome) understandeth Witches under the name of Magicians : And antiquitie (isaith Peter Martyr) by the word (Magi) understood good and wise men. Quid igitur expavescis Magi nomen formidolofe, nomen Evangelio gratiofum, quod non maleficum & veneficum. fed sapientem sonat & Sacerdotem? O thou fearefull one (saith Ficinus) why doubtest thou Mar.Ficin.parto use the name of Magus, a name gracious in the Gospell, which doth not signific a Witch or Conjurer but a wife man and a Prieft? For what brought this flander to that fludy and profession, but onely idle ignorance, the Parent of causelesse admiration? Causa fuit mirifi. centia quorundam operum, qua (re vera) opera naturalia sunt : veruntamen quia procuratione damonum, naturai ipsas vel conjungentium, vel commiscentium, vel aliter ad operandum expedientium facta (unt, opera damonum credebantur ab ignorantibus hac. De operibus hu. jusmodi est Magia naturalis, quam Necromantiam multi impropriè vocant : The marvel. Gul. Parificulde coufneffe of some workes, which (indeed) are naturall, hath beene the cause of this slander: but because these workes have beene done by procurement of Divels, joyning the natures together or mingling them, or how soever fitting the natures to their working, they were thought the workes of the Divels by the ignorant. Among these workes is natural Magicke, which men call very improperly Necromancie.

Mirandula in his Apologie goeth further : For by understanding (faith he) the uttermost activitie of naturall agents we are assisted to know the Divinitie of Christ: for otherwise(to use his owne words) ignoratis terminis potentia & virtutis rerum naturalium, sa nos dubitare illa eadem opera, qua fecit Christus, posse fieri per media naturalia; The termes or limits of naturall power and vertue not understood, we must needs doubt whether those ver workes which Christ did, may not be done by naturall meanes: after which he goeth on in this fort : Ideo non hæretice, non super stitiose dixi, sed verissime & Catholice per talem Magiam adjuvari nos in cognoscenda divinitate Christi: Therefore I sayd not heretically, not Superstitionsly, but most truely and Catholikely, that by such Magicke we are furthered in knowing the Divinitie of Christ. And seeing the Jewes and others, the enemies of Christian Religion, doe impudently and impiously object, that those Miracles which Christ wrought were not above Nature, but by the exquisite knowledge thereof performed: Mirandula a man for his yeares fuller of knowledge than any that this latter Age hath brought forth, might with good reason avow, that the uttermost of Natures workes being knowne, the workes which Christ did, and which (as himselfe witnesseth) no man could doe, doe manifeltly testifie of themselves, that they were performed by that hand which held Nature herein but as a Pencill, and by a power infinitely supreme and divine; and thereby those that were faithlesse, were either converted or put to silence.

That the good knowledge in the ancient Magicke is not to be condemned: though the Divell bere, as in other kindes, hath fought to obtrude evill things, under the name and colour of good things.

Eeing therefore it is confessed by all of understanding, that a Magician (according to the Persian word) is no other than, Divinorum cultor & interpres : A studious ob-I ferver & expounder of divine things: and the Art of it felfe (I meane the Art of naturall Magicke)no other, Quamnaturalis Philosophia ab soluta consummatio; Than the ab-Solute perfettion of naturall Philosophie: Certainely then it proceeds from ignorance, and no way forteth with wife and learned men, promifeue, and without difference and diffinction to confound lawfull and praise-worthy knowledge with that impious, and (to use S. Pauls words) with those beggerly rudiments, which the Divell hath shuffledin, & by them bewitcheth and befooleth graceleffe men. For if we condemne natural Magicke, or the wiledome of Nature, because the Divell (who knoweth more than any man) doth also reach Witches and Poyfoners the harmefull parts of Herbes, Drugges, Minerals, & Excrements: then may we by the fame rule condemne the Physician, and the Art of healing, For the Divellalfo in the Oracles of Amphiaraus, Amphilochus, Trophonius, and thelike taught men in Dreames what Herbes and Drugges were proper for fuch and fuch difeafes. Now no man of judgement is ignorant, that the Divell from the beginning hath fought to thrust himselfe into the same imployment among the Ministers and Servants of God, changing himselfe for that purpose into an Angell of Light. He hath led men to Idolatry as a Doctrine of Religion; he hath thrust in his Prophets among those of the true God; he hath corrupted the Art of Astrologie; by giving adivine power to the Starres, teaching men to effecte them as gods, and not as infitruments. And (as Bunting Bunting Bunting Bunting observeth) it is true, that judiciall Astrologie is corrupted with many superstitions: but the abuse of the thing takes not away the Art; confidering that heavenly bodies (as even generall experience sheweth) have and exercise their operation upon the inferiour. For the Sunne, and the Starre of Mars doe drie; the Moone doth moiften, and poverne the Tides of the Sea. Again, the Planers, as they have feverall and proper names, fo have they feverall and proper vertues: the Starres doe also differ in beautie and in magnitude: and to all the Starres hath God given also their proper names, which (had they not influences and vertues different) needed not: He counteth the number of the Starres, and Platition calleth them by their names. But into the good & profitable knowledge of the celeftiall influences, the Divell ceafeth not to flueffe in his Superstitions: and so to the knowledge of the fecret vertues of Nature hath he fastened his doctrine of Characters, Numbers and Incantations; and taught men to believe in the strength of Words and Letters: (which without Faith in God are but Inke or common breath) thereby either to equall his own with the All-powerfull Word of God, or to diminish the glory of Gods creating Word. by whom are all things.

Moreover, he was never ignorant, that both the wife and the simple observe when the Sea-birds for fake the shores and fly into the Land, that commonly some great storme followeth; that the high flying of the Kite and the Swallow, betoken faire weather; that the crying of Crowes and bating of Ducks, foreshew raine: for they feele the Ayre moistened in their Quils. And it is written in Hieremie the Prophet. Eventhe Storke in Cap. 8. ver. ? the syre knoweth her appointed times, and the Turtle, and the Crane, or the Swallow. Hereupon, this enemie of Mankinde, working upon these as upon the rest of Gods creatures, long time abused the Heathen by teaching them to observe the flying of Fowles, and thereby to judge of good or ill successe in the War:and(withall) to looke into their entrailes for the fame, as if God had written the secrets of unsearchable providence in the livers & bowels of birds and beafts. Again, because it pleased God somtimes by Dreames not onely to warne and teach his Prophets and Apostles, but Heathen Princes also, as Generally Abimelech to restore Sarato Abraham : because he admonished 70seph, and by Dreame informed Jacob, Laban, Pharao, Salomon, Paul, Ananias, the Magi of the East, and others. Job 33.174 For at it is remembred in Job: In Dreames and Visions of the night, when sleepe falleth upon men de then God openeth the eares, that he might cause man to returne from his enterprize: therefore, I say, doth the Divellalso practise his Divinations by Dreames, or (after Pa leg. 24.cap. rifiensis) divinitatis imitationes, his mocke-divinitie. This in the end grew so common, as Aristides compiled an Ephemerides of his owne Dreames: Mithridates of those of his Concubines. Yea the Romanes finding the inconvenience hereof, because all dreams (with- codex dema-) out distinction of cases) were drawne to Divination, forbad the same by a Law, as by tester Mather the words of prohibition (aut narrandis somniis occultam aliquam artem divinandi) it may matthe of appeare. Likewise by the Law of God in Deuteronomie, cap. 13. seducing Dreamers were ordered to be flaine. that of Astrages of his Daughter, and many others of like nature. Of the reason of all which, for a fmuch as the cause is not in our selves, this place denieth dispute.

That Daniels misliking Nabuchodonosors condemning of the Magicians, doth not justifie

But it may be objected, that if fuch Divinations as the Heathens commonly used were to be condemned in them, who tooke on them very many and strange Revelations; how came it to passe that Daniel both condemned it. velations; how came it to paffe that Daniel both condemned the haftie fentence of to Nabuchodonosor against the Magicians of Chalden, and in a fort forbad it? especially confidering that fuch kind of people God himselfe commanded to be slaine. To this, divers answers many be given. First, it seemeth that Daniel had respect to those Chaldeans, because they acknowledged that the Dreame of the king, which himselfe had forgotten, could not be knowne to any man by any Art either Naturall or Diabolicall: For there is none other (faid the Chaldeans) that can declare it before the king, except the Gods, whose dwelling is not with flesh: and herein they confessed the power of the Ever-living God.

Secondly, it may be conjectured (and that with good reason) that among so many learned men, some of them did not exercise themselves in any evill or unlawfull Arts, but were meerely Magicians and Naturalists: and therefore when the king commanded, to kill all, Daniel perswaded the contrary, and called it a hasty judgement, which proceeded with furie without examination. And that some of those mens studies and professions were lawfull, it may be gathered by Daniels instruction: for himselfe had bin taught by them, and was called chiefe of the Inchanters: of which some were termed Soothfayers, others Aftrologians, others Chaldwans, others Magi or Wife-men : and therefore of Thirdly, Daniel misliked and forbad the execution of that judgement, because it was unjust. For howsoeverthose men might deserve punishment for the practice of unlawfull Arts (though not unlawfull according to the Law of that State) yet herein they were altogether guiltlesse. For it exceeded humane power to pierce the Kings thought, which the Divell himselfe could not know. So then in Daniels dislike, and hindering of the execution of sentence of death pronounced against the Magicians, there is no absolute justifying of their practice and profession.

The abuse of things which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemne the right use of them.

TOtwithstanding this mixture every where, of good with evill, of falf-hood with truth, of corruption with cleannesse and purity: The good, The truth, The puritie in every kind may well be embraced: As in the ancient worshipping of God by Sacrifice, there was no man knowing God among the Elders, that therefore forebare to offer Sacrifice to the God of all power, because the Divell in the Image of Bal, Aftaroth, Chemoth, Jupiter, Apollo, and the like was fo adored.

Neither did the abuse of Astrologie terrifie Abraham (if we may beleeve the most ancient and religious Historians) from observing the motions and natures of heavenly bodies; neither can it dehort wife and learned men in these dayes from attributing those vertues, influences, and inclinations to the Starres and other lights of Heaven, which God hath given to those his glorious creatures.

The Sympatheticall and Antipatheticall working of Herbes, Plants, Stones, Minerals, with their other utmost vertues, sometimes taught by the Divell, and applyed by his Ministers to harmefull and uncharitable ends, can never terrific the honest and learned Phyfician or Magician from the using of them to the helpe and comfort of Mankind: neither can the illufions, whereby the Divell betrayeth fuch men as are fallen from God, make other men reject the observations of Dreames; so farre as with a good Faith and a Religious caution they may make use of them.

Lastly, the prohibition to marke slying of Fowles (as signes of good or evill successed hathno reference at all to the crying of Crowes against Raine, or to any observation not superstitious, and whereof a reason or cause may be given. For if we confound Arts with the abuse of them, we shall not onely condemne all honest Trades and enterchange among men (for there are that deceive in all professions) but we shall in a short time burg in forgetfulnesse all excellent knowledge and all learning, or obscure and cover it over with a most scornefull and beggarly ignorance: and (as Plinie teacheth) we should shew our selves ingratos erga eos, qui labore curaq; lucem nobis aperuerunt in hac luce: Unthankfull we should shew our selves towards those, who with paines and care have discovered unto us light in this light.

Indeed not only these naturall knowledges are condemned by those that are ignorant; but the Mathematicks also and Professers thereof: though those that are excellentive To learned judge of it in this fort: In speculo Mathematico verum illud, quod in omni scibili culan comi quaritur, elucet; non modò remota similitudine, sed fulgida quadam propinquitate: In the Theologo.i. Glasse of the Mathematickes that Truth doth shine, which is sought in every kind of Known ledge : not in an obscuring, but in a neere and manifest representation, $. VI. Of the divers kindes of unlawfull Mazicke.

T is true that there are many Arts, if we may so call them, which are covered with the name of Magicke: and esteemed abusively to be as branches of that Tree, on whose root they never grew. The first of these hath the name of Necromancy or Goetia: and of this againe there are diverse kindes. The one is an Invocation at the graves of the dead, to whom the Divell himselfe gives answer in stead of those that seeme to appeare. For certaine it is, that the immortall foules of men doe not inhabit the dust and dead bodies, but they give motion and understanding to the living: death being nothing else but a separation of the body and soule: and therefore the soule is not to be found in the Graves.

A second practice of those men, who pay Tribute or are in league with Satan, is that of conjuring or of rayfing up Divels, of whom they hope to learne what they lift. These men are so distract, as they believe that by terrible words they make the Divell to tremble; that being once impaled in a Circle (a Circle which cannot keepe out a Mouse) they therein(as they suppose)insconce themselves against that great Monster. Doubtlesse, they forget that the Divell is not terrified from doing ill and all that is contrary to God and goodnesse, no, not by the fearefull word of the Almighty: and that he feared not to offer to fit in Gods seate, that he made no scruple to tempt our Saviour Christ, whom himselfe called the Sonne of God. So, forgetting these proud parts of his, an unworthy wretch will yet resolve himselfe, that he can draw the Divellout of Hell, and terrifie him with a Phrase: whereas in very truth, the obedience which the Divels seeme to use, is but thereby to possesse themselves of the bodies and soules of those which raise them up; as His Majestie in his Booke aforenamed hath excellently taught: That the Divels obedience Sumin minuted is only fecundum quid, scilicet ex pacto; respective, that is, upon bargaine.

Icannot tell what they can docupon those simple and ignorant Divels, which inha-de divisioning bite lamblicus imagination; but fure I amtherest are apt enough to come uncalled: and distribute inbite impuseus imagination; one time ramine tent and paffals, doe no way need any fuch confideration; of alwains attending the cogitations of their fervants and vaffals, doe no way need any fuch confideration; of inforcement.

Or it may be that these Conjurers deale altogether with Cardans mortall Divels, fol-que possibile lowing the opinion of Rabbi Avornathan and of Porphirius, who taught that these kinde impossibili. of Divels lived not above a thousand yeares : which Plutarch in his Treatise de Oraculo- L'Vive incap rum defectu confirmeth, making example of the great god Pan. For were it true that the Angderinit Divels were in awe of wicked men, or could be compelled by them, then would they al-Datib.to. wayes feare those words and threats, by which at other times they are willingly maste- cusaexor. 1.23 red. But the Familiar of Simon Magus when he had lifted him up in the Ayre, saft him headlong out of his clawes, when he was fure he should perish with the fall. If this perhaps were done by S. Peters Prayers (of which S. Peter no where valunteth) yet the fame Eures will Etta ! prancke at other times upon his owne accord the Divell played with Theodotus: who the said. transported(as simon Magus was supposed to have beene) had the same mortall fall that he had. The like successe had Budas, a principall pillar of the Manichaean Heresie, as So- Lib. 1.6.217 crates in his Ecclefiafticall History witnesseth; and for a manifest proofe bereof we see in every day, that the Divell leaves all Witches and Sorcerers at the Gallowes, for whom at other times he maketh himselfe a Pezasus, to conveigh them in haste to places far distant, or at least makes them so thinke : For to those that received not the truth (faith Saint Paul) Godsball send them frong illusions. Of these their supposed transportations (yet agreeing with their confessions) His Majestie in the second Booke and the fourth Chapter of the Demonologie, hath confirmed by unanswerable reasons, that they are meerely il-Infive. Another fort there are who take on them to include Spirits in Glaffes & Crystals. of whom Cufanus: Fatui sunt incantatores, qui in ungue & vitro volunt spiritum includere. quia Spiritus non clauditur corpore: They are foolish Inchanters, which will shut up their pirits within their nailes or in Glasse: for a Spirit cannot be inclosed by a body.

There is also another Art besides the afore-mentioned, which they call Theurgia, or White Magick; a pretended conference with good Spirits or Angels, whom by Sacrifice and Invocation they draw out of Heaven, and communicate withall. But the administring Spirits of God, as they require not any kind of adoration due unto their Creator; fo feeing they are most free Spirits, there is no man fo abfurd to thinke (except the divel have corrupted his understanding) that they can be constrained or commanded out of Heaven by threats. Wherefore let the professiours thereof cover themselves how they please by a professed puritie of life, by the ministerie of Infants, by fasting and abstinence in generall; yet all those that tamper with immateriall substances and abstract natures. either by Sacrifice, Vow, or Inforcement, are men of evill faith, and in the power of Sa-10 tan. For good Spirits or Angels cannot be constrained; and the rest are Divels, which willingly obey.

Other forts there are of wicked Divinations: as by fire, called Pyromantia: by water, called Hydromantia: by the ayre, called Mataotechnia, and the like.

The last, and (indeed) the worst of all other is Fascination or Witchcraft: the Practifers whereof are no leffe envious and cruell, revengefull and bloudy, than the Divell himselfe. And these accursed creatures having sold their soules to the Divell, worketwo wayes: either by the Divell immediately, or by the art of poyloning. The difference be tweene Necromancers and Witches, His Majestie hath excellently taught in a word : that the one (in a fort) command; the other obey the Divell.

There is another kind of pettie Witchery (if it be not altogether deceit) which they call charming of Beafts and Birds, of which Pythagor as was accused, because an Eagle lighted on his shoulder in the Olympian fields. But if the same exceeded the Art of Falconrie, yet was it no more to be admired then Mahomet's Dove, which he had used to feed with Wheate out of his eare: which Dove, when it was hungrie, lighted on Mahimets shoulder, and thrust his Bill therein to finde his breake-fast : Mahomet perswading the rude and simple Arabians, that it was the Holy Ghost that gave him advice. And certainly if Banks had lived in elder times, he would have shamed all the Inchanters of the World: for who foever was most famous among them, could never master or instruct any beaft as he did his Horfe.

For the drawing of Serpents out of their Dens, or killing of them in the holes by In chantments (which the Marsians a people of Italie practifed : Colubres disrumpit Marsia cantu : inchanting Marsia makes the snakes to burst.) That it hath beene used it appeares, Pfalme 58.6. though I doubt not, but that many Impostures may be in this kinde, and even by naturall causes it may be done. For there are many Fumes that will either draw them out or destroy them; as womens haire burnt, and the like. So many things may be layed in the entrance of their holes that will allure them: and therein I find no other Magicke or Inchantments than to draw out a Mouse with a piece of tosted Cheese.

Of divers waves by which the Divell (cemeth to worke his wonders.

But to the end that we may not dote with the Manichees, who make two powers of gods: that we doe not give to the Divellany other dominion than he half (not to speake of his abilitie, when he is the Minister of Gods vengeance; as when Egypt, according to David, was destroyed by evill Angels) he otherwise worked but three wayes. The first is by moving the cogitation and affections of men: The fecond by the exquisize knowledge of Nature and the third by deceit, illusion, and false femblance. And that they cannot worke what they would, G. Parifienfis giveth three causes: the first, a naturall impotency: the second, their own reason disswading them from daring overmuch, or indeed (and that which is the only certaine cause) the great mercy of the Creator, Tenens eos ligatas (faith the fame Author) velut immanissimas bel- simpanisae lum. S. Augustine was of opinion that the Frogges which Pharach's Sorcerers produced university as the were not naturall, but that the Divell (by betraying of their fenfes that looked on) made them appeare to be fuch. For as Varius observeth, those Frogges of the Inchangers were not found corrupted as those of Moses were, which might argue that they were not creatures indeed. Hereof faith Saint Augustine : Nec fane Damones naturas creant, sed qua à Deo creata funt commutant, ut videantur effe quod non funt : The Divels create not any natures but so change those that are created by God, as they seeme to be that which they be not : of which in the 83. question he giveth the reason. Damon quibusdam nebulis implet omnes meatus intelligentia, per quos aperire lumen rationis radius mentis solet, (that is) The Divell fils with certaine clouds all passages of the understanding, by which the beame of the minde is wont to open the light of reason.

And as Tertullian in his Booke de anima rightly conceiveth, if the Digell can possesse himselfe of the eves of our mindes and blinde them, it is not hard for him to dazell those of the body. For (out of doubt) by the same way that God passeth out, the Divellentreth in, beginning with the fantasie, by which he doth more easily betray the Maxima vis est other faculties of the foule: for the fantasie is most apt to be abused by vaine appre-

Aquinas on the contrary held that those Frogges were not imaginarie, but such indeed as they seemed : not made Magica artis ludibrio, which indeed agreeth not with the Arts but (according to Thomas) Per aptam & idoneam agentium & patientium applicationeme By an apt and fit applying of agents and patients. And this I take to be more probable. For Moses could not be deceived by that sleight of false semblance; and Saint Augustine in another case like unto this (to wit of the turning of Diomedes his companions into Birds, per attiva cum passivis, inclineth rather to this opinion: though I am not perswaded that

Saint Augustine beleeved that of Diomedes. And this opinion of Thomas, G. Parisiensis a man very learned also confirmeth. For speaking of naturall Magick he useth these words: Deleg 024 feb De hujusmodi autem operibus est subita generatio ranarum, & pediculorum & vermium, aliorumq, animalium quorundam:in quibus omnibus sola natura operatur, verum adhibitis adjutoriis, qua ipsa semina natur a confortant & accuunt, it a ut opus generationis tantum accelerent, ut eis qui hoc nesciunt non opus natura videatur (qua tardius talia efficere consuevit) sed potentia Damonum, &c.to which he addeth: Qui autem in his docti sunt, talianon mitantur, sed solum Creatorem in his glorificant: In such workes (faith he) the sodaine generation of Frogges and Lice, and Wormes, and some other creatures is: in all which Nature alone worketh; but by means strengthening the Seeds of Nature, & quickning them; in such wise that they so hasten the worke of generation, that it seemeth to the ignorant not to be the worke of Nature, which usually worketh more leisurely, but they think it is done by the powers of Divels, But they who are learned in these Arts marvaile not at such working but glorificthe Creator. Now power, but of God onely. For shall we fay, he causeth sometimes thunders, lightnings, and tempests; and can infect the ayre, as well as move it or compresse it; who knowes not that these things are alfo natural. Or may it be objected that he fore-telleth things before they happen, which exceedeth nature, and is no illusion. It is true, that he sometimes dothit; but how ? Inelder ages he stole his knowledge out of the predictions of the Prophets: and he foretold the death of Saul, at fuch time as he was in his own possession and power to dispose of. And he that hath lived from the infancic of the world to this day, and observed the Ephez 2. 56 successe of every counsaile: he that by reason of his swift motions can informe him-Diabolus magfelfe of all places, and preparations: he that is of counfaile with all those that studie & numbabetrepractife subversion and destruction: he that is Prince of the ayre, and can thence bet-resimilaries ter judge, than those that inhabite the earth: if he should not sometimes, yea if he momentum by these two waves the Divels doe must frequently worke, (to wit) by knowing the uttermost of nature; and by illusion: for their is no incomprehensible or unsearchable to give impediment) it were very strange. For we see that wise and learned men doe day de Angule Ang oftentimes should not very oftentimes ghesse rightly of things to come (where God pleaseth not queris megating and due de dripped oftentimes by comparing like causes conceive rightly of like effects, before they happen: and yet where the Divell doubteth, and would willingly keepe his credit, he ever, more answereth by Riddles: as

If Crasus over Halvs goe, Great Kingdomes he shall overthrow.

Which answer may be taken either way: either for the overthrow of his own King. dome, or of his Enemies. And thus far we grant the Divell may proceed in predictions, which (otherwise) belong to God onely, as it is in Esay: Shew the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that ye are Gods; shew us at all times and certainly what to come. Solius enim divina intelligentia ac sapientia est, occulta no se de revelare; It isoni, proper to Gods understanding and wisedome to know and reveale hidden things.

That none was ever raised from the dead by the power of the Divell: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

TO conclude, it may be objected that the Divell hath raised from the dead: and that others by his power have done the like, as in the example given of Samuel raised by the Witch of Endor: which were it true, then might it indeed beaffirmed, that some of the Divels acts exceeded all the powers of nature, false semblance, and other illusions. Justine Martyr was sometime of the opinion, that it was Samul indeed; and so was Ambrose, Lyra, and Burgensis, from which authorities those men borrow strength which so believe. But Martyr changed his opinion; and so did S. Angustine, who at first seemed to be indifferent: For in his questions upon the Old and New Testa ment, he accounted it deteftable to think that it was Samuel which appeared: and these be his words elsewhere to the same effect: In requie sunt anima piorum à corpore separata impiorum autempænas luunt donec istarum ad vitam aternam illarum verò ad aternammortem quasecunda dicitur, corpora reviviscant: The soules of the godly separated from their bodin are at rest, but those of the wicked suffer punishment, till the bodies of the just rise to eterny life, and of the wicked to an eternall and second death.

And (besides S. Augustine) Justine Martyr, Helarius, Tertullian, Athanasius, Chrysostom, and others, believed firmely, and taught it: that the foules of men being once separate from their bodies, did not wander on the earth at all: Credere debemus (faith Cyrill) quim à corporibus fanctorum anima abicrint tanquam in manus charifsimi patris Bonitatidivina commendari. We must believe when the soules of holy men are departed from their bodies, that they be commended to the divine Goodnesse, as into the hands of a most deare Father. If then they be in Heaven, the power of the Divell cannot stretch so high: if in Hell, Ab infirno nulla est redemptio: From hell there is no redemption. For there are but two habitations after death: Unum (faith Augustine) in igne aterno; alterum in regno aterno; The one international ternall fire; the other in God's eternall Kingdome. And though it be written in Jure Pontificio, that many there are who believe that the dead have againe appeared to the living; yet the Glosse upon the same Text findes it ridiculous: Credunt & male, quia sunt Phantasmata (faith the Glosse) They believe, and they believe amisse, because they be but Phantasmes or Apparitions. For whereas any fuch voyce hath beene heard, faying, I am the Souleof fuch a one : Hec oratio à fraude atq, deceptione diabolica est; That speech is framed by the fraud and deception of the Divell, faith Chry fostome. Likewise of the same, faith Tertullian Absit ut animam cujuslibet sancti nedum Propheta, à damonio credamus extractam; Godforbid that we should thinke that the soule of any boly man, much lesse of a Prophet, should be

It is true that the Scriptures call that apparition, Samuel; so doe they the wooden images, Cherubins: and false brazen gods are gods, and the like. And whereas these of the contrary opinion build upon that place of the 26. of Ecclefiafticus (a booke not numbred among the Canonical Scriptures, as S. Augustine himselfe in this Treatise, if it be his, De cura pro mortuis agenda, confesseth) yet Siracides, following the literall sense and phrase of the Scriptures, proveth nothing at all: Forthough the Divell would willingly per-fwade, that the foules (yea even of just men) were in his power; yet so farre is it from the promifes of the Scriptures, and from Gods just and mercifull nature, and so contrary to all divine reason, as Saint Augustine (or whosoever wrote that booke before cited) might rightly terme it a detestable opinion so to thinke. For if God had so absolutely forsaken Saul, that he refused to answer himeither by Dreames, by Urim, or by his Prophets . it were fortish to conceive, that he would permit the Divell, or a wicked Witch, to raise a Prophet from the dead in Sauls respect: it being also contrary to his own divine Law to 1 Kin. 17.223 askecounfell of the dead; as in Deuteronomy 18. and elsewhere. Therefore it was the 2 kings 4:240 Divell, and not the foule of a dead body, that gave answer and advice.

But because Helias and HeliZeus had raised some from the dead by the power of God; northurn ere uni those Divels which S. Augustine calleth Ludisscatores animantium sibi subjectorum; Mock quam excitavits ers of their owne vassals, casting before their eyes a semblance of humane bodies, and framing founds to their eares like the voyces of men, doe also perswade their gracelesse and accurfed attendants, that themselves both possesses, have power over the soules of men. Eludit Diabolus aciem tum (pectantium, tum etiam cogitantium, faith L. Vives; The Divell beguileth the sense both of the beholders, in of those that so imagine. These then are the bounds of the Divels power, whom if we will not feare, we must feare to sinne. For when he is not the instrument of Gods vengeance, he can touch no man that makes not himselfe his voluntary vaffall: Potest ad malum invitare, non potest trahere, saith S. Augustine; be can alo lure, but he cannot enforce to evill. Such as thinke otherwise, may goe into the number rea breadth as three Charriots might passe on the Rampire in front: these wals were garnished with 1500. Towers, which gave exceeding beauty to the rest, and strength, no lesse admirable for the nature of those times.

But this City (built in the Plaines of Assyria, and on the bankes of Tygris, and in the region of Eden) was founded long before Ninus time; and (as ancient Historians report, and more lately Nauclerus) had the name of Campfor, at fuch time as Ninus amplified the fame, and gave it a wall, and called it after his owne name.

For these workes of Babylon and Nineve begun by Nimrod in Chaldea, and in Assyria, Herodisi Ninus and Semiramis made perfect. Ninus finished Nineve, Semiramis Babylon: where Juliulia. in the fought to exceed her husband by far. Plu-10 tarch reporteth that Semiramis defired her husband Ninus, that he would grant unto her the absolute soveraigne power for one day. Diod. Siculus out of Athenaus, and others, speakes of five dayes. In which time (moved either with defire of rule, or licentious liberty, or with the memory of her husband Menon, who perished for her) she caused Nimus her husband to be flaine. But this feemeth rather a fcandall cafton her by the Greekes, Howfoever Ninus came to his end, Semiranis took on her after his death the fole me of the Affyrian Empire: of which, Ninus was faid to be the first Monarch, because he changed his feat from Babylonia in Chaldaa, to Nineve in Affyria. Justin reports that Se miramis (the better to invest her self, and in her beginning without murmure or offence to 20 take on her fo great a charge) presented her selfe to the people in the person of her some Ninias or Zameis, who bare her externall forme and proportion without any fensible

This report I take also to be fained, for which many arguments might be made. But as she ruled long, so she performed all those memorable acts which are written of her by the name of Semiramis, and fubscribed that letter which she sent to the King of India(her last challenge and undertakenconquest) by her owne name. And were it true that her fonne Ninias had fuch a stature at his Fathers death, as that Semiramic (who was very personable) could be taken for him; yet it is very unlikely that she could have held the Empire from him 42 yeares after by any fuch fubtilty : (for fo long the reigned after the 30 death of her husband:) but it may be true that Ninias or Zameis (being wholly givento his pleasures, as it is written of him) was well pleased with his Mothers prosperous government and undertakings.

Of Semiramis parentage and education, and Metamorphofis of her Mother.

Ome Writers (of which Plutarch is one) make this famous woman to have been of base parentage, calling her after the name of her Country, a Syrian. Berofit Cals her after the name of her City wherein she was borne, Semiramis Ascalonzis, of Ascalon, the ancient City and Metropolis of the Philistims. Others report her be the daughter of Derceta, a Curtizan of Ascalon, exceeding beautifull. Others fay that this Derceta or Dercetis, the mother of Semiramis, was fometimes a Recluse, and had profest a holy and a religious life; to whom there was a Temple dedicated, feated on the banke of a Lake adjoyning to Afcalon; and afterward falling in love with a godly young man, she was by him made with childe, which (for feare of extreme punishment) she conveyed away, and caused the same to be hidden among the high reedes which grew on the bankes of the Lake: in which (while the childe was left to the mercy of wilde beafts) the same was fed by certaine birds, which used to feed upon or neere those waters. But I take this tale to be like that of Lupa the Harlot that fostered Romulus. For fome one or other adjoyning to this Lake, had the charge and fosteridge of this childe, who being perchance but some base and obscure creature, the mother might thereby hope the better to cover her dishonor and breach of vow; norwithstanding which she was cast from the top ofher Temple into the Lake adjoyning, and (as the Poets nave in made) changed by Venus into a Fish, all but her face, which stil held the same beauty & hur mane shape. It is thought that from this Derceta the invention of that Idoll of the Philiphara into a Fish, all but her face, which stil held the same beauty & hur mane shape. It is thought that from this Derceta the invention of that Idoll of the Philiphara into a Fish, all but her face, which stil held the same beauty & hur mane shape. Of her Expedition into India, and death after discomfiture: with a note of the improbability,

But for her Pedigree, I leave it to the Affyrian Heralds: and for her vicious life, I afcribe the report thereof to the envious and lying Grecians. For delicacy and case doe more often accompany licentiousnesses in men and women, than labour and hazzard doe. And if the one halfe be true which is reported of this Lady, then there never lived any Prince or Princesse more worthy of fame than Semiramis was, both for the workes she did at Babylon and elsewhere, and for the warres she made with glorious o faccesse: all but her last enterprise of India, from whence both Strabo and Arianus report that she never returned : and that of all her most powerfull Army there survived but onely twenty persons: the rest being either drowned in the River of Indus, dead of the famine, or flaine by the word of Staurobates. But as the multitude which went out are more than reason hath numbred: so were those that returned lesse than could have escaped of fuch an Army, as confifted of foure millions and upwards. For these numbers which she levied by her Lievtenant Dercetaus, (saith Suidas) did confist of Foot-men three millions; of Horse-men one million; of Chariots armed with hookes on each side, Swid 58.45 dies; one hundred thousand; of those which fought upon Camels as many; of Camels for burden two hundred thousand; of raw Hides for all uses three hundred thousand; of Galalies with brazen heads three thousand, by which she might transport over Indus at once three hundred thousand Souldiers: which Gallies were furnished with Syrians, Phanicians, Cilicians, and men of Cyprus. These incredible and impossible numbers, which no one place of the earth was able to nourish (had every man and beast but fed upon grasse) are taken from the authority of Ctessas whom Diodorus followeth. But as the one may be taxed with many frivolous reports: fo Diodorus himselfe hath nothing of certainty, but from Xernes expedition into Greece and afterwards: whose Army (though the same was farre inferiour to that of semiramis) yet it had weight enough to overload the beliefe of any reasonable man. CHAP. I.

Of the time of the birth of Abraham: and of the use of this question, for the ordering of the Story of the Assyrian Empire.

of some of the successors of Semiramis: with a briefe transition to the question, about the time, of the birth of Abraham.

CHAP.I.S.I.

Frer the death of Semiramis, Ninias or Zameis succeeded her in the Empire, on whom Berosus Annianus bestowes the conquest of Battria, and the overthrow of Zoroaster; contrary to Diodorus, Justine, Orosius, and all other approved Writers. For Ninias being esteemed no man of warre at all; but altogether seminine, and subjected to ease and delicacy, there is no probability in that opinion. Now because there was nothing performed by this Nimias of any moment, other than that out of jealousie hee every yeare changed his Provinciall Governours, and built Colledges for the Chaldman Pricits, his Aftronomers: nor by Arius his fucceffor, whom Suidus callett Thuras; but that he reduced againe the Battrians & Caspians, revolted (as it seemeth) in Ninias his time: nor of Aralius, the successor of Arius; but that he added sumptuosity, invented jewels of gold and stone, and some engins for the warre: I will for this present passethem over, and a while follow Abraham, whose wayes are warrantable, (till we meete these Assyrians againe in this story) by whom and by whose issue we shall best give date to the Kings of Babylon: Abraham living at once with Ninus, Ninias, Semiramis, Orinias, & Xernes or Balanius. For otherwise if we seek to prove things certain by the uncertaine, and judge of those times, which the Scriptures set us downe without errour, by the reignes of the Assyrian Princes: we shall but patch up the story at adventure, and leave it in the same consustion, in which to this day it hath remained. For where the Scriptures doe not helpe us, Mirum non est in rebus antiquis Historiam non constare; No Plus in These marvaile if then in things very ancient, History want assurance.

The better therefore to finde out, in what age of the World, and how long these Asyrian kings reigned, as also for other good causes, we must first assure the time of Abrahams birth, and in what yeare the same hapned after the floud. Now since all agree, that the fortieth three yeare of Ninus was the birth-year of Abraham; by proving directly out of the Scriptures, in what yeare after the floud the birth of Abraham hapned, we shall there. by set all the rest in square and order. But of this time there is much jangling betweene by let all the letters, which follow the Hebrew account, and others: the most part making 292.or 293. yeares; others 352. yeares betweene Abrahams birth and the floud: a matter often disputed, but never concluded.

Architechus de temporibus (as we finde him in Anneus) makes bur 250. yeares from the floud to Ninus: then feeing that Abraham was borne in the fortieth three yeere of Ninus, according to Eusebius and S. Augustine, it followeth by the addition of those two numbers, that the yeare of Abrahams birth was in the yeer after the floud 293.or, as the most 10 part of all Chronologers gather, the yeare 292. Now, fince I doe here enter into that never resolved question, and Labyrinth of times, it behoveth meto give reason for my owne opinion: and with so much the greater care and circumspection, because I walk aside, and in a way apart from the multitude; yet not alone, and without companions, though the fewer in number: with whom I rather chook to endure the wounds of those darts, which Envie casteth at novelty, than to goe on setly and fleepily in the easie wayes of ancient mistakings: seeing to be learned in many en rors, or to be ignorant in all things, hath little diversity.

A proposall of reasons or arguments, that are brought to prove Abraham was borne in the year 292. after the Flowd, and not in the yeare 352.

Hose which seeke to prove this account of 292. yeares, betweene the general floud and Abrahams birth, ground themselves, first on these words of the Scripture: So Terah lived 70 yeares, and begot Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: secondly, upon the opinion of Josephus, S. Augustine, Beda, Isidore, & many of the ancient Hebrews before them : authorities (while they are flightly lookt over) feeming of great weight.

From the place of Scripture last remembred, the later Chronologers gather these arguments. First out of the words as they lie; That Terah 4 70. yeares begot Abraham, Nat hor and Haran: and that Abraham being the first named, Abraham being the worthiest, Abraham being the fon of the promise, ought in this respect to be accounted the eldest fonne of Terah, and so necessarily borne in the seventieth yeare of his life. Secondly, it was of Abraham that Moses had respect, in whom the Church of God was continued, who was heire of the bleffing; and not of Nahor and Haran: for the scope of this Chapter was to set downethe Genealogy of Christ, from Adam to Abraham, without all regard of Naher and Haran.

It is thirdly objected, that if Abraham were not the eldest sonne, then there can be no certainty of his age, and so are all future times made doubtfull. For it cannot then bee proved, that Abraham was borne more affuredly in the 130. year of Terah his age, that in the 131. 132. &c. Moses having no where set downe precisely that Abraham went into Canaan that very yeare, in which his Father died.

braham himselfethought it a wonder to be made a Father at 100. yeares.

The answer to one of the objections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Mesopotamia into Canaan : and it after his Fathers death.

O answer all which objections, it is very easie, the way being prepared thereton by divers learned Divineslong fince, and to which I will adde somewhat of mine owne, according to the small talent which God hathgiven me. Now forafmuch as the state of the question cannot well be scanned, unlesse the time of Abrahams journey into Canaan be first considered of; before I descend unto the particular examination of these arguments, I will make bold with order and method so farre, asco searching to a strange tradition concerning his travailes, that serveth as a ground for this opinion & a bulwarke against all that can be faid to the contrary.

But it is conceived that Abraham made two journies into Canaan; the latter after his Fathers death, the former prefently upon his calling; which he performed without delay, not flaying for his fathers death at Haran: a conjecture, drawn from a place in the Emy, not the Hebrewes, where it is written, By faith Abraham (when he was called) obeyed God Ho. II. 8. to goe out into a place which he should afterward receive for inheritance: and he went out, not knowing whither he went. This supposition (if it be granted) serves very well to uphold the opinion, that can ill stand without it. Let us therefore see whether we may give credit to the supposition it selfe.

Surely, that Abraham first departed Charran or Haran after the death of Terah his Father, the same is proved, without the admission of any distinction, by these words of St. 10 Stephen: And after bis Father was dead, Godbrought him into this Land, where ye now awell, Alista that was, out of Haran into Canaan. Against which place so direct and plaine, what force hath any mans fancy or supposition, perswading, that Abraham made two journies into Canaan; one before Terahs death, and another after: no fuch thing being found in Scriptures, nor any circumstance, probability; or reason to induce it? For if any man out of this place before alledged can picke any argument, proving, or affoording any strong presumption, that Abraham past into Canaan, and then returned unto Haran, from Holais. whence he departed a fecond time: then I thinke it reason, that he be believed in the rest. But that he performed the commandement of God after his Fathers death, leaving Ur and Haran for Canaan, it is as true as the Scriptures themselves are true. For after his Father was dead, (faith Martyr Stephen) Godbrought him into this Land. And, as Beza noteth, if Abraham made a double journey into Canann, then must it be inferred; that Moses omitted the one, and Stephen afterwards remembred the other: and whence had Stephen, faith Beza, the knowledge of Abrahams comming into Canaan, but out of Moses? For if Stephen had spoken any thing of those times, differing from Moses, he had offered the Jewes, his adverfaries, too great an occasion both of scandalizing himselfe, and the Gospell of Christ. Indeed we shall finde small reason to make us think that Abraham passed and repassed those wayes, more often than he was enforced so to doe; if we consider, that he had no other guide or comforter in this long and wearifome journey, than the strength of his faith in Gods promise: in which if any thing would have brought him to despaire, he had more cause than ever man had to fall into it. For he came into a Region of strong and stubborne nations: a nation of valiant and refolved Idolaters. He was befieged with famine at his first arrivall, and driven toffie into Egypt for reliefe. His wife was old, and he had no fonne to inherit the promife. And when God had given him Isaac, he commanded him to offer him up to himselfe for facrifice: all which discomforts he patiently and constantly underwent.

Secondly, let us confider the wayes themselves, which Abraham had to passe over; the length whereof was 300. English miles; and through Countries of which he had no manner of experience. He was to transport himselfe over the great river of Euphrates, to travell through the dangerous and barren Defarts of Palmyrena, and to climbe over the great and high mountaines of Libanus, Hermon or Gilead: and whether these were easie walkes for Abraham to march twice over, containing, as aforefaid, 300 miles in length, letevery reasonable man judge. For if he travelled it twice; then was his journey in all 1800. miles from Ur to Haran: and from Haran twice into Canaan. But were there no other argument to disprove this fancy; the manner of Abrahams departing from Haran hath more proofe (that he had not animum revertendi, not any thought of looking backeward) than any mans bare conjecture, be he of what antiquity or authority foever. For thus it is written of him, Then Abrahamtooke Sara bis wife, and Lot his brothers fon, and Gentage all their substance that they possest, and the soules that they had gotten in Haran: & they departed to go to the land of Canaan, & to the land of Canaan they came. Now if Abraham brought all with him that was deare unto him; his wife, and kinfinen, and his, and their goods: it is not probable that he meant to walke it backe againe for his pleasure, in so warme, dangerous, and barrena Country as that was: or if he could have been ethereto moved, it is more likely that he would have then returned, when he was yet unfettled, and prest with extreme famine at his first arrivall. For had his Father beene then alive, he might have hoped from him to receive more affured comfort and reliefe, than among the Egyptians, to whom he was a meere stranger both in religion and Nation.

What the cause might bee of Abrahams returne to Haran, as I will not enquire of them, that without warrant from the Scriptures have fent him backe thither, about the time of his fathers death: fo they perhaps, if they were urged, could fay little elfe. than that without such a second voyage their opinion were not maintainable. One thing in good reason they should doe well to make plaine, if it benot over-troublesome. They fay that Abraham was in Haran at his Fathers death, or some time after, being then by their account 135. yeares old, or a little more. How then did it happen, that he left quite undone the businesse, which, as we reade, was within foure or five yeares after that time his greatest, or (as may seeme) his onely care? Did not he binde with a very so Jemne oath his principall fervant, in whom he reposed most considence, to travaile into those parts, and seeke out a Wife for Isaac his sonne? and doth it not appeare by all circumstances, that neither he nor his servant were so well acquainted in Mesopotamia, 10 that they could particularly defigne any one woman, as a fit match for Isaac? Surely if Abraham had beene there in person so lately, as within source or five yeares before, he would not have forgotten a matter of fuch importance; but would have trusted his own judgement, in choosing a woman, fit for her piety, vertue, and other defireable qualities, to be linked in marriage with his onely fonne, who was then five and thirty yeares old; before which age most of the Patriarchs after the Floud had begotten children: rather than have left all at randome to the confideration of a fervant, that neither knew any, nor was knowne of any in that Country. But let it be supposed (if it may be beleeved) that either Abraham forgot his businesse when he was there, or that somewhat hapned which no man can devise; What might be the reason, that Abrahams man, in doing his Ma 10 fters errand, was faine to lay open the whole ftory of his mafters prosperity, telling its newes, that Sarah had borne to him a fon in her old age ? If Abraham himselfe, a more certaine Author, had so lately beene among them, would not all this have beene anide tale? It were needlesse to stand long upon a thing so evident. Whether it were lawfull for Abrahamto have returned backeto Haran, would perhaps be a question hardly anfwerable: confidering how averse he was from permitting his sonne to be carryed this Gen.24.6.3 8. ther, even though a wife of his owne kinred could not have beene obtained without his personall presence. Jacob indeed was sent thither by his Parents, to take a Wife of his owne linage; not without Gods especiall approbation, by whose bleffing he prospered in that journey; yet he lived there as a fervant; fuffered many injuries; and finally was driven to convey himselfe away from thence by flight. For although it be not a fertence written, yet out of all written examples it may be observed, that God allowed not in his fervants any defire of returning to the place, from whence he hath taken, and transplanted them. That briefe faying, Remember Lots wife, containes much matter Let us consider Mesopatamia, from whence Abraham was taken, and Egypt, out of which the whole Nation of the Ifraelites were delivered: we shall find, that no bleshing issued from either of them, to the posterity of the Hebrewes. When Ezechias was visit ted with an honourable Embassie from Babel, it seemes that he conceived great pleasure in his minde, and thought it a piece of his prosperity; but the prophesie which thereupon he heard by Esay, made him to know, that the counsell of God was not agreed to ble to fuch thoughts: which more plainely appeared in a following generation, when by the waters of Babylon they fate downe and wept. Concerning Egypt we reade, that Sefac and Neco Kings of Egypt brought calamity upon Ifrael: also that their confidence in the Egyptian succours was the cause of their destruction. Where they were forbidden to returne into Egypt I doe not remember, nor can readily finde; but it is found in Deuteronomy, that God had faid, They (hould no more returne that way; which is given, as the reason, why their King might not cause the people to returne to Egypt, for the multiplying of his Horses. Whether the Lord had laid any such injunction upon Abraham of not returning to Mesopotamia, I cannot say; many things doe argue it probably: That he never returned, all circumstances doe (to my understanding) both strongly and neces-

But because this double passage of Abraham is but an imagination; and that imaginations of men are rather valuable among children, than that they can perswade those of judgement or understanding: I take it sufficient, that S. Stephen hath directly raught us, that Abraham left Haran, his father being dead. And for the rest, when they shew any one Scripture to proveit, I will beleeve as they doe. For all the travailes of Abraham are precisely set downe in the Scriptures : as first from ur or Camerina in Chaldea to Haran or Charran : and then from Haran (after his Fathers death) to Sichem; from Sichem

he removed to a mountaine betweene Bethel and Haie: thence into Egypt; from Egypt he returned thither againe, where Lot and he parted, because their flockes and heards of Cattell were more than could be fed in that part: from thence the fecond time hee removed to Mamre, neere Hebron: and thence having purfued Amraphel, and refcued Lot, heafter inhabited at Gerar, in the border of Idumea under Abimeles: and after neere unto it at Bersabe, at which time he was ready to offer up his some Isaac on the mountaine Moriab. But this fiction of his retrait to Haran or Charran, appeareth not in any one ftory, either divine or humane. Now, if it may be supposed, that braham had made any former journey into Canaan, as Levita his Cabala hath fained, it should in reason be therewithall beleeved, that he would in those his first travailes have provided himself of some certaine feate, or place of abiding: and not have come a fecond time, with his wife, kinfmen, family, goods and Cattel, not knowing whereon to rest himselfe. But Abraham when hecame from Charran, past through the North part of Canaan, thence to Sichem, and the Genzasi Plaine of Moriah: where finding no place to inhabite, he departed thence to Bethel, and Haie: and so from Nation to Nation, to discover and find out some sit habitation: from whence againe, as it is written in Genesis the eleventh, He went forth going and journying towards the South: and alwayes unfettled. By occasion of which wandring to and fro, fome fav, the Egyptians gave him and his the name of Hebrai.

Further, to prove that he had not formerly beene in the Countrey, we may note, Montenature to that ere he came unto Bethel and Haie, and at his first entrance into Canaan, God appeared unto him, faying, Unto thy feed will I givethis Land, shewing it him as unto a stranger therein, and as a Land to him unknowne. For Abraham without any other provident care for himselfe, beleeved in the Word of the living God: neither sending before, nor comming first to discover it; but being arrived, he received a second promise from God, that he would give those Countries unto him and his feed to inhabite and Laftly, what should move any man to thinke, that Moses would have omitted any fuch double journey of Abrahams, feeing he fetteth downe all his paffages else-where long and short ? as when he moved from Sichem, and seated betweene Haie and Bethel, the distance being but 20. miles: and when he moved thence to the valley of Mamre, being but 24. miles: and when heleft Mamre, and fate downe at Gerar, being leffe than fixe miles; No, Moses past over all the times of the first age with the greater brevity, to hasten him to the story of Abraham: shutting up all betweene the Creation and the Floud in fixe chapters; which age lasted 1656. yeeres: but he bestoweth on the story of Abraham, fourteene chapters, beginning with his birth in the eleventh, and ending with his death in the five and twentieth; and this time endured but 175. years. It hath therefore no face of truth, that Moses forgot or neglected any thing concerning Abrahams travels, or other actions: or that he would fet downe those small removes of five miles, and omic those of three hundred. For such a journey ingoing and comming would have ministred some variety of matter, or accident, worthy the inserting and adding to Abrahams storie.

The answer to another of the objections proposed, shewing that it was not unlikely, that Terali Should beget Abraham in his bundred and thirtieth yeere.

TOw touching the objection, where it is faid, that it was very unlikely that Terah should beget Abraham in his 130. yeere, feeing Abraham himselfe thought it 3 wonder to have a fon at an hundred: this is hardly worth the answering. This wonder is indeed mif-cast, and mistaken: Abraham having respect onely to Sarah his wife, when he spake of their many yeares. For when the Angel said unto Abraham in his Tent doore at Mamre, Loe Sarah thy wife shall have a Son, it followethin the next verse, Now Abraham and Sarah were old and fricken in age, and it reased to be with Sarah after the manner of women: therefore Sarah laughed, Gre.

So then in that it is said, it ceased to be with Sarah after the manner of women, it appeareth that the wonder was wrought on her, and not on Abraham. For Abraham by his fecond wife Keturah had many fonnes after Sarahs death, as Zimron, Jock han, Medan, Midien, Ishbak, and Shueb: and the eldest of these was borne 37. yeares after Isas: and the youngest forty yeeres after. What strangenesse then, that Terah being 130. yeeres old youngent forcy years old should beget Abraham, will they fay, may be gathered from this supposed despaire of A. inounce beget 25. Inounce of All braham at one hundred yeeres: For Sarah died in the yeere of the world 2145. and Isaac braham at one hundred yeeres. was borne in the yeare 2109. and Abraham did not marry Keturah till Sarah was buried. Was normed. So if we deduct the number of 2109, out of 2145, there remaineth 36. And therefore if Abraham begat 5. sons 36. years after this supposed wonder, & when Abraham was 137. yeares old: it is not strange that his father Terah should beget Abraham at 130. And if Civit.deid.16.6. Book, obed, and Jeffe, who lived so many yeares and ages after Abraham, begat sonnesate 100. yeares, or neere it, it cannot be marvailed at, that Terah begat Abraham at 130 and Abraham othersat the fameage and seven yeeres after.

> The answer to two more of the objections: Shewing that we may have certainty of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest Sonne: and that there was great cause, why in the story of Abraham his two brethren should be respected.

T followeth now to speake something to the objection, which brings Abrahams age altogether in doubt, except we allow him to be the eldest son of Terah, and borne -when Terab was 70. years old. For Abrahams age being made uncertaine, all succeeding times are thereby without any perfect rule or knowledge.

But this proposition, That we cannot be certaine of Abrahams age, unlesse we make him the eldest sonne, is false. For it is plaine in the Scriptures, that when Terah was 205. which was the yeare of his death: then was Abraham 75. And if you aske, how Ica judge of times, either preceding or fucceeding, by knowing that Abraham departed Ha ran at that age: I answer, That Saint Stephen hath toldus, that Abrahams departure sollowed the death of his Father Terah: and Terah died at 205. fo as the 75. yeare of Abraham was the 205. yeare of Terab: which knowne, there can be no errour in theaccount of times succeeding. Now to come to the objection, where it is said, That Moss had no respect unro Nachor and Haran, because they were out of the Church, but to 4braham onely, with whom Godeftablished the Covenant, and of whom Christ descent ded according to the flesh, &c. I answer, that Moses for many great and necessary canfes had respect of Nachor and Haran. For the succession of Gods Church is not withele fed by Abraham alone, but by the iffues of Nahor and Haran, were they Idolaters or o therwise. For Nakor was the Father of Bethuel, & Bethuel of Rebecca, the mother of Israel. and Haran was the Parent of Lot, Sarah, and Milcah: and Sarah was mother to Ifaac, and grandinother to Jacob: Milcab alfo the wife of Nahor, and mother of Bethuel, was Jacobs great grandmother: and the age of Sarab the daughter of Haran is especially noted, in that it pleased God to give her a son at 90. years, and when by nature she could not have conceived. And therefore, though it were not in regard of themselves, yet because both Nahor and Abraham married the daughters of their brother Haran; and because Isas married Rebecca the grand-childe of Nabor; and Jacob, Lea, and Rachel, the daughters of Labar, the grand-childe also of Nabor: it was not superfluous in Mofes to give light of these mens times and ages. And though sometime they worshipped strange gods, as it is 30f.24.2. yet I fee no cause to thinke, that they still continued Idolaters. For they beleevedand obeyed the calling of Abraham, leaving their naturall Countrey, and Cityof Ur in Chaldea, as Abraham did, and removed thence all, except Haran, who died before his Father Terab, ere they left Chaldea; but Lot, his forme, followed Abraham into Canaan; and Sarah, the fifter of Lot, Abraham married. Nahor also, who remained at Charran, gave his sonnes daughters to Isaac, and Jacob, his owne kins-men: he himselfe ha ving also married in his owne Family; not thinking it pleasing unto God to mixe themfelves with strangers and Idolaters. And that these men at length believed in the God of Abraham, it can no way be doubted. For when Laban had seene the servant of Abraham standing at the Wel beside Charran, he invited him to his Fathers house in this manner : Come in, thou bleffed of Jehovah, &c. And when this fervant of Abrahams demanded an answer as touching Rebecca, then answered Laban and Bethuel, and faid; This thing is proceeded of Jehovah: meaning, that it was the will of the true God it should be so; wherin he acknowledged Gods providence. Likewise in the following verse it is written; Take, goe, that fre may bethy Masters fins mife, even as Ichovah bath faid. This their oftenufing of the name of Jehovah, which is the proper name of the true God, it is a figne that they had the knowledge of him.

Now although it be the opinion of S. Chry fostome, and some later Writers, as Cajetan pleaster, Musculus, Calvin, Mercer, and others, that Laban was an Idolater, because hee retained certaine Idols, or household Gods, which Rachel stole from him; yet that he beleeved in the true God it cannot be denied. For he acknowledgeth the God of Abraham and of Nahor, and he called Abrahams fervant, bleffed of JEHOVAH, as aforefaid. So as for my self I dare not avow, that these men were out of the Church, who, sure I am, were not out of the faith.

That the naming of Abraham first of the three brethren, Gen. 11. v. 26. doth not prove that he was the eldest: together with divers reasons proving that Abraham was not the eldest for of Terah.

-O the maine objection; which I answer last, because it seemeth of most strength, by which, those that strive to shorten the times, endeavour to prove that Abraham was the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. yeare of Terahs life: grounding themselves first and chiefly on this place of the Scripture; And Terah lived Gen. 1. 26 70. yeeres, and beget Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: To this I fay, that although Abraham in this verse be first named, yet the same is no proofe at all that he was the eldest and firstborne sonne of Terah. For it is no necessary consequence, that the first named in Scriptures was therefore eldest inbloud and birth, neither dothit appeare, that it pleased God to make especiall choice of the first sonnes in nature and time: for Seth was not the first-borne of Adam; nor Isaac of Abraham; nor Jacob of Isaac; no Juda and Joseph of 74cob; nor David the eldeft of Jeffe; nor Solomon of David: as is formerly remembred.

But it is written of Noah: Noah was 500. yeeres old, and Noah begat Shem, Ham, and 74phet: shewing that at the 500. yeare of his age he began to beget the first of those three sonnes. For according to S. Augustine, speaking generally, Nec attendendus est in his ordo Aug. qualt super ativitatis, sed significatio futura dignitatis : in qua excelluit Abraham : The order of nati-Gen. 25. vitie is not here to be respected, but the signification of the future dignitie in which Abraham as preferred. And therefore as in the order of the sonnes of Noah : so is it here; where tis faid, that Terab lived 70. yeares, and begat Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: For it was ateere Terah began to beget Sonnes, himselfe being begotten by his Father Nacher at 29. as other his Ancestors were at 30. The like also happened to Noah: for whereas ddam begat Seth at 133. Enoth Kenan at 90. Kenan Mahalaleel at 70. Mahalaleel Jared at 60. Noah was yet 500. yeares old when he began to beget the first of his three sonnes. saforefaid. And S. Augustine, in the place before cited, rather inclineth to the opinion hat Abraham was the youngest of Terahs sonnes, than otherwise: though for his excelency he was worthily named first. His owne words are these: Fieri enim potuit ut poterior sit generatus Abraham : sed merito excellentiæ, qua in Scripturis valde commendatur rior fuerit nominatus. It might be, saith he, that Abraham was begotten later: but was first named in regard of his excellency, for which in Scripture hee is much commended. So as the haming first or last proveth nothing who was first or last borne: either in those issues of Noah, or in these of Terab: Neither hath God any respect of the eldest in nature, as touthing his election or spirituall blessing; for Moses nameth first the children of the promife, & the eldest and first in Gods favour. Pietas ergo, wel ipsapotius electio divina, que conitem secumetrahit pietatem, & Deitimorem, primas partes dat Semo in liberis Noa,& Arahamo in liberis Thare: Piety, faith he or rather divine election, which doth evermore draw with it or after it, piety and the feare of God gave place and precedency to Sem among the chiltren of Noah, and to Abraham among those of Thare.

For the rest it is manifest, that Abraham entred Canaan in the 75. yeare of his age. And was in Canaan that Hagar bare him Ismael, when Abraham had lived 86. yeares. It was General Gerar (the South border of Canaan) that Sarah bare Isaac, when Abraham had confuned 100. yeares. It was from the valley of Mamre in Caman that Abraham role out, when he rescued Lot and overthrew Amraphel: and he had then but the age of 83. yeares: editis as manifelt that he parted from Haran after his Father Terah was dead. But if Allera

Terah begat Abrahamat 70. yeare old, then must Abraham have been 135. yeares when he first set his foot in Canaan, seeing Terah must be dead ere he parted, and so 70. added to 135. make 205. the true age of Terah: which is contrary to all those places of Scripture before remembred. For he entred at 75. he rescued Lot at 83. he had Ismael at 86.

The second Booke of the first part

he at Isaac at 100. proved by the former places. Moreover, if Abraham were the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. yeare of his age: then had Terah lived till Isaac had beene 35. yeares old, and Ismael, 49. both which must then have beene borne in Mesopotamia, and therein fostered to that age: unlessewe should either deny credit to S. Stephen, who faith that Abraham departed from Mesepota. mia after his Fathers death: or else beleeve the interpretation of Daniel Angelocrator, who w in his Chronologia antoptica, saith it was about his Fathers death: because the Greek word may be transported by the Latine fub, as well as by post: which though elsewhereit may be, yet cannot it be so in this place. For it were most improperly spoken, to say that those things were done about Terahs death, which were 60. yeares before. Wherefore supposing Abraham to have been borne in the seventy year of Terah; we must give those times and places of birth to Abrahams children, which no authority will warrant; For A. braham had no children in Ur of Chaldaa, nor in Haran, nor in ten yeares after his arrival into Canaan. For the yeare of Terahs death, in which Abraham left Haran, was the year of the World 2083. and the yeare of Ismaels birth was the Worlds yeare 2094. which maketh 10. yeares difference. And that Isaac was borne in Canaan, and was to be offered, upon the mountaine Moriah therein, 39 miles from Berfabe, where Abraham then inhabi. ted:and that three Angels first of all appeared to Abraham in the valley of Mamre, no man

And therefore it cannot be that any of Abrahams fonnes were borne in Mesopotadoubteth. mia; nor while Terablived; nor in lesse than ten yeares after Terabs death: and then consequently was not Abraham the eldest sonne of Terab, nor borne in the 70. yeare of Thirdly, whereas Abrahamcame into Canaan at 75. if Terah had begotten him at 76 then had Terah lived but 145. for 70. and 75. make 145. which must also have beene the full age of Terah: but Terah lived 205. yeares; and therefore was not Abraham borness the 70. yeare of Terah.

Fourthly, the ages of Lot and Sarah make it manifest, that Haran was the elder, if m the eldest brother of Abraham; for Sarah or Isah wanted but ten yeares of Abraham age: Isaac being borne when Abraham was 100. and Sarah 90. yeares old.

It followeth then, that if Abraham had been the elder brother of Haran, Haran mil have begotten Sarah at nine yeares old: for granting that Haran was borne but oneyeare after Abraham, and Sarah within ten yeares as old as Abraham, then of necessity mult Haran begether, when he had lived but nine yeares; which were too ridiculous to im-

And that Ifeah was Sarah, Rab. Solomon affirmeth; both names, faith he, bearingthe gine. fame fignification; and names of principality. Againe, to what end was the word Ifth or Fisheab inserted in this place, if Sarah were not meant thereby . For, to speake of my thing superstuous, it is not used in Gods Booke: and if Iseah had not belonged to the story, it had beene but an idle name to no purpose remembred.

Now if it had been etrue (as those of the contrary opinion affirme) that Moles had no respect of Nahor and Haran, who were notwithstanding the Parents of Bethueland Rebecca, the mother of Ifrael, and of Christ: what regard then had Moses of Iscab in this place, were she not Sarah, but otherwise an idle name of whom there is nothing else first

The age also of Lot disproveth the eldership of Abraham: for Lot was called anold man when Abraham was but 83. years old: And if Lot were of a greater age than Abraham ham, and Haran were Father to Lot, Sarah, and Milcah; Abraham marrying one of Harans daughters, and Nahor the other, Sarahalfo being within ten yeares as old as Abrahamil may appeare to every reasonable man (not obstinate and prejudicate) that Haran was the eldest some of Terah, and not Abrahams: who also died first, and before his Father lest Ur in Chaldea. Also Lyra reasoneth against the opinion of Abrahams eldership, upon the fame place of Genefis: drawing argument from the age of Sarah, who was but ten years younger than Abraham himselfe. Lyra his words are these Si igitur Haran fuit junior igh Abraham

Abraham, sequitur quod non habebat decem annos quando genuit Saram : imo nec octo, esc. and afterward, & ideo melius videtur dicendum, quod Abraham fuit ultimo natus de tribus filis Thare, tamen nominatur primo, propter ejus dignitatem: & quia ponendus erat caput Hirpis & generationis sequentis : & quiaprimo factaest ei repromissio expressa de Christo. Gout supra dictum est de Sem, &c. If therefore (faith Lyra) Haran was younger than Ahraham bimselfe, it followeth that he was not ten yeeres old when he begat Sarah: And therfore it feemeth better to be faid, that Abraham was the last borne of the three sonnes of Thare. nemeribelesse he is named first for his dignitie, both because hee was to be ordained head of the flocke and generation following, and because the promise of Christ was first made unto him. o as before it is faid of Sem.

Aconclusion of this dispute, noting the Authors on both sides : with an admonition, that they which shorten the times make all ancient stories the more unprobable.

Therefore agreeth with the Scriptures, with Nature, Time, and Reason, that Haran was the eldest sonne of Terah, and not Abraham: and that Abraham was borne in the 130. yeare of Terahs life, and not in the 70. yeere. For Abraham departing Charran after Terah died, according to S. Stephen, and that journey by Abra- Action, all bam performed when he was 75. yeares old; these two numbers added make 205. yeers the full age of Terab: feeing that when Terab died, then Abraham entred Canaan. For Geniade my selfe, I have no other end herein than to manifest the truth of the Worlds Story. I reverence the judgements of the Fathers: but I know they were mistaken in particulars. Saint Augustine was doubtfull, and could not determine this controversie. For what soever is borrowed from him out of his fixteenth Booke de Civitate Dei cap. 15. the fame may be answered out of himselfe in his five and twentieth question upon Gen. But Saint Augustine herein followed Josephus and Isidor: and Beda followed S. Augustine. And it was out of a foolish pride and vanitie, that the Hebrewes and Fosephus sought to make Abraham the first borne: as if God had had respect to the eldest in nature. So did Josephus together with Nicholas Damascenus (thinking thereby to glorifie the Jewish Nation) make Abraham a king, entitling Sarah by the name of Queene Sarah : and faid that Abraham was followed with 318. Captaines, of which every one had an infinite multitude under him; trecentos & octodecim prafectos habuit : quorum singulis infinita multitudo parebat. And that Pharas invading him with a great Armie, tooke from him his Wife Sarah: Such fables argue that Josephus is not to be beleeved, but with discreete reservations.

This account of times, allowing no more than 292. yeares from the Floud to Abrabam, is upheld by many of the Hebrewes. But how should we value the opinion of such Chronologers, as take Amraphel for Nimrod? Surely, if their judgement in fuch matters were worthy to be regarded, it would have appeared in fetting downe the succession of the Persian Kings under whom they lived, whose Historie was not so farre remote in time, as these antiquites, nor wanting the light of many good writers. Yet groffely have they erred therein, and so familiar are their mistakings in all things of like nature, that we feldome find their opinion rehearfed without the confutation treading on the heeles of it. They of the Romane religion are also generally on the same side: it being a thing usuall among them, to maintaine whatfoever they have beene formerly knowne to hold and beleeve. Contrariwise, of the more ancient, Theodoret, and some following him: of later times, Beroaldus, Codoman, Peucer, Calvin, Junius, Beza, Broughton, Doct. Gibbons, and Moore, with divers of the Protestants, hold Abraham to have beene borne in the 130. yeare of his Father Terah. From these (as in a case not concerning any point in Religion) divers of the same Religion; and those neverthelesse good Authors, as Bucholcerus, Chitreus, Functius and others, are very averfe herein, especially Josephus Scaliger with his Sethus Calvifius, proclaiming Beroaldus an Arch-heretike in Chronologie, and condemning this opinion of his as poylonous. Contrariwife, Augustinus Torniellus a Priest of the Congregation of Saint Paul, a judicious, diligent, and free writer, whose Annales are newly ferforth, very earneftly defends the opinion, which I have already delivered; not alledging Beroaldus, nor any Protestant writer, as being perhaps unwilling to owe thankes to heretikes. For my felfe I doe neither millike the contrary opinion, because commonly commonly those of the Romish Religion labour to uphold it; nor favour this larger account of times, because many notable men of the Protestant writers have approved it; but for the truth it selfe. To strengthen which, after all these former reasons, and resi. monies of Scripture, I will adde thus much more to the rest. First, it is appearant to all men of judgement, that the best approved Historians, Divine and Prophane, labour to investigate the truth of times, thereby to approve the stories, and forepast actions of the world: and not the truth of histories to approve the times by. Let us then make judgement to our felves, which of those two accounts give the best reputation to the story of the Scriptures; teaching the Worlds new plantation, and the continuance of Gods Church: either that of Josephus, and those which follow him; who makes but 292, is yeares, or thereabouts, between the floud and birth of Abraham: or this other account, which makes 352. yeares betweene the one and the other: the one taking Abraham to be the first borne of Thare, in the 70. yeare of his life: the other a younger sonne of Thare,& borne when he had lived 130. yeares. And if we looke over all, and do not haftily faif. fie our understanding with the first things offered, and thereby being satiated doe sloth. fully and drowfily fit downe; we shall find it more agreeable rather to allow the recke ning of the Septuagint, who, according to some editions, make it above 1072. Years betweene the Floud and Abrahams birth: than to take away any part of those 352 years given. For if we advisedly consider the state and continuance of the world, such as it was in Abrahams time, yea before Abraham was borne, we shall finde that it were very ill done of us by following opinion without the guide of reason, to pare the times overdeepely betweene Abraham and the Floud: because in cutting them too neere the quicke, the reputation of the whole storie might perchance bleede thereby, were not the tellimonie of the Scriptures supreme, so as no objection can approach it: and that we did not follow withall this precept of S. Augustine, That where soever any one place in the Scriptures may be conceived difagreeing to the whole, the same is by ignorance of interpretation mif-understood. For in Abrahams time all the then knowne parts of the World were peopled: all Regions and Countries had their Kings. Egypt had many magnificent Cities: and so had Palastina, and all the bordering Countries, yea, that part of the World befides, as farre as India: and those not built with stickes, but of hewne stones, and defended with walls and rampiers: which magnificence needed and rent of more antiquitie, than those other men have supposed. And therefore, where the Scriptures are plainest and best agreeing with reason and nature, to what end should w labour to beget doubts and scruples, or draw all things into wonders and marvailes? ving also strength thereby to common cavillers, and to those mens apish braines, who only bend their wits to find impossibilities, and monsters in the story of the Worldand Mankinde.

A computation of the times of the Assyrians, and others, grounded upon the times noted in the storie of Abraham.

An.mundi 2008 dil.35 2.natus Aug.de Civit. Deil.16.c.17.

TN this fort therefore for the reasons before alledged, I conclude, that from the generall Floud, to the birth of Abraham, 352. yeares were confumed; and taking the Affri-Han History with us, the same number of yeares were spent from the Floud to the 43. yeare of Ninus: in which 43. yeare of Ninus Abraham was borne: which happened in the veare of the world, 2009.

Now of this time of 352. yeares, we must give one part as well to the increase of those people which came into Shinaar, as to those that stayed in the East, to wit, 30. yeares to Chas, ere he begat Seba: of which, though the Scriptures are filent, yet because those of the same time had that age when they begat their first sonnes, we may the more safely give the like allowance to these. For Eber begat Peleg at 34. Peleg Reguat 30. Regu Serug at 32. Now after Seba, Chus begat Havila, Sabta, Raama and Sabtecha: and Raama begat Sheba and Dedan, before Nimred was borne, as it appeareth Gen. 10, which S. Augustine approveth. Giving then 30. yeares more to Raama ere he begat Sheba, and five yeares to the five elder brothers of Nimrod, it may be gathered that 65. yeares were confumed ere Nimred himselfe was borne and that Raamah had that age before any of his sonnes were begotten, it may be gathered, by example and comparison for Peleg the fourth

Letus then allow 60. yeares more after the birth of Nimred, for two other generations to be brought forth, or elfe we shall hardly finde people to build Babel: for fure we are, that it was done by hands, and not by miracle because it displeased God. These two numbers of 65. and 60. make 125. The rest of the time of 131. (in which yeare they arrived in Shinaar, whereof there are 6. yeares remaining) we may give them for their travels from the East: because they were pestered with women, children and Cattell: and, as some ancient writers have conceived, and Becanus of later times, they kept alwaies the Ana solute but mountaine fides, for feare of a fecond Floud. Now, if we take this number of 131 out manigeners of 252. there remaines 221. of which number Berofus bestoweth 65. on Belus, and 42. simo prima capital on Ninus before Abraham borne: both which S. Augustine approveth: which two nim-regnum Babyloberstaken againe out of 221 there remaineth 114. yeares of the 352. from the Floud to Saturno parte Abrahams birth: which number of 114 necessitie bestoweth on Nimrod.

And if it be objected that this time given to Nimrod, is over-long: fure if we compare imperavit annia the age of Nimred with the rest of the same descent from Noah, it will rather appeare O- Beresma ver-short. For Nimrod, by this accompt, lived in all but one hundred seventy nine veares: whereof he reigned one hundred and twelve: whereas Sale, who was the fonne of Arbbaxad, the fonne of Sem, lived foure hundred three yeares : and of the same age of the

CHAP.I.S.9.

Ninus reigned 9. yeares: which added to 43. make-Ninus dieth and leaveth Semiramis his Successor.

Semiramis governed the Empire of Babylonia and Assyria 42. yeares, and died in the 52. Of the World yeare compleat of Abrahams life.

Ninias or Zameis succeded Semiramis, and ruled 38. yeares, in the second yeare of Of the Floud

When Abraham was 85. yeares old, he rescued his nephew Lot, and overthrew by 403.adit. Surprise Amraphel King of Shinaar, or Babylonia. Ninias reigned 38. yeares, and Abraham came into Canaan but 23. yeares after Semiramis died: which was the 75. yeare of his age: fo that Amraphel may feeme to have bin this Ninias the fonne of Ninus, and Semiramis, whose 23. yeares, as aforesaide, being the 75. yeare of Abraham, he and his fellow-kings might have received this overthrow in the 85 yeare of Abraham, and the 33. yeare of his owne reigne: after which he reigned five yeares: which make in all 38. Bur the truth is, that the reasons to the contrary, urging that this Amraphel could not be Ninias, are not easily answered. Howbeit for the times of the Assiran Kings, that they are to be ordered as we have fet downe, according to the times noted by Moses, in the storic of Abraham, it is most certaine, unlesse we will either derogate from the truth of Moses his computation, which were impietie, or account the whole Historie of Ninus and Semiramis to be but a fiction; which were to condemne all ancient Historians for

That Amraphel, one of the foure Kings whom Abraham overthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to have beene Ninias the sonne of Ninus. Nd now touching this Amraphel, whom Moses makes King of Shinaar or Babylonia, in the 85. yeere of Abrahams life, that is, in the 33. yeere of the raigne of Minias Zameis the king of the Assyrians, the sonne of Ninus and Semiramis, it is hard to affirme what he was, and how he could be at this time King of Babylonia: Ninias Zameu then reigning there. To this doubt the answer which first offereth it selfe as most propable, is that which hath beene alreadienoted, that this Ninias or Zameis, was no other than our Amraphel: who invaded Traconitis or Basan, and overthrew those five kings of Pentapolis, or the valley of Siddim . For the Scriptures tell us, that Amraphel was King of Shinaar, which is Babylonia: and the times before accounted make him to be the fuccessour of Ninus and Semiramis and it falleth out with the 85. yeare of Abrahams life: wherein he rescued Lot. slew Chedorlagmer, and overthrew the rest. True it is, that this Amraphel was not at this time the greatest Monarke: for Chedorlaomer commanded in chiefe, though Amraphel be first named by Moses in the first verse of the 14. Chapter of Genefis. For the Kings of the valley of Siddim, or of Pentapolis, or the five Citties, were the vassalls of Chedorlaomer, and not of Amraphel: as it is written, Twelve geeres were they subject to Chedorlaomer, but in the 13 yeare they rebelled, and in the 14. yeare came Chedorlaomer and the Kings that were with him and therefore was Chedorlaomer the principall in this enterprise, who was then King of Elam, which is Persia: Now Persia being seated over Tygris, and to the East of Amraphels Countrie; and the other two kings, which were companions with Amraphel, being feated to the West of Shinaar or Babylonia: Amraphel, who held Babylonia it felfe, feemethat this time to have had non great scope or large dominion. For had Amraphel beene so great a Prince as prophane Historians make Ninus or Semiramis whom he succeeded, he should not have needed the affiftance of three other Kings for this expedition. But though Chedorlaomer were the first and greatest of those source Kings, (as it is manifest that he was: For these little kings of Sodome, Gomorra, &c. were his vaffals, and not Amraphels,) yet this makes not the conjecture lesse probable, but that this Amraphel might be Ninias. For it may be, that the great and potent Empire of Assyria, had now (as we shall shew more plainely in that which followeth) received a downe-right fall, at the time of this warre: though not long before it commanded all the Kingdomes betweene India and the Phanician Sea: to wit, in the times of Ninus and Semiramis.

of Arioch another of the foure kings, and that Ellas, whereof he is said to have beene King, lies betweene Coelosyria and Arabia Petræa.

Ow the two other kings joyned with Amraphel and Chedorlaomer, were Arioch and Tydal; the one king of Ellassar, the other of the Nations. For Ellassar, A. quila and Hierome write Pontus: fo Tostatus thinketh that it should be Hell. (pont : which opinion Pererius favoureth. But this is onely to defend the Latine translation. For as Ponius, fois Hellefont farre diftant, and out of the way to fend any Armis into Arabia Petraa, or int Idumaa; which Countries thefe foure kings chiefly invaded Besides that, it is certaine, that the Assyrians (when they were greatest) had never any dominion in Asia the lesse. For at such time as the Assyrians feared the invasion of the Medes and Persians, they sent not into Asia the lesse as commanders : but used all the An they had to invite Crafus to their affiftance: periwading him that nothing could be more dangerous for himselfe, and the other Kings of those parts, than the successe of the Medes against the Affyrians. But examine the enterprise what it was. These Kings (faith the Text) made warre with Bera, King of Sodome, Birtha King of Gomorrha, Shinab king of Admath, and Shemebar king of Zeboim, and the king of Bela which is Zoar. All which five Kings had not fo much ground as Middlefex: being fuch a kinde of Reguli, as Jojust found in the land long after: namely, Lords of Cities and small territories adjoyning; of which Canaan had three and thirtie, all flaine or hanged by Josus. Neither can the other Countries, which in the Text they are faid also to have invaded, be imagined to have beene at that time of any great power: and therefore to call in Kings from Pontas or Hellespont, had manifested a great imporence and weakenesse in the Kings of Babylon, and Persia.

And though it be alledged for an example, that divers Kings farre off, came to affilt Pompey against Cafar: yet these same examples without like occasions and circumstances, doe neither leade nor teach. For there was no cause to feare the greatnesse of these pettie Kings, or of the other Countries: But the eyes of the world were fixed on Cafar; and his undertakings and intents were to all other Princes, no leffe doubtfull than fearefull: But the whole Countrie by these foure Kings mastered in their passage, was afterward given to the halfe tribe of Manasle, Gad, and Reuben: a narrow valley of groundlying betweene Jordan and the mountaines of Seir: inclosed by the River of Arnon on the Southfide, and by Lybanus on the North, confifting of the two small Provinces of Tracenitis or Basan,& the Region of the Moabites: a conquest farre unvaluable, and little and fivering to the power of the Affrian Empire, if the same had remained in any comparable estate with the times of Ninus & Semiramis, who subjected all the great kings of that part of the World, without the affiftance of any of the Kings of Helleftont, or any other part of Afia the leffe. But as the vulgar and Aquila convert Ellassar by Pontus: so Symmachus makes Ariocha King of the Scythians, a King indeed, as faire fetched to joyne with the Assirians in this Warre, as the World had any at that time.

'Ararat, on the mountaines whereof the Arke did rest; so doe they in this place retaine the Hebrew word Ellassar, being doubtfull to give it a wrong interpretation. And Pererius himselfe remembreth other opinions farre more probable than this of Pontus or Hellespont: yet he dares not avow his liking of them, because the Latin Translation harly o it otherwise. For Stephanus de Urbibus, a Gracian Cosmographer, findeth the Citie of Ellas in the border of Calogria: and S. Hierome calleth Ellas the Citie of Arioch, as in truth it was. Now although the same be seated by Stephanus in Calosyria, yet it standeth on the border of Arabia, of which Arioch was king: who formerly joyned with Ninus in all his conquests, being of the same familie, and descended from Cham and Chus: after whom the name of Arius was by the Hebrew written Arioch: and afterward againe Aretas; as in the Machabees: the kings of Arabia holding that name even to the time of S. Paul, who Machabees was fought to be betrayed by the Lieutenant of Aretas commanding in Damascus. They Con. 2.11. were Princes for the most part confederate and depending upon the Assirian Empire. It is true that we find in Daniel, that in the time of Nabuchodonofor, one Arioch was Ge-Daniel nerall of his armie, and the principall Commander under him, who was a King of Kings: which makes it plaine, that Arioch here spoken of, the sonne of that Arioch, Confederate of Ninus, was no king of Pontus, nor of Scythia: regions farre removed from the Allyrians and Babylonians. The name also of Arioch who commanded under Nabuchodonolor is mentioned in Fudith by the name of King of the Elymeans: who are a Nation of Perfians bordering Allyria, according to Stephanus: though Plinie fets it between the Seacoast, and Media: and if any brother of the Arabian Kings or other of that house (known by the name of Arius, Arioch, Areta, or Aretas) had the government of that Persian Province called Elyman (as it feemeth they had by the places of Daniel and Judith) yet the fame was in Nabuchodonofors time. But this Arroch heere fooken of may with more reason be taken for the King of Arabia, the sonne of Arius, the Confederate of Ninus. whose somes held league, as their Fathers did, being the next bordering Prince of all on that fide towards the West unto Babylonia, and Chalden: and in amitie with them from the beginning, and of their owne house, and bloud: which Died. Siculus also con-piesielle and firmeth.

Of Tidal another of the foure Kines.

He fourth King by Abraham overthrown was Tidal, King of the Nations. The Hebrew writes it Gojim, which Vatablus takes to be a proper name: Lyra of mixt people: Calvin of runnagates without habitation. Pererius out of Strabo, strabolis. pe findes that Galilea was inhabited by divers Nations, which were a mixt people: name-523. ly, of Egyptians, Arabians, and Phanicians. Namtales funt qui Galilaam habitant; Such are the inhabitants of Galile, faith Strabo: and therefore was Tidal called King of these Nations, as they suppose. And it may be so: but the authoritie of Strabo is nothing in this question. For Galilaa was not peopled at this time, as it was in the time of Strabo. For when Abraham came into Canaan, the Canaanite was then in the Land, howfoever Gmized they might be afterwards mixt; which I know not. But there are many petty kingdomes adjoyning to Phanicia, and Palastina; as Palmyrena, Batanea, Laodicene, Apamena, Chalcidice, Cassiotis, Chalibenitis, and all these doe also joyne themselves to Mesopotamia, on the North, and to Arabia, on the East. And that these Nations gathered themselves together under Tidal, I take to be the probablest conjecture.

That Chedorlaomer the chiefe of the foure Kings was not of Affyria, but of Persia: and that the Asyrian Empire at this time was much impayred.

Aftly, whereas it is conceived that Chedorlaomer was the Affyrian Emperor, and that Amraphel was but a Satrape, Viceroy, or Provincial governour of Babylonia, and that the other Kings named were fuchalfo, I cannot agree with Pererius in this. For Moses was too well acquainted with the names of Assurance and shinaar, to call the Affyrian a king of Elam: those kings being in the Scriptures evermore called by the name in of Chaldea, Shinaar, Babylonia, or Affiria: but never by Elam; and Chedorlaomer or Ke. darlaomer was so called of Kidor, from Cidarim, which in the Hebrew fignifieth Regale; for so 2. Cureius calleth the garment which the Persian Kings ware on their heads.

Neither doe I beleeve that the Affyrian or Babylonian Empire stood in any greatnesse artherime of this invafion; and my reasons are these: First, example and experience teach us, that those things which are set up hastily, or forced violently, doe not long last Alexander became Lord of all Asia, on this fide of Indus, in a time of so short a life, asia Lasted not to over-looke what it selfe had brought forth. His fortunes were violent, but not perpetuall. For his Empire died at once with himselse: all whose chiefe Comman ders became kings after him. Tamberlaine conquered Affa and India with a storme-like, and terrible fuccesse: but to prevalent surie God hath adjoyned a short life: and whatso ever things Nature her selfe workerh in haste, she taketh the least care of their continu ance. The fruit of his victories perished with him, if not before. Ninus being the first whom the madnesse of boundlesse dominion transported, invaded his neighbour Princes, and became victorious over them: a man violent, infolent and cruell. Semiramis taking the opportunitie, and being more proud, adventurous, and ambitious, than her Paramour: enlarged the Babyloinan Empire, and beautified many places therein with buildings unexampled. But her fonne having changed Nature and Condition with his Mother, proved no leffe feminine than the was mafculine. And as wounds and wrongs, by their continuall finart, put the Patient in minde how to cure the one, & revenge the other: fo those Kings adjoy ning (whose subjection, and calamities inciden, were but new, and therefore the more grievous) could not fleepe, when the advantage was offered by fuch a fucceffour. For, in regno Babylonico hic parum resplenduit, this King Shined little (faith Nauclerus of Ninias) in the Babylonian Kingdome. And likely it is the the neckes of mortall men having beene never before galled with the yoake of forrait dominion, nor having ever had experience of that most miserable and detested comb tion of living in flaverie: no long deteent having as yet inverted the approach was a mation it is a thing of great improbabilitie, that Chedorlasmer, if he were King of Persia right: nor any other title being for him pretended than astrong hand; the foolish and alone, should passe through so great improbabilitie, that Chedorlasmer, if he were King of Persia effeminate sonne of a tyrannous and hated Father, could very ill hold so many great Princes and Nations his vaffals, with a powerleffe mastering, and a minde lesse industrious than his Father and Mother had used before him. And he that was so much give over to licentious idlenesse, as to suffer his Mother to reigne 42. yeares, and thereof the greatest part after he came to mans estate: witnessed thereby to the World, that help much preferred ease before honour, and bodily pleasures before greatnesse, as he neither indevoured to gaine what he could not governe, nor to keepe what he could not without contentious perillenjoy.

These Considerations being joyned to the storie of Amraphel, delivered by Moses, by which we find that Amraphel King of Shinaar was rather an inferiour to the King of Parfia, than either his superiour, or equall; make it seeme probable, that the Empire of Ninus and Semiramis was at that time broken a funder, and restrained againe to Babylonia.

For conclusion I will adde the fe two arguments confirming the former: First, that a fuch time as it pleased God to impose that great travaile upon Abraham, form Ur in Chaldea to Charran, and then to Canaan, a passage of 700. miles, or little lesse, with women, chlidren, and carriages: the Countries through which he wandred were then settled, and in peace. For it was in the 23. yeare of Ninias, when Abraham, obeying the voyce of God, rooke this great journey in hand: in which time of 23. yeares after the death of Semiwante, the neighbour Princes had recovered their libertie and former effates. For Semiramis Armie of foure millions, with her felfe atterly confumed in India, and all her armies and engins of warre, at the same time lost, gave an occasion and opportunitie even to the poorest soules and weakest hearted creatures of the World, to repurchase their former

Secondly, it is affirmed by the best and ancientest Historians, that Arias the sonne of Ninias, or Amraphel, invaded the Bactrians and Caspians, and againe subjected them: which needed not if they had not beene revolted from Ninias, after Ninus death. And as Arisch recovered one part, so did Baleus or Balaneus, otherwise Xerxes, reduce the rest revolted to their former obedience. Of whom it faid that he conquered from Egypt to India: and therefore was called Xerxes, ideft, Victor & triumphator, a conquerour and triumpher; which undertakings had beene no other than the effects of madnesse, had not those Countries freed themselves from the Babylonian subjection. Now if we shall make any doubt hereof, that is, of the reconquest of Arius and Xerxes, both which lived after Ninus and Ninias, we may as well thinke the rest of Ninus and Semiramis to be but fained : but if we grant this reconquest, then is it true that while Ninias or Amraphel ruled. the Affrian Empire was torne afunder, according to that which hath beene gathered our of Moles, as before remembred.

That it is not unprobable that the foure Kings had no dominion in the Countries named. but that they had else-where with their colonies planted themselves : and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came: which if it be fo, we neede not fay that Amraphel was Ninias nor trouble our selves with many other difficulties.

He conferr of all writers, whose workes have come to my perusall, agreeing as they doe, that these foure Kings, Amraphel of Shinaar, Chedorlaomer of Elam. & those fellowes, were Lords of those Regions, whereunto they are or seeme intituled: dothalmost inforce us to thinke that the history must so be understood, as I have delivered. But if in this place, as often else-where in the Scriptures, the names of Countries may be fet for people of those lands, or if (as Hierome hathit) Chedorlaomer was king of the Elamites, as Tidal was faid to be of the Nations, that is, of people either wanting a fixed habitation or gathered out of fundry regions: then may we otherwise conceive of this Historie: removing thereby some difficulties, which men perhaps have beene unwilling to find, because they could not find how to resolve them. For as it had beene a ftrange conjecture to thinke that Arioch was drawne to affilt the Per fian, against the Sodomite, as far as from Pontus, where it is very unlikely that Chedorlaomer was knowne, and almost impossible that the vale of siddim should have been e once named: so in true esti-Chaldra, Mesopotamia, Syria, and part of Arabia, & Canaan, to subdue those five Townes, whose very names how they should come to his eare, being dis-joyned by so many great nations of different languages, a wife man could hardly conjecture. And if all the Countriesbordering Persia together with the Babylonian himselfe, yea the kingdome of Ellasar and that of Tidal, so far off removed, were become his dependants; what reason can we find that might have induced him to hearken after Sodome and Gomorrab; and when he should have fought the establishment of his new gotten Empire, by rooting out the posterity of Ninus (as Ninus had dealt by Pharnus of Media, and Zoroafter of Bactria) then to imploy the forces of Amraphel, and those other Kings, against five pettie Townes, leaving Tyrus and Sidon, and the great Citie of Damasco, with many other places of much importance, and far neerer unto him, unfubdued. Now as these doubts which may be alledged against the first conquest of the vale of siddim, are exceeding vehement: so are the objections to be made against his reconquest of these five Cities, when they had revolted, as forcible; yea and more, as being grounded partly upon the Text it selfe. For first, what madnesse had it beene in that small Province to rebell against so powerfull 2 Monarch? Or if it were so that they dwelling farre from him, hoped rather to be forgotten, than that he should come or send to reclaime them: was it not more than madnesse in them, when his terrible armie approached, still to entertaine hope of evalion: yea to make resistance (being themselves a dissolute and therefore unwarlike people) against the power of all the Nations betweene Buphrates, yea betweene themselves and the river of Ger. 14.17.

Indus : Likewise on the part of Chedorlasmer we should finde no great wisedome, if he, knowing the weakenesse of this people, had raised such a world of men against them: whom by any Lieutenant, with small forces he might have subdued. For the perpetuals inheritance of that little Countrie, was not sufficient to countervaile one moneths charges of fo huge anarmie. How small then must his valour have beene, who with so mightie preparations effected no more than the wasting of that Valley, wherein he left the Cities ftanding, taking no one of them; but returned well contented with a few prisoners, and the pillage of the Countrie, although he had broken their armie in the field? Now the Scriptures doe not of this invafion (supposed so great) make any fearefull matter but composethe two armies, as equally matcht, saying they were source kings against five. 10 yea, if the place be literally expounded, we shall find that Abraham slew all these Kings; of which great flaughter no Historie makes mention: Neither will the reigne of Ninias, who lived foure or five yeares longer, permit that he should have died so soone: neither would Histories have forgotten the manner of his death, if he had so strangely perished in Syria. Whereby it appeares, that these fourekings were not the same that they are commonly thought: nor their forces so great as opinion hath made them. It may there. fore well be true, that these kings were such as many others, who in that age carried the Same title: Lords and Commanders every one of his owne company, which he carned forth as a Colonie, seeking place where to settle himselfe and them, as was the usuall man-

Neither is it improbable, that Chedorlaomer leading a troupe of Persians, Amraphel ner of those times. fome people out of Shinaar, and Tidal others gathered out of fundry places, might confort together, and make the weakest of the Countrie which lay about them, to pay them tribute. Who foever will confider the beginning of the first booke of Thucydides, with the manner of discoveries, conquests and plantations, in the infancie of Greece; or the manner of the Saracens invading Africa and Spaine, with almost as many kings as severall Armies: or the proceedings of the Spaniards in their new discoveries, passages, and conquests in the West-Indies: may easily perceive, that it was neither unusuall for the leaders of Colonies to receive title from the people whom they conducted : nor to make alliances together, and breake them againe, diffurbing fometimes one the other, sometimes helping in pursuit of a conquest. That Amraphel and his affociates were such manner of Commanders, it may feeme the more likely, by the floathfull qualitie of Niniae then reigning in Affria: whose unmanlike temper was such, as might well give occasion to fuch undertaking spirits, as wanted the imployments whereunto they were accustomed in the reigne of Semiramis, rather to feeke adventures abroad, than to remaine at home unregarded, whilst others more unworthy than themselves, were advanced. If the consent of the whole streame of writers upon this place make this conjecture disagreeable to the Text, to the authoritie whereof all humane reason must subscribe, then we may hold our felves to the former conjecture, that Amraphel was Ninias: and that the power of his Ancestors being by his sloath decayed, he might well be inferiour to the Persian 4 Chedorlaomer: or if this doe not fatisfie, we may fay that Aenraphel was an Under-king or Satrapa of Shinaar, under Ninias; who may be supposed to have had his Imperial seating his Fathers Citie Nineve: and to have preferred it before Shinaar and Babyton the Citie of his Mother, whom he hated as an uturper of his right. But if it were possible that in a case not concerning any mans Salvation, and wherein therefore none hath cared to take great paines, all might erre: then can I thinke that the opinion, That those foure Kings were leaders of Colonies, sent out of the Countries named in the Text, and not Kings of the Countries themselves, is most consonant both to the condition of those times, and to the Scripture. And hereto adde that Chedorlaomer fecunes rather called a Persian king, than King of Persia: and that Arioch (whose kingdome undoubtedly was betweene 89-59 714 and Arabia) having beene a man of action, or being a worthy mans sonne, was very well pleased, to give passage and assistance, to these Captaines or pettie Kings. These and fuch like things here to urge, were but with circumstances to adorne a supposition, which either may stand without them, or if it must fall, is unworthy to have cost bestowed up on it : especially considering, that it is not my intent to imploy any more time in making it good, but to leave it wholly to the Readers pleasure to follow any of these opinions, or or any other, if he find any that shall seeme better than these. But of what Countries of people soever these foure were Kings, this expedition is the onely publique action that we know of performed by Abraham. And as for other things belonging to his Storie, and of his fonnes, and of his Nephews Equa and Faceb, as they are registered by Moses, because it is not our purpose, either to stand upon things generally known to all Christians, nor to repeate what harh beene elsewhere already spoken, nor to prevent our selves in things that may hereafter in due place be remembred, we passe them here in silence. And because in this Storie of Abraham and his posteritie, there is much mention of Egypt: by which appeares that even in the time of Abraham, it was a settled & slourishing kingdom; it will not be amisse in the next place to speake somewhat of the antiquities and first kings thereof.

Of the Kings of Ægypt from the first peopling of it after the Floud, to the time of the deliverie of the Israelites from thence.

A briefe of the names and times of the first Kings of Agypt: with a note of the causes of diffully inresolving of the truth in these points.

Oone after the confusion at Babel (as it seemes) Cham with many of his issue and followers (having doubtlesse knowne the fertilitie of Egypt before the Floud) came thither and tooke possession of the Countrie; in which they built many Cities: and began the kingdome one hundred nintie one yeares after the deluge. The ancient Governours of this Kingdome till such time as Israel departed Egypt, are shewne in the Table following.

The Table, and especially the Chronologie, is to be confirmed by probabilities & conjectures, because in such obscurity, manifest and restlesse truth cannot be found. For Saine Augustine, a man of exceeding great judgement, and incomparable diligence, who had fought into all antiquities, and had read the bookes of Varro, which now are lost, yet omitted the succession of the Egyptian Kings: which he would not have done, if they had not beenemore uncertaine than the Siegonians, whom he remembreth, then whom doubtlesse they were more glorious. One great occasion of this obscurity in the Egyptian Story, was the ambition of the Priess: who, to magnifie their Antiquities, filled the Records (which were in their hands) with many leasings, and recounted unto strangers the names of many Kings, that never reigned. What ground they had for these reports of supposed Kings, it shall appeare anon. Sure it is, that the magnificent viorkes and royall buildings in Egypt, fuch as are never found but in States that have greatly flour rished, witnesse that their Princes were of marvellous greatnesse, and that the reports of the Priests were not altogether false. A second cause of our ignorance in the Egyptian History, was the too much credulity of some good Authors, who believing the manifold and contrary reports of fundry Egyptians, and publishing in their owne name such as pleased them best; have confirmed them, and as it were inforced them upon us by their authority. Athird and generall cause of more than Egyptian darkenesse in all ancient Histories, is the edition of many Authors by John Annius, of whom (if to the censures of fundry very learned, I may adde mine) I thinke thus; that Annius having seene some fragments of those writers, and added unto them what he would, may be credited, as an to avoucher of true Histories, where approved writers confirme him : but otherwise is to be deemed fabulous. Hereupon it commeth to passe that the account of Authors, either in the Chronologie or Genealogie of the Egyptian Kings, runnes three altogether different wayes. The Christian writers, such as are ancient, for the most part follow Enfebius: Many late writers follow the edition of Annius his Authors: The prophane Histories follow Herodotus Diodorus and fuch others.

That by the account of the Egyptian Dynasties, and otherwise, it appeares that Chams reigne in Egypt began in the yeere after the Floud. 191.

O reconcile these, or gather out of them the times of the ancient Kings, about whom is most controversie, the best meane is by helpe of the Dynasties: of whose continuance there is little or no disagreement. The account of the Dyna-Ries (besides the authority of approved Authors) hath this good ground, that it agreeth for the most part, if not altogether, with the Histories of the Assprians, Trojans, Italians &c.and others. The beginning of the 16. Dyn. is joyned by generall consent, with the 43. yeare of Ninus: in which Abraham was borne. The twelve first Dynasties lasted each of them seven yeares, under the twelve, which were called the greater gods: so that # the yeares of their continuance were 84. The thirteenth Dynastie endured foureteens yeares: the fourteenth 26. the fifteenth 37. Thefe three last are faid to have bin under the three younger gods. So the fifteene firft Dynasties lasted one hundred sixty one years, As I doe not therefore beleeve that the continuance of these Dyn. was such as hathbin mentioned, because Annius in such wise limits out their time: so I cannot reject thear count upon this onely reason, that Annius hathit so: considering that both hitherto it hath passed as currant, and is greatly strengthened by many good reasons. For, whereas Eusebius placeth the beginning of the fixteenth Dynastie, in the yeare of Abrahams birth, as aforesaid: the reckoning is easily cast; by which the summe of 161. yeares, which ac cording to our account were spent in the fifteene former, being subducted out of the summe of 352 yeares, which were betweene the Floud and Abrahams birth, shew that the beginning of the first Dynastie, which was the beginning of Chams reigne in Egypt, was in the yeare 191. As also by other probabilities the same may appeare. For it is generally agreed, that the multitude of mankinde which came into Shinaar, arrived at Babel, Ann à diluvio 131. In building the Tower were consumed fourtie yeares, as Glycus recordeth: whose report I have elsewhere confirmed with divers probabilities. That Cham was long in passing with his company, their Wives, Children, Cattell, and substance through all Syria then desolate, and full of Bogges, Forrests and Bryers (which the Deluge and want of culture in one hundred seventie one yeeres had brought upon it) no reasonable man will doubt. To this his paffage therefore, and the feating of himselfe in Egypt, we allow twenty yeeres : and these summes being added together, to wit, one hundred thirty one yeeres after the Floud, before they arrive at Babel, 40. yeeres for their stay there, and 20 for Chams passage into Egyps, and setling there, make up the summe of 191 yeeres; at which time we faid that Cham began his reigne in Egypt, in the beginning of the first Dynastie. And to this summe of 191. yeeres if wee adde the 161. yeers of the 15 first Dynasties, as they are numbred in common account, we shall fall right with the yeere of Abrahams birth which was An. Dil. 352. And hereto omitting many other reasons, which might be brought to prove that these first Dynastics must needes have beene very short, and not containing in the whole summe of their several times above 161. yeares: Let it suffice that had they lasted longer, then either must Ægypt have beene peopled as soone as Babel after the Floud, or the Dynasties (as Mercator thinkes) must have been ebefore the floud. That the arrivall at Babel was many yeares before the plantation of Egypt, after the floud, enough hath beene faid to prove: and that the Dynasties were not before the floud, the number of the long-lived generations betweene Adam and the floud, which was leffe than the number of the Dynasties, may fufficiently witnesse. Or if we will thinke, that one life might (perhaps) be divided into many Dynasties, then may this have beene as well after the floud, as before: considering that the fonnes of Noah did not in every Countrie erect fuch forme of Policie, as had bin used in the same ere the Deluge: but such, as the disposition of the people, the authorities and power of the Conducter, together with many other circumstances, did induce or inforce them to.

§. III.

That these Dynasties were not divers families of Kings, but rather successions of Regents, of times many under one King.

He short continuance of the Dynasties, doth shew that they were not severall races of Kings, as the vaunting Egyptians were wont to stile them. What they were it cannot certainly be warranted. For in restitutions of decayed antiquities, it is more easie to denie than to affirme. But this may be faid, partly upon good circumstance, partly upon the furest proofe, That it was the manner of the Egyptian Kings, to put the government of the Countrie into the hands of some trustie Counsellor, only referving the Soveraignty to themselves, as the old Kings of France were wont to the Masters of the Palace, and as the Turke doth to the chiefe Visier. This is confirmed, first by the number of the Dynasties, whereof many are under Cham, and more than one under Ofiris or Mizrains; and must therefore have bin successions, not of Kings, but rather of Counfailors and Regents. Secondly, by custome of such Princes borderers to Egypt, as are mentioned in the Scriptures, of whom Abimelech the Philiftim in his dealing with Abraham and Isaac about confederation, did nothing without Phical Captaine of his Hoste: though in taking Abrahams wife, and in his private carriage, he followed his owne pleasure. Likewise of Abimelech the sonne of Gideon it was said : Is not be the sonne of Jerubbaal : and Zebul is his officer? Also Ishbosheth the sonne of Saul, feared Abner the Captaine of the Hoste. Yea, David himselfe hating Joab for his crueltie, did not punihhim in regard of his greatnesse, which was such, as was feared even of Hadad the Edomite living then in Egypt. Thirdly, this is confirmed by the temper and disposition of Cham, who was lewd, as appeares by the Scriptures: therefore likely both for his own idlenesse and pleasure, to have laid the burden of government upon others; and upon jealousse, the companion of unworthinesse, to have changed his Lievtenants often. Aboveall other proofes is the advancement of Joseph by Pharaoh. For Pharaoh said to Joleph; only in the Kings throne will I be above thee behold, I have fet thee over all the Land will Tyride of Egypt. William Archbishop of Tyre, who flourished about the yeare of our Lord, one 6.17.18.19. thousand one hundred eightie, affirmes that the like or very same forme of government by Viceroys, was in his time practifed in Egypt, having there beene inuse (as he believed) ever fince the time of Joseph. He plainely shewes, that the Soldans of Egypt were nor Lords of the Countrie, how ever they have beene so deemed: but that they acknowledged and humbly performed the dutie of subjects unto the Calpine: who residing in a most magnificent Palace in Cairo, did commit the charge, not onely of civil government, but the power of making warre and peace, with the whole office and authority royall, into the Soldans hands. He that shall reade in William of Tyre, the state of the Caliphe, or Mulene Elbadech, with the forme of his Court, shall plainly behold the image of the Librascas To ancient Pharaoh, ruling by a Lievtenant, as great in authority as Joseph was, though farre inferiour in wisedome.

To thinke that many names of such Regents or Lievtenants as Joseph was, have crept into the Lift of the Egyptian Kings, were no strange imagination. For Josephs brethren Gon. 1.30 call him, The man that is Lord of the Land, and the Lord of the Countrie: besides, it is 33. not unlikely that the vain-glorious Egyptian Priests would as easily report him a King to posteriry, as ignorant men and strangers deeme him such, under whose hand all disparches of importance, and royall managing of the State had passed, whilest that the King himfelse intending his quiet, had given his office to another. How strangers have mistaken in this kinde, the example already cited of Josephs brethren, doth sufficiently witnesse, The reports of Priests doe appeare in Diodorus, and Herodotus: each of whom, citing their relations, as good authority, fay; Diodorus, that Sefostris was the nineteenth King after Menas; Herodotus, that he was the 332 after Menas: which could not have beeneuf Menas had beene Adam. Therefore we may well conclude, That the Dynasties were not so many races of Kings, but succeffions of Regents, appointed by the kings of so many fundry linages or forts of men. Now by what soever meanes a Dynastie or Regencie con. tinued: whether in one familie, as being made an hereditary office: or in one order of men, in as heldby faction: fure it is that was the Kings gift and free choyce, that gave the office. But the Crowne royall alwayes passed by descent, and not by election: which (besides consent of Authors) the Scriptures also prove. For whereas Joseph boughtall the land of Egypt for Pharaoh, if the Crowne had passed by election, then should Phase raoh's children hereby either have beene inthralled amongst the rest of the people, to the next fuccessor : or injoying their Fathers land, though not his estate, have bin more mighty than the king: as Land-lords of all Egypt, and the king himselfe their Tenant, Likewise we finde in Exod. 12. that God smote the first borne of Pharaoh, that was to stom his Throne. And in Esay it is said of Pharaoh: I am the sonne of the ancient King.

Hat the fuccession of Kings began, and continued in such wise as the Table hat shewed from Cham to Chencres, now it followeth to shew. Egypt is called a the Scripture the land of Ham. That this name is not given to it, because the 106.22. posterity of Cham did reigne there, but for that himselfe did first plant it, we may gathe by many circumstances. For I thinke it is no where found, that the Countries of Conf. Put, or Canaan, as well as Egypt, were called the Land of Ham. Further, it is found Diodorus Siculus, that Ofiris calleth himselfe the eldest sonne of Cham, saying; Mihipan Saturnus deorum omnium junior : alfo, Sum Saturni filius antiquior, germen ex pulcho 6 generoso orsum : which must needes be understood of Cham : for this Saturnus Egypin was Cham: as it is faid, that on the monument of Ninus was an infeription, wherein Cha was called Saturnus Ægyptius. Likewise the Temple of Hammon, not farre from Egyp, doth testifie, that Ham resided in those parts : And S. Hierome in quastionibus Hebrain, faith, that the Egyptians themselves did in his dayes call their Countrie Ham: as in foure severall places in the Pfalmes this Countrie is called the land of Cham. And one lius, noting out of Plutarch in Ofiride, that in the facrifices of the Egyptians this Comtrie of Egypt was called Chemia, expounds it for Chamia, ut puto (faith he) à Chamo Nos filio, to which also he addeth out of Isidore, Agyptumusq, hodie Agyptiorum lingua Kan vocari: that Egypt unto this day in the tongue of the Egyptians is called Kam. For thebe ginning and continuance of Chams reigne, the same reasons may suffice to be alledged, which I have already given in proofe of the time spent in the 15. first Dynasties: Neither is it strangethat the reigne of Cham should last solong as 161. yeares: considering that Sem lived 600: Arphaehshad and Shelah each above 400. But strange it had been, if one Saltis created by Manetho, had in those long-lived generations reigned thereig. yeares, and with Baon, Apachnas, Apachis, and others of the fame brood, obscured the fame and glory of Ofiris, orus, and Sefoffris. Reineccius in hiftor. Julia, placeth Milrain next, otherwise called Ofiris, according to Diodorus: who, saith he, was the sonne of Ham mon: KrentZhemius faith that MiZraim and Ofiris are words of necre affinitie and founds in the Hebrew tongue. Howfoever it be, we know that Milraim the fonne of Cham, was Lord of Egypt, and Reineceius, citing good authoritie in this case, affirmeth that Egypt is now called by the naturals in their ownelanguage, Mezre. Neither doe I fee cause of doubt whether Ofiris were the same with MiZraim. It is more necessary, and hard to she manifestly, how long MiZraim or Ofiris reigned. For whereas the yeare of his deathis no where precisely serdowne, we must be faine to follow probabilities. That he is not vainly faid by Annius his Berofus, to have begun his reigne at the birth of Abraham, when the Dynaftie of the Thebai began, it appeareth, first, by the authoritie of Eusebins: who avoucheth as much; next by Diodorus, who faith that he inhabited Thebes: which habiration of Ofiris there, that it might be cause of that Dynasty, I can well believe; assenting fo far to Reineccius, who thinkes the Dynasties were named only, according to the feverall feats of the kings.

Of the time when Ofiris reigne ended : and that Jacob came into Egypt in the time of Orus the sonne of Ofiris.

He death of Ofris, when it was, none can certainly affirme. The only conjecture that I know is made thus: Lehabim the fon of Mizraim, called Hercules Lybius. made war in Italy, to revenge his Fathers death, on the affociates of Typhon, in the 11. yeare of Baleus King of Affyria: before which yeare he had made many great wars in Egypt, Phanicia, Phrygia, Crete, Lybia, and Spaine: and having ended his Egyptian wars. left the Kingdome to Orms. Thus far Berofus, or Authors following Berofus. That Orus last of all the gods (as they were stilled) held the Kingdome of Isis, Diodorus Siculus plain-Diod. Sic. Last ly faith: and Plutarch as much; to which all Histories agree. Krent Themius hereupon in - 15th, of 15th of 15t fers that fixe years may be allowed to the wars, which Hercules made in fo many Countries, after the Egyptian wars were ended: fo should the death of ofire have been the 34. of Baleus, when himselfe had reigned 297. yeares. I think that Krentzhemius was a greater Scholler than Souldier. For furely in those dayes when commerce was not fuch as now.but all Navigation made by coasting, a far longer time would have been required. to the subduing of so many Countries. An allowance of more time though it would alter his computation, yet would it well agree with his intent: which was (doubtleffe) to find the truth. If according to his account the death of Ofiris had beene the 34 of Baleus; then must Israel have come into Egypt but seven years before the death of Ofiris: and have lived there in the reigne of Typhon. A thing not eafily believed. For it was the fame king who advanced Joseph, bade him fend for his Father, and gave him leave to go into Canaan, to the performance of his Fathers Funerall: as may eafily be gathered out of the book of Genesis. Whereas therefore the reign of ofiris cannot be extended by any possible allowance in account of times, beyond the feventh yeare of Ifraels comming into Egypt: we must needs cut off 23. years from that number, which Krentz hemius conjectures his reign to have continued : namely feven which he should have lived after Jacobs comming into Egypt; nine in which Joseph had there flourished, ere his fathers comming: and other sevenin which Typhon & Hercules had reigned after the death of Ofiris, yet before Folephs advancement.

Neither will this difagree with the time of Hercules Lybins his wars. For the war which Hercules made in Italy, is faid to have indured 10. years: After which proportion we may well give not only fix years, as Krent ? hemins doth, but 23. more to fo many wars, in fo many and so far distant Countries, as are named before: yea, by this proportion we may attributeunto Orus the 13. years, which passed between the time of Josephs being fold into Egypt, unto his advancement, confidering that Potipher who bought him, and whose daughter he may seeme to have married, continued all that while chiefe Steward unto Pharaeh; a thing not likely to have been, if so violent alterations had hapned the whilest in Egypt, as the tyrannous numpation of Typhon must needs have brought in. If citing fome fragment of a lost old Author, I should confidently say, that Potiphar for his faithfulnesse to orus, the son of ofiris, was by him in the beginning of his reigne made hischiefe Steward: at which time buying Joseph, and finding him a just man, and one under whose hand all things did prosper, he rather committed his estate into Josephs hands, thanunto any of his Egyptian followers (many of whom he had found either falf-harted, or weak and unlucky in the troublesome dayes of Typhon) I know not what could be objected against this Perhaps I might proceed further, and fay, That when the faving of Jofiph pleased Pharaoh, and all his servants, then Potiphar Priest of on, being chiefe Officer to Phar 40h, did acknowledge in Joseph, the ancient graces of God, and his injurious impriforment, whereupon he gave him his daughter to wife; and being old, refigned his office of chiefe Steward unto him, who afterward in regard of Potiphar, did favour the Priefts, When he borght the lands of all other Bespeians. This might appeare to some a rale not unlike to the Friarly book of Afenath, Potiphars daughter: but unto fuch as confider that God workes usually by meanes; and that Potiphar was the Steward of that King, under whom Jacob died: it would feeme a matter not probable, had it an Author of sufficient credit to avouchit. Concerning the warres of Hercules, in which by this reckoning he should have spent 42-yeares after he left Egypt, ere he began in Italy, it is a circumstance which(the length of his Italian wars confidered, and his former enterprifes and atchievements proportioned to them) doth not make against us, but for us: or if it were against us, yet could it not so weaken our supposition, as these probabilities collected out of the undifputable truth of Scripture doe confirm it. Nevertheleffe I freely grant that all these proofes are no other, than such as may be gathered out of Authors, not well agreeing, to nor to be reconciled in such obscurity, otherwise than by likelihoods, answerable to the holy Text.

of Typhon, Hercules, Agyptus, Orus, and the two Sefostres, fuccefsively reigning after Mizraim: and of divers errours about the former Selostres.

Oncerning the reigne of Typhon, and of Hercules, I find none that precifely doth define how long either of them continued. Daniel Angelogrator giveth three is yeares to Typhon, omitting Hercules. But he is so peremptory without proofe, as if his own word were fufficient authority, in many points very questionable; alledging no witnesse, but as it were faying, Teste me ipso: yet herein we may thinke him to speake probably, forasmuch as the learned Krent hemius affirmeth, that Hercules didvery foone undertake his Fathers revenge; and was not long in performing it: and that leaving Egypt to his brother, he followed other wars, in the fame quarrell, as hath beene shewed before. True it is, that I cannot collect (as Krent Themine doth) out of Berofus, that Hercules reigned after Typhon : yet feeing Aventinus a follower of Berofus hath it lo, I will also believe it. That in the reigne of Typhon and Hercules, seven years were spent, how soever divided betweene them, I gather out of Krent hemius only, who placethus beginning of orus feven yeares after the death of ofiris: forgetting to fet downe his rafons, which in a matter fo probable I thinke he wanted not. Now whereas he allowed 90. years of the eighteenth Dynastie to Ofiris, Typhon, Hercules, and Orus: it seemes that the reigne of orw lasted 115. yeares. From the death of orw to the departure of Isal out of Egypt, there passed 122. yeares by our account : who (according to Beroaldman) others) thinke that Abraham was borne in the 120 yeare of Terah, and thereupon reckon thus. From the end of the Floud to the birth of Abraham-

From that time to the vocation of Abraham

which fumme divers other wayes may be collected. Since therefore to the departure out of Egypt, there doe remaine (as is aforefaid) onely 122. yeares from the death of 01m; we are now to confider how many of them are to be allowed unto Sefofiris or Sefonchifis : who is placed next unto Orms, by authority of the Scholiastes Apollonis: not without good probability. For this great King or Conquerour, is by many Histories recorded to have over-run a great part of Afice to have built a fleet of ships on the red Sea: and soto have entred into India: likewise with another fleet on the middle earth Seas, to have pasfed into Europe, and fubdued many Nations. This is he (as Reineccine judgeth) whom Jufine erring in account of his time calleth Vexoris: For Justine placeth Vexoris in ages before Ninus: whereby it would follow that Sefoftris, if he were Vexoris, was more ancient than was Ofiris (otherwise Milraim) a thing altogether unlikely. Certaine it is that after the departure of Ifrael out of Egypt, no one Pharaeb came into the land of Canaan (which lieth in the way from Egypt into Afia) till the Father in law of Salomon, Pharach Vaplet, tooke Gerar, and gave it to his daughter: (as we may reade more at large in the holy History of the Bible) after which time Sefae oppressed Reboboam, and Necho lought paffage through the land of Ifrael, when he made his expedition against the Chaldeans. Of King Vaphres and Neco it is out of question, that neither of them was the great King Sefoftrie. Of Sefae it is doubted by fome, for as much as he came into Judas with a great armie. Reineccius propounding the doubt, leaveth it undecided; unlesse ir he sufficient proofe of his owne opinion, that he himselfe placeth Sesostris next to Orus: following the Scoliastes Apollonii. But further answer may be made to show that they were not one. For, as Justine witnesseth, Sefostris, otherwise Vexoris, made war on people Farreremoved, abstaining from his neighbours. Sefac came up purposely against Hieru. Calem. Sefostris, as Diodorus witnesseth, had but 24000. horse, Sefac had 6000, Sesostris had 8020. charriots, Sefac but 1200. Sefoftris made his expedition for no private purnose, but to get a great name: Sesac, as most agree, had no other purpose than to such cour feroboam, and give him countenance in his new reigne; whom he had favoured even against Salomon: therefore Sefostris must needs have reigned whilest Ifrael abode in

Whereas Krent 7 hemius collecteth out of Herodotus, and Diodorus, that one Menas, or Menis, was next to Orus: because those Historians affirme that he reigned next after the gods; it moveth menothing. For Ofiris did fucceede those fifteene gods, namely, the twelve greater, and three leffer: himfelfe also (as the learned Reineccius noteth) being called Menas. Which name, as also Menaus, and Menis, were titles of dignity: though missaken by some as proper names. Krentzhemins doth very probably gatherathat Menas was Mercurius Ter-maximus; the Hebrew word Meni fignifying an Arithmetician. which name Ter-maximus might well be attributed to Ofiris, who was a great Conqueo rour, Philosopher, and Benefactor to mankind, by giving good Lawes, and teaching profitable Arts. In prowesse and great undertakings Sefostris was no whit inferiour to Osiris. Forhe fought victory not for gaine, but for honour onely: and being well contented. that many Nations had acknowledged his power, and submitted themselves to his will and royall disposition, leaving them in a manner to their liberty, returned into Egypt, Soone upon his returne he was endangered by a great Treason, the house in which he was being by his owne brother purpolely fired: which neverthelesse he is said to have escaped, and to have reigned in all thirty three yeares: after which time he chose rather to diethan to live; because he fell blinde. Both Herodotus, and Diodorus, affirme that Sefoltris left a fonne, whose name was Pheron or Pherones: who afterwards tooke the name of Seloftris: but was nothing like to his Father in glory: for he shortly fell blind. The cause of his blindnesse Herodorus attributes to his assaulting the River Nilus with a javeline: which tale Diodorus having likewise heard, yet reports as a fable, saying that perhaps he tooke the disease naturally from his Father. How long this man reigned it is no where expressed: yet for a smuch as orm the second (otherwise Businis) who succeeded him, began 14. yeares after that this Sefostris had beene king, it must needs be that this reigned 14. yeares at least. That Businis began not untill these 14. yeares at least were expired, the very account of time from the first of Business, to the departure of Israel out of Egypt, plainely shewes, being almost generally agreed upon, to have beene 75 yeares. That none came betweene Sefostris the fecond, and Busiris or Orus the fecond, it stands onely upon probabilities: which are these. After Sefostris had reigned some while, he fellblinde; after certaine yeares he recovered his fight, as is faid: which may have beene true, but is more like to have beened fable: furely the manner of his recovery, as it is fet downe, is very fabulous: namely, that by looking upon a woman, or washing his eyes with her water, who had onely knowne her owne husband, he got his fight againe. As the time of his reigne, before his blindnesse, and when he was well again (if ever he were) may have taken up a good part of 14. yeares: fo his workes which were great, doe much more strongly argue, that his reigne was not very short. His works are largely set down by Herodotus, and Diodorus: a part of which may seeme to have beene the finishing of that which his Father had begun, about the channels and fluces of Nilus: whom I think herather frighted, (as his Father had done) with spades, and shovels, than withdarts, and lavelins; and by his diligent overfight of that worke, was like enough to lose both his eye-fight and his peoples love; whom his Father had very bufily employed in excessive labour about it.

Of Bushiris the first oppressor of the Israelites; and of his successor Queen Thermutis that tooke up Moses out of the water.

Nd herein (if I may presume to conjecture) Busiris, who was afterwards king is like to have dealt with him, as Jeroboam did with the fonne of Salomon. For rhat Buliris himselfe was much addicted to magnificent workes, it well appearedby the drudgery wherewith he wearied the children of Ifrael in his buildings: If therefore he were employed by the great Sefostris, as Jeroboam was by Salomon, in the is overfight of those businesses, he had good opportunity to worke his greatnesse with the king by industry; and afterward with the people by incensing them against their new king, as Jeroboam did. For what the multitude will endure at one Princes hands, they will not at anothers: unlesse he have either an equall spirit, or a surer foundation. If moreover he fought to derive all the paine and labour of publique workes from the Egyptians, to the Israelites: he furely did that which to his owne people was very plans ble: who (as appeares in Exedus) were nothing flack in fulfilling the kings cruelty. Now that Orus the second, or Busiris, was the king that first oppressed Israel, and made the E. dist of drowning the Hebrew children, which (faith Cedrenus) lasted ten moneths: it is a common opinion of many great and most learned writers; who also thinke that hereupon grew the fable of Bufiris facrificing strangers. It is also a common interpretation of that place, Exod. I. that the King who knew not Joseph, was a king of a new family. That Busiris was of a new family, Retneccius doth shew; who also thinkes him Author of the bloudy Edict. Nevertheleffe, true it is, that Busiris, according to all mens computation, began his reigne five yeares after the birth of Moses; before whose birth it is most manifest, that the law was made, and much more that the persecution began; which Bunting thinkes to have lasted 87. yeares, ere the departure out of Egypt. Let us therefore const. der, besides the blindnesse of Sesostris the second, how great the power of the Regents of Vice-Royes in Egypt was; and how great confidence the kings did put in them, seeing 7000 ruled with such full power, that he bought all Egypt, and all the Egyptians for bread; giving at the same time the best of the land to his own father and brethren, for nothing feeing also that when the Egyptians cried out upon Pharaoh, for bread; Pharaoh faid to all the Egyptians, Go to Joseph; what he faith to you, do ye. If to a stranger born, lately fetchtout of prison, a king well able to have governed himselfe, would give such trust, & sovereign authority; it is not unlikely that a blind Prince should doe it to a man of especials reputation on. For God often prospers, not only the good (such as Toseph was) but wicked menallo, as his instruments against the day of wrath. Therefore perhaps the king did(as many law done) refigne his kingdome to him, though his reigne was not accounted to have begun, till the death of Seloftris. But whether Bufiris did usurpe the kingdome, or protection of the land by violence: or whether the blind king refigned it, keeping the title; or whether Busiris were only Regent, whilst the king lived, & afterwards (as is acknowledged by all) king himselse: it might well be said that Pharaohs daughter tooke up Moses, and that Pharaohs rach vexed Ifrael; feeing he both at that time was king in effect, and shortly after king in deed and title both. It were not abfurd for us to fay that the blind king Sefoffris the fecond oppressed Israel: but forasmuch as it may seeme that the wicked Tyrant shewed his evill nature even when he first arose: I thinke it more likely, that Busiris did it, using a first the power of a king, and shortly after the stile. Thus of the 122. veares which pale fed betweene the beginning of Sefostris his reigne, & the departure of Israel out of Egili, 47 being spent; the 75 which remain, are to be accounted to Busines or Orus the second, and his children. Busiris himselfe reigned 30. yeares, according to Eusebius: whom very many judicious authors herein approve. After him his daughter, who tooke Moles out of the water, is faid by all that I have read, to have reigned 12. years. Her name was The mutis Pharis, or Muthis according to Cedrenus: Eufeb. calls her Aceneris; and out of Attabanus his History Meris. Foseph calls herboth Acenchere, & Thermutis. Epiphanius in Panario faith that she was honoured afterward of the Egyptians, by the name of Thermutis the daughter of Amenoph, the son of Pharach. Of this last title, question might be made, and much spoken: for the Scriptures call he bot Pharaohs sons daughter, but Pharaohs daughter. Amenophis indeed is fet next before Busiris or arus the second by Eusebins & others:

but whether he were a King or onely a Regent, I cannot conjecture. For Herodotus Diodorus, and the ancient Historians name the sonne of Sessificis, Pheron. Perhaps his name was Pharaoh Amenophis: and his daughter by the Egyptians called rather the Nececo or Grand-child, than the daughter of Pharaoh; because of the glory of Sessificis, at the differentiation of his son. If so, and if that Busiris or Orus the second marrying her, pretended any title by her, then is our conjecture strengthened; and then was she both daughter; grand-childe, and wise unto Pharaoh: and surviving him, Queene of the land, 12. yeares. But if she were daughter of Orus the second; and sister of Athoris, or Rathoris, as many thinke, to whose conjecture I will not oppose mine, then may it seeme, that either her berthern were degenerate, or too young to rule, when her Father died.

Of the two brethren of Queene Thermutis': and what king it was, under whom Moses was borne: and who it was that perished in the red Sea.

He had two brethren: the one was Rathoris, or Athoris, who succeeded her; the other Telegonus, who is onely named by Enfebius; but his linage and off-fpring described by Reineccius. Rathoris after his fifters death reigned nine yeares: after whom Chencres, thought to be his fonne, reigned ten yeares, and then perished in the red Sea. During the reigne of Chencres, Eufebius faith, that Telegonus begat Epaphus upon Ic. of which History elsewhere he reporteth otherwise. After the death of Chencres (whom fome call Acencheres: but all or most doe stile Debuaros, a fighter against God) Acherres reigned 8. yeares; and then Cherres 15. This descent seems from Father to Sonne. In the 11. veare of Cherres it is faid by Eusebius, that Epaphus reigning in the lower part of Egypt, built Memphis. This is an argument of that which other wife was not unlikely: viz. That Egypt was greatly brought out of order by the plagues which God had layd upon it, and the destruction of her king and army in the red Sea: else could it not have had two reigning in it at once; the latter of whom, or his posterity, seemes to have taken all from Cherres the grand-childe of Chencres. For whereas Armais is faid to have reigned foure yeares after Cherres: and Armesis one after Armais: these two Kings are by Esfebius and others accounted as one, and his reigne faid to have beene five years. His name is called Armeus, otherwife Danaus: and his pedigree thus described by Reineccius in Hiz (boria Julia,

> Telegonus: Epaphus: Lybia, who had

Agenor, Belus, and Busiris.

Egyptus or Ramesses who gave name to the Countrey, having expelled his brother Danaus, reigned, and begat Lynceus, married to Hypermnessra.

Danaus or Armeus expelled by his brother Agyptus, after hee had reigned five years, became king of Argos in Greece: was Father to Hypermnestra.

How it might come to passe that the Nephewes sons of Epaphus should have occupied the kingdome after Cherres, it is hard to say: considering that Epaphus himself is reported by Eusebius to have beene borne in the time of Chencres. But forasmuch as the History of Epaphus himself is diversly related by Eusebius, it may suffice, that Belus the father of Dames & Egyptus, otherwise called Armeus and Rameses, was equally distant from Busines of Orats the second, with Cherres the grand-childe of Chencres. And that the posterity of Telegonus did marry very yong, it appears by the History of these two brethren, Damaus of their conjectures : as that of Porphyrie out of Sanchoniato, that Moses lived in the time of Semiramis. But if he did meane the first Semiramis, it was but a fond conceit: for besides that the same is contrary to all Stories

The third opinion is taken out of Polemon, in his Greeke History, the first Booke: that Moses was borne while Apis the third King ruled Argos.

A fourth is borrowed from Tatianus Assertius, who though he cite some authorities. that Moses lived after the Trojan war, is himselfe of opinion, that Moses was farre more ancient, proving it by many arguments.

Fiftly, he fetteth downe the testimony of Numenius the Philosopher, who tooke Mufaus and Moses to be one: confirming the same out of Artapanas, who confesseth that Moses was called Musaus, by the Grecians: and who farther delivereth that he was adopted by Chenephis, or Thermutis, the daughter of Egypt: the same which Eupolemus calleth Meris; others (as Rabanus Maurus) Thermothes. Eusebius also affirmeth, that by Eupolemus in his first booke de bono, Moses, vir Deo conjunctissimus, is called Musaus Judaorum. Eusebius in his Chronology, findes that Moses was borne while Amenophis ruled Euseb. de press Egypt. The ancient Manethon calls that Pharao, which lived at Moses birth, Thumosis Evangilians; or Thmosis: the same perchance which Appion the Grammarian will have to be Amosis. and elsewhere Amenophis the Father of Sethosis: to whom Lysimachus and Cornelius Tacitus gave the name of Boccheris. To me it seemes most probable, that while Saphrus, called also Spherus or Iphereus, governed Affria; Orthopolis, Sicyonia; and Criasus the Argives; that then (Sefoftris the fecond miling in Egypt) Moses was bortie. For if we beleeve S. Augustine, it was about the end of Cecrops time, that Moses led Ifrael out of E-

out of Egypt best proved. S. Augustine affirmes (as before remembred) that Moses was borne, Saphrus governing Affgria; and that he left Egypt about the end of Cecrops time. Now Saphrus ruled 20. yeares; his successor Mamelus 30. yeares; Sparetus after him 40. yeares: in whose fourth yeare Cecrops began to governe in Attica: Ascatades followed Sparetus, and held the Empire 41. So as Moss being borne while Saphrus ruled Affria; Orthopolis Siegonia; and Criafus Argos (for these three Kings lived at once at his both, faith S. augustine, as Cecrops did when he departed Egypt)it will follow that the birth of Moles was in the nineteenth year of the Affrian Saphrus: for take one yeare temaining of 20. and Ægyptus: of whom the former had 50. daughters, the latter 50. fonnes: perhaps. or rather questionlesse, by divers Women: yet surely they began to beget children in their first youth: Howsoever it were, the generall consent of writers is, that Armens or Danaus did succeed Cherres: and (according to Enfebius and good Authors approving him) reigned five yeares. Ramesses followed, who reigned 68. yeares. This Ramesses or Egyptus is that Armesesmiamum or Armesesmiamus, under whom, in the opinion of Mer. cator, and of Bunting that followes Mercator, Mofes was borne: and the cruell Editi made of drowning the Hebren children. The length of his reigne feemes to me the chiefe, if not the onely ground of Mercators opinion. For whereas the Lord faid to Moses, Goe, returneto Egypt, for they are all dead which went about to kill thee: Mercator hereupon con-in ceives, that it was one and the fame king under whom Moses was born, and under whom he flew the Egyptian at the 40. yeare of his age: and fled into the wildernesse, and there abode for feare : all which circumstances could agree with none, but this Ramesses, who reigned folong: where fore defirous rather to hold a true Paradox, than a common errour, he placeth one Alisfragmuthofis (whose name is found in the lift of Egyptian kings, but the time uncertaine wherein he reigned) in an age 112. or 113. yeares more ancient than others left him in: and fo continuing the Catalogue of his successors from Them. fis (whom Eusebius calls Amasis) downewards, with no other variation of the length of each mans reigne, than is the difference betweene Manetho and Eusebius, he findes Mosa borneunder Armesesmiamum, and Ifrael delivered in the dayes of his sonne Amenophia, The very name of Alisfragmuthofis feems to him with little alteration to found like Phararates, of which name one was thought to have flourished either as a king, or a wise man, about he time of Iface. For (faith he) from Alisfragmuthofis to Phragmuthofis, Pharmuthofis, or Pharatates, the change is not great. Mercator was a man of excellent learning and industry: and one to whom the world is bound for his many notable workes: yet my affent herein is with-held from him, by these reasons. First, I see all other writers agree, that Chencres was king, who was drowned in the Red Sea: Secondly, the place, Exod.4. all are dead, &c. may better be understood of Busiris and all his children, than of one King alone : Thirdly, Saint Cyrill in his first booke against Julian the Apostata, faith, that Dardanus built Dardania, when Mofes was 120 yeares old: Rameffes, which was this Armesesmiamum, being then King of Egypt. After Ramesses, Amenophis reigned 19. yeares: who is thought by Mereator, and peremptorily by Bunting pronounced, to be the King that perished in the red Sea: of which our opinion being already layed open, I thinke it most expedient to referre the kings ensuing to their owne times (which a Chronologicall Table shall lay open) and here to speake of that great delig verance of Ifrael out of Egypt: which for many great confiderations depending thereupon, wee may not lightly Over-halle

Now the time in which the Hebrewes were opprest in Egypt, seemeth to have hadhe. ginning some eight or nine years before the birth of Moses, & 54. yeares, or rather more after Joseph: betweene whose death and the birth of Moses, there were consumed 64.18 veares: some of which time, and 80. yeares after, they lived in great servitude and mi. fery. For as it is written in Exodus: They fet taske-masters over them, to keepe themnn. der with burdens : and they built the Cities, Pithom and Ramafes, &c. And by cruelty the caused the children of Israel to serve; and made them weary of their lives, by sore labourin slay and bricke, and in all worke of the field, with all manner of bondage. All which laidum on them by a mastering power and strong hand, they endured to the time by the wife dome of God appointed: even from 54. yeares, or not much more after the death of 16-Ceph, who left the World when it had lasted 2370. yeares, to the eightieth yeare of Mo-Ces, and untill he wrought his miracles in the field of Zoan, which he performed in the Worlds age 2514 towards the end thereof, according to Codoman, or after our account, 2513. And because those things which we deliver of Egypt, may the better be underflood, I thinke it necessary to speak a few words of the principall places therein named. in this discourse.

Of divers Cities and places in Egypt, mentioned in this Story, or elsewhere in the Scrip-

His Ciry which the Hebrewes call Zoan, was built feven yeares after Hebron. E. Rechiel calleth it Taphnes; and so doth Hieremy; the Septmagint, Tanis; Josephus, Protaidis, after the name of an Egyptian Queene; Antonius gives it the name of Thanis : Hegelippus, Thamna : and William Tyrius, Tapius. It adjoyneth to the land of G. fen, and is the fame, wherein Hieremy the Prophet was stoned to death, for preaching gainst the Egyptian and Fewish Idolatry.

Zoan or Taphnes was in Moses time the Metropolis of the lower Egypt, in which their Pharaohs then commonly refided; and not unlikely to be the same City, where Abraham in his time found him. But Eusebius out of Arrapanus affirmeth, that Abraham did reade Astronomy in Heliopolis, or On, to Pharetates King of Egypt. Alex. Polyhistor, out of Espolemus hath it otherwise, faying, that Abraham instructed the Egyptian Priests, and not the King; both which authorities Enfebius citeth. The Septuagint, and the Vulgar edition, for Zean write Heliopolis. Pagnin, Vatablus, Junius, and our English call it On; and Ptolomy, Onium. There are two Cities of that name; the one on the frontier of the lower Egypt, towards the South; the other fornewhat lower on the Easter-most branch of Nilus falling into the Sea at Pelufium. And it may be that Heliopolis to the South of theriver Trajan, was the fame which Vatablus & our English call Aven. Of the latter it is, that the Scriptures take certaine knowledge: the same which Pomp. Mela, and Pliny call Solio oppidum; Tyrius in the Holy Warre, Malbec; the Arabians, Bahalbeth; and Simeon Still; Fons Solis. Of this Heliopolis, or On, was Potiphar Priest, or Prince, whose daughter for siph married. In the Territory adjoyning Jacob inhabited, while he lived in Egypt. In the confines of this City, Onias, the high Priest of the Jewes, built a Temple, dedicated to the eternall God; nor much inferiour to that of Hierufalem (Ptolomy Philopater then governing in Egypt) which stood in the time of Vespasian, 333. yeares after the foundar tion by Onias, whom fosephus falfly reporteth herein to have fulfilled a prophecy of 1 say c. 19. In die illa erit Altare Domini in medio terra Azypti. In that day shall the Alta of the Lordbe in the middest of the Land of Egypt. Antiochus Epiphanes at that time of the building tyrannizing over the Jewes, gave the occasion for the erecking of this Templein Egypt. Lastly, there it was that our Saviour Christ Jesus remained, while Joseph and the Virgin Mary feared the violence of Hered: neere which (faith Brechard) the founraine is still found, called Jesus well, whose streames doe afterward water the Gardens of Ballamum, no where else found in Egypt. And hereof see more in Brochard, in his description of Egypt.

There is also the City of Noph, remembred by Esay and Exechiel, the same which Ho-Esangara There is and the Carly which latter name it tooke from a Mountaine adjoyning, Equipose to the Prophet calleth Moph: which latter name it tooke from a Mountaine adjoyning, Equipose to the Prophet calleth Moph: which latter name it tooke from a Mountaine adjoyning, Equipose to the Prophet calleth Moph: which latter name it tooke from a Mountaine adjoyning, Equipose to the Prophet calleth Moph: which latter name it tooke from a Mountaine adjoyning, Equipose to the Prophet calleth Moph: which latter name it tooke from a Mountaine adjoyning. focalled; which Mountaine Herodotus remembreth. And this is that great City, which Libra. was called Memphis, and so the Septuagint write it. It is knowne to the Arabians by the name of Mazar. The Chaldeans name it Alchabyr; and Tudalenfis Mizraim.

pelusium, which Vatablus, Pagnin, Junius, and our English write Sin, the Septuagint call G. Tyrolao.cs 71 To Sais; and Montanus, Lebna; is not the fame with Damiata as Gul. Tyrius witnesseth. Intioness. the time of Baldwin the third, Pelufium was called Belbeis. Belbeis (faith Tyrius) que glim dista est Pelusium; Belbeis, that intimes past was called Pelusium.

The City of No, the Septuagint call Diospolis. Of which name there are two or three in Egypt. Hierome converts it Alexandria, by anticipation, because it was so called in the Bubaltus, (for fo Hierome and Zeigler doe write it) is the fame which the Hebrewes call Exclusion Pibefeth.

To make the story the more perceiveable, I have added a description of the land of Golen in which the Israelites inhabited; with those Cities and places so often remembred in the Scripture: as of Taphnes or Zoan, Heliopolis or Bethfemes, Balfephon, Succoth, and the rest; together with Moses passage through the Desarts of Arabia the Stony. For all flory without the knowledge of the places wherein the actions were performed, as it wanteth a great part of the pleasure; so it no way enricheth the knowledge and understanding of the reader; neither doth any thing serve to retaine, what we reade, in our memories, fo well as these pictures and descriptions doe. In which respect I am driven to digreffe in many places, and to interpole fome fuch discourse, otherwise seeming impertinent: taking for my authority, after many others more ancient, that great learned man, Arias Montanus; who in his Preface to the Story of the Holy Land, hath thefe words: Si enim absque locorum observatione res gesta narrentur, aut sine Topographia cognitione historia legantur, adeo confusa atq; perturbata erunt omnia, ut exiis nihil non obscurum, nihil non difficile elici possit : If narration (faith he) be made of those things which are performed, without the observation of the places, wherein they were done: or if Histories be read without Topographicall knowledge ; all things will appeare to intricate and confuted , as we shall thereby under stand nothing but obscurely, nor draw thence any knowledge, but with the greatest difficulty.

6. III.

Of the cruelty against the Israelites young children in Egypt: and of Moses his preservation and education.

Ut to returne to the ftory it felfe. It appeareth that notwithstanding the labour and flavery, which the Ifraelites endured, yet they decreased not in numbers: infomuch as Pharaoh confidering the danger of discontented poverty, and the able bodies of an oppressed multitude, how perissous they might be to his estate, by suggestion of the Divell, refolved to slaughter all the male children of the Hebrewes, as soon as they should be borne. To which end he sent for Sephora and Thura, women the most famous and expert among ft them, qua praerant (faith Comestor) multitudinis obstetricum, who had command given them over all mid-wives; by whom (as it feemeth) he gave order to all the rest for the execution of his Edict. For to have called all the Mid-wives of Egypt together, had beenea strange Parliament. Now whether these two (before named) were of the Hebrewes, or of the Egyptians, it is diverfly disputed. S. Augustine calls them Hebrewes, because it is written Exodus the first, The King of Egypt com- Tolephant. 1.2. manded the Mid-wives of the Hebrew women, &c. But Josephus, Abulensis, and Pererius be- 65. leeve them to be Egyptians. Who loever they were, when it pleased God to frustrate intends the execution of that fecret murder, to the end the world might witneffe both the wichestage. kednesse of the Exprians, and the just cause, thereby made manifest, of his future indignation and revenge: Pharach finding these women filled with piety, and the seare of God, commanded commanded others of his people to execute his former intent; and publikely, or howfoever, to defroy all the male Hebrew children borne within his dominions.

Now besides the doubts, which Pharaoh had of the multitudes of the Hebrewes, the greatest part of whom he might have assured, by affoording them the justice whiche. very King oweth to his vassals, and the rest he might have imployed or sent away at his Josan Jess. pleasure, Josephus giveth another cause of his rage against them, namely, That it was prophetically delivered him by an Egyptian Priest, that among the Hebrews there should be borne a childe, who growing to mans estate, should become a plague and terrour to his whole Nation. To prevent which, (and prefuming that he could refift the ordinance of God, by a meane, contrary to the lawes of heaven and of nature) he stretched out his in bloudy and mercilesse hand to the execution of his former intent. The same prevention Herod long after practifed, when fearing the spiritual Kingdome of Christ, as if it should have beene temporall, he caused all the male children at that time borne, to be slaughtered. And that Pharaoh had some kinde of foreknowledge of the future successe, it may be gathered by these his owne words, in the tenth verse of the fift of Exodus: Come, let w worke wifely with them, left they multiply 3 and it come to passe, that if there be war, they joyn themselves also unto our enemies, and fight against w, and get them out of the Land. Butwe fee, and time hath told it us from the beginning, how God derideth the wifedome of the worldly men, when forgetting the Lord of all power, they rely on the inventions of their owne most feeble, and altogether darkened understanding. For even by the hands of the dearely beloved daughter of this tyrant, was that great Prophet and Minister of Gods marvellous workes taken out of Nilus, being thereinto turned off, in an Arke of reedes, a fucking and powerleffe infant. And this Princeffe having beheld the childe his forme and beauty, though but yet in the blouth, fo pierced her compassion, as she did not onely preferve it, and cause it to be fostered; but commanded that it should be esteemed as her owne, and with equall care to the fonne of a King nourished. And for memory that it was her deed, she called the child Moses, as it were extractus or ereptus, taken out, to wit, out of the water: or after Josephus and Glycus, Moy, a voyce expressing water, and Hises, as much to fay, as that which is drawn out of water, or thence taken. Clemens Alexandrinus was of opinion, that Mofes was circumcifed before he was put into the Arke of Reedes, and that Amram his father had named him Joachim. In his youth he was carefully bred, bythe care, and at the charge of Pharaohs daughter, & by men of the most understanding, taught and instructed : quem regiomore educavit, prafestis ei sapientibus Ægyptiorum Magistiu, quibus erudiretur, faith Bafil; unto mbom she gave princely education, appointing over him wise masters of the Egyptians for his instructers. Thereby (fay Tosephus and Philo) he became excellently learned in all the doctrine of the Egyptians , which also the Martyr Stephen in the seventh of the Atts confirmeth; And Moses was learned in all the wisdome of the E-Zyptians. Which wisdom or sapience, such as it was, or at least so much thereof as Six St. renfis hath gathered, we have added, between the death of Mofes, and the reigne of Jofia.

Of Moles his flying out of Egypt; and the opinions of certaine ancient Historians of his war in Athiopia; and of his marriage there: Philo his judgement of his Pastoral life: and that of Pererius of the Bookes of Genesis and Job.

"Hen Moses was grown to mans estate, sosephus and Eusebius out of Artapa" nus, tell us of ten years war that he made against the Æthiopians: of the befieging of Saba, afterward by Camby fes, called Meree; and how he recovered that City by the favour of Tharbis, a daughter of Athiopia, whom he took to wife. So hath Comefor a pretty tale of Moses, How after the end of that war, Tharbis refisting his returne into Ezjpt, Moses most skilfull in Astronomy, caused two Images to be ingraved in two precious stones, whereof the one increased memory; the other caused forgetulnesse. These he set in two rings, whereof he gave the one, to wit, that of oblivior, his wife Tharbis, referving the other of memory for himselfe: which ring of forsetful nesse, after she had a while worne, she began to neglect the love she bare her hisbands and so Moses without danger returned into Egypt. But leaving these fancies to the Allthors of them: It is true, that about the 40. yeare of Mofes age, when he beheld at Egyptian offering violence to one of the oppressed Hebrewes, moved by compassion, in respect of his brother, and stirred up by disdaine against the other; in the contention he flew the Egyptian. Soone after which fact, finding a disposition in some of his own Nation to accuse him, for whose defence he had thus greatly endangered his owne life: by the ordinance and advice of God, whose chosen servant he was, he fled into Arabia Petrea, the next bordering Country to Egypt; where wandring all alone, as a man left and for saken in a place unknowne unto him, as among a Nation of barbarous strangers; and who infuture times were the irreconcileable enemies of the Hebrewes: it pleased God (working the greatest things by the weakest worldly meanes) to make the watering of a few sheep, & the affisting of the Daughters of Raquel the Madianite, an occasion whereby roprovide him a wife of one of those, and a father in law, that fed him, and sustained him ina Country nearest Egypt, fittest to return from; necessary to be knowne, because interjacent betweene Egypt and Judaa, through which he was to leade the Israelites; and wherein God held him, till the occasion which God presented, best served. And lastly. where the glory of the world shined least, amidst mountainous Defarts, there the glory of God, which shineth most, covered him over, and appeared unto him, not finding him as a Kings fonne, or an adopted child of great Pharaohs daughter, but as a meeke and humble shepheard, fitting at a mountains foot, a keeper and commander of those poore beafts only.

Inthat part of Arabia neere Madian, he confumed 40. yeares. And though (as Philo inthe story of Moses life observeth) he did not neglect the care of those slocks, committed to his charge, but that he excelled all others in that Pastorall knowledge; vet in that foliary Defart he enjoyed himselfe: and being separate from the preasse of the world, and the trouble some affaires thereof, he gave himselfe to contemplation, and to make perfect in himselfe all those knowledges, whereof his younger yeares had gathered the grounds and principles: the fame Author also judging that his Pastorall life did excellently prepare him for the execution of the Principality, which he afterward obtained. Eft enim (faith Philo) ars Paftoralis, quasi praludium adregnum, hoc eft, ad regimen hominum gregis mansuetissimi. Quemadmodum bellisosa ingenia praexercent se in venationibus. experientia in feris quod postea in militia & bello perfectura sunt brutis prabentibus materiam exercitii tam belli quam pacis tempore. At vero prafectura mansueti pecoris, habet auiddam simile cum regno in subditis ideoq Reges cognominantur Pastores popularum non contumelia fed honoris gratia; The art of keeping sheep is, as it were, an introductory exercise unto a Kingdome, namely, the rule over men, the most gentle flock : Even as warlike natures do before-hand exercise themselves in hunting, practising on wilde beasts those things, which after they will accomplish in warfare : those brute beasts affoording matter, wherein to traine themselves, both in time of warre and of peace. But the government of gentle cattell, bath a kinde of resemblance unto a Kingly rule over subjects; therefore Kings are stiled shepheards of the people, not inway of reproach, but for their honour.

That Moses, in this time of his abode at Madian, wrote the Booke of 70b, as Pereriua supposeth, I cannot judge of it, because it is thought, that Job was at that time living. Neither dare I subscribe to Pererius opinion, That Moses while he lived in that part of pererius Arabia, wrote the Booke of Genefis; although I cannot deny the reason of Pererius Exed. conjecture, That by the example of Jobs patience he might strengthen the oppressed Hebrewes: and by the promises of God to Abraham, Isaac, and Faceb, put them in assurance of their delivery from the Egyptian flavery, and of the Land of rest, and plentic

But for the first, it is to be noted, that when Moses defired to be taught by God, by what name he Exade 3.2. 132 should make him knowne, and by whom he was fent; he received from God so much, as 14. and 15; man could comprehend of his infinite and ever-being nature. Our of which he delivered him in the first part of his answer, a name to be considered of by the wisest: and in his second, to be understood by all. C.40.2.12.

Of the tenne plagues wherewith the Egyptians were strucken, the first was by changing the Rivers into bloud: God punishing them by those waters, into which their Forest thers had throwne, and in which they had drowned the innocent children of the Hebrens To which this place of the Revelation may be fitly apply ed: And I heard the Angelofthe water fay, Lord, thou art just, which art, and which wast; and holy, because thou hast juded these things; for they shed the blond of thy Saints and Prophets, and therefore hast thougiven them bloud to drinke.

The rest of the plagues by Frogges, Lice, Flyes, or stinging Waspes; by the deathof their Cattaile; by leprous Scabbes; by Haile and Fire; by Grashoppers; by Darknesse after which Pharaoh forbad Moses his presence: moved the hardned heart of the unbelen ving King, no longer, than the paine and perill lasted; till such time as his own first-bom and the first-borne of all his Nation perished. He then, while he feared his owne life, (a time wherein we remember God perforce) ftood upon no condition: whereas before, he first yeelded but to the departure of the men; then of the men, women, and children, men. ferving their bestiall; but he was now content for the present, that the Israelites should not only depart with all their own, but with a part of the Silver, Gold, and Jewels, of lis own people: of which (the feare being past) he suddenly repented him as his pursual ter them proved. For when every one of the Hebrewes had (according to direction from Moses received) staine a Lambe, without spot or blemish, for the Passeover, (a Sacramat of the most clean and unspotted Saviour,) and with the bloud thereof coloured the pole and linterne of the doores; the Angel of God in the night smote every first-borne of gypt, from the fon of the King, to that of the Beggar and Slave: the children of the Ifu. lites excepted. At which terrible judgement of God, Pharaoh being more than everamazed, yeelded, as before is faid, to their departure. The Egyptians (faith Epiphanius) did in after-times imitate this colouring with bloud, which the Ifraelites used after the Paster ver; ascribing an exceeding vertue to the Red Colour: and therefore they did not only marketheir Sheep and Cattell, buttheir Trees bearing Fruit, to preserve them from lightning and other harmes.

Of Pharaohs pursuit of the Israelites: and of their passage towards the Red Sea, so fart &

TOw, when the people were removed, and on their way, (his heart being hardned by God) he bethought him as well of the honour loft, as of the shame remaining after so many Calamities and Plagues, in suffering them to depart with the spoiles of his people, and indespight of hunselfe. And having before this time great Companies of Souldiers in readinesse, he consulted with himselfe, what way the Isak. lites were like to take. He knew that the shortest and fairest passage was through the Countrey of the Philistims. But because these people were very strong, and a warket Nation, and in all probability of his Allies, he suspected that Moses meant to finde some other out-let, to wit, through the Defart of Ethan; and there, because the Country was exceeding mountanous, and of hard accesse, and that Moses was pestered with multitudes of Women, Children and Cattell, he thought it impossible for the Ifrelites to escape him that way. In the meane while having gathered gather all the Chariots of Egypt, and 600 of his owne, and Captaines over them; he determined to fet upon Exed. 14.73 them in the plaines of Gosen, which way soever they turned themselves. For it was the ancient manner to fight in those Chariots, armed with broad and sharpe Hooks on both fides, in fashion like the Mowers Sythe. Which kinde of fight in Chariots, but not hooked, the Brittaines used against the Romanes, while they made the Warre for the Conquest of this Land. Of this Army of Pharaoh, Josephus affirmeth, that it consisted of Josan de ace 50000. Horse, and 20000. Foot; which, were it true, then it cannot be doubted but that Pharach intended long before to affaile the Hebrewes at their departure, or to destroy them in Gofen; and refused them passage, till such time as he had prepared an Army, to fet on them. For, as it is written in the first of Exodus, he doubted two things, either that the Hebrewes might joyne themselves to his enemies within the Land or being so multiplied, as they were, might leave his fervice, and get themselves thence at their pleafure. But the plagues which God grieved him withall, enforc't him at this time to give an affent to their departure : perchance fore-running his intent. But were it otherwise: and Tolephus partial in this affaire, yet by the words of the Text it appeareth, that he gathered all the Chariors of Egypt, which could not be done in hafte. For Moles made End. 14.76 but three dayes march, ere Pharaoh was at his heeles; and yet the last day he went on fixteenemiles: which, in 10 hot a Countrey, and to drive their Cattell and Sheepe with them, peftered with a world of Women and Children, was a march witnessing the dread of a powerfull Enemy at hand. Now, as Moses well knew that he went out with a mighty hand, and that God guided his understanding in all his Enterprizes: fo helay not fill in the ditch crying for helpe, but using the understanding which God had given him, he left nothing unperformed becomming a Wife man, and a valiant and skillall Conducter; as by all his actions and counfailes from this day to his death, well appeared.

When Moles perceived that Pharaoh was enraged against him, and commanded him not to dare to come thenceforth into his presence: after that he had warned Israel of the Palleover, he appointed a general Affembly or Rende-vous of all the Hebrews at Ramales in the Territory of Golen; a City standing indifferent to receive from all parts of the Coun-Theteritory try the dispersed Hebrewes: and gave commandement, that every Family should bring of Gosen was with them such store as they had of Dow, and Paste, not staying to make it into bread: led Ramases, knowing then that Pharaob was on foote, and on his way towards them. Which done, after the name and having confidered the great strength of Paraohs Horse-men and Chariots, of which of this City, as kind of defence Mofes was utterly unprovided (though, as it is written, the Ifraelities went Gen.47. uparmed) he marched from Ramafes East-ward, towards the Defarts of Etham, and in-Num.33camped at Succoth; which he performed on the fifteenth day of the Moneth Abib: which Moneth from that time forward they were commanded to account as the first Moneth of the yeare. Whether in former times they had beene accustomed to begin their yeare in some other Moneth, following the manner of the Egyptians, and were now Exed 23,16,00 recalled by Moses to the rule of their Fore-fathers, it is uncertain. Certaine it is, that they 34.12. had, and retained, another beginning of their politicke yeare, which was not now abrogated, but rather by some solemnities thereunto annexed, was confirmed, and still continued in use. Wherefore in referring things done, or happing among them, unto the beginning, middeft, or ending of the yeare; that distinction of the Sacred, and the Politike yeare is not to be neglected. Concerning the number of dayes in every Moneth, and the whole forme of their yeare, like enough it is that Mofes himselfe in forty yeares space, did sufficiently instruct the Priests, to whose care the ordering thereof (as common opinion holds) was given in trust: but that any rule of framing their Kalandar, was made publike, before the captivity of Babylon, I do not finde. Now because time and motion begintogether, it will not, I thinke, be any great breach of order, to shew here at their first setting forth, what was the forme of the Hebrew yeare: with the difference betweene them and other Nations in ordering the accompt of time:

The tenth. Tebeth, or Thobeth.	[10.December.
The eleventh, Sebeth, or Sabath.	II. Januarie.
The twelfth, Adar, and Ve Adar.	12.February.

Te Adar was an intercalory Moneth, added, some yeares, unto the other twelve, to make the Solarie and Lunary yeare agree, which (besides the generall inconvenience that would otherwise have risen, by casting the Moneths of Summer into the Winter season, to the great constition of all account) was more necessarily to be regarded of the Hebrewes, because of the divine Precept. For God appointed especial Feasts to be celebrated precisely in such a Moneth of the yeare, and with all on a set day, both of the Moone and of the Moneth; as the Feast of the first fruits; the new Moones, and the like: which could not have so bin kept, if either the day of the Moone had faller in some other part of the Moneth, or the Moneth it selfe bin sound farre distant from his place in the feafon of the yeare.

Other Nations, the better to observe their Solemnities in the due time, and to ask taine all reckonings and remembrances, (which is the principall commodity oftime) that is the measure of endurance) were driven in like manner to make their yearesumquall, by adding fometimes, and fometimes abating one or more dayes, as the error com mitted in foregoing yeares required. The error grew at first, by not knowing what no ber of daies made up a compleat yeare. For though by the continual course of the Sm causing Summer and Winter duly to succeed each other, it is plaine enough, evento the most favage of all people, when a yeare hath passed over them; yet the necessity of ordinary occurrences, that are to be numbred by a shorter Tally, makes this long measure whole yeares infufficient for the finaller fort of more daily affairs. Therefore men oble ved the Monethly conficuous revolution of the Moone, by which they divided the yeare into twelve parts, subdividing the Moneth into 29 dayes and nights, and those again into their quarters and houres. But as the markes of time are fenfible and eafily differ ned: fo the exact calculation of it is very intricate, and worketh much perplexity in the understanding. Twelve revolutions of the Moone, containing lessetime by 11.dayes or thereabout, than the yearely course of the Sunne, through the Zodiacke, in the space of fixteene yeares, every moneth was found in the quite contrary part of the yeare, to that wherein it was placed at the first. This caused them to adde some daies to the years making it to confift of twelve Moneths, and as many dayes more, as they thought would make the courses of the Sunne and Moone to agree. But herein were committed many new errors. For neither did the Sunne determine his yearely revolution by any fet number of whole dayes, neither did the Moone change alwayes at one houre, but the very mi nutes and leffer fractions were to be observed by him, that would feeke to reduce their motions (which motions also were not still alike) into any certaine rule.

Here lay much Wisedome and deepe Art, which could not soone be brought to perfection. Yet as making an estimate at randome, the Athenians held the yeare to consume three hundred and sixty dayes, wherein most of the Greekes concurred with them. The 360-dayes filled up the Greeian yeare (besides many collaterall proofes) it is manifely by that which Pliny directly affirmeth, telling of the Statues, erected in honour of Demetrius Phalereus, which were (faith he) 360. whileft as yet the yeare exceeded nor that number of dayes. By this account neither did any certaine age of the Moone beoin or end their Moneths; neither could their Moneths continue many yeares, in their owne places: but must needs be shifted by little and little from Winter to Summer, and from Summer to Winter, as the dayes forgotten to be inferted into the Almanacke by men, but not forgotten by the superiour bodies in their courses, should occupy their owneroomes in their due turnes. Now, because the solemnity of the Olympian games wastobe held at the full Moone, and withall on the 15. day of the Moneth Hecatombaon (which answereth in a manner to our fune) they were carefull to take order that this Moneth might wer begin with the new Moone; which they effected by adding sometwo daies to the last Moneth of every yeare; those Games being held once in source veares. This intercalation fufficed not to make the matter even; which caused them formtimes to omit one day in the fourth yeare, which was the fecond of the Moneth Badromion; (agreeing nearly with our Angust) formetimes not to omit it, or (which is all one) to insertanother for it intheir fourth Lunary yeare, accounting by the Moone, after a manner that was not vulgar. All this notwithstanding, their Moneth of June would every vearehave growne colder and colder, had they not fought to keepe all upright, by intercalating in each other Olympiad, that is, each eighth yeare, one whole Moneth, which they called the fecond Posideon or December; which was the device of Harpalus, who allotaught them to make one Moneth of 29. dayes, another of 30. dayes, & fo fucceffive ly through the whole yeare. Thus with much labour they kept their yeare as neare as they could, unto the high way of the Planets; but these markes which they observed. were found at length to be deceitfull Guides. For it was not possible so to fashion this eighth yeares intercalation, that it should not deceive them in 11. hours and 18. minutes at the least, or some waies in 34. houres and 10. minutes, or 36. and 41. minutes; which differences would, in few Ages, have bred much confusion. The first that introduced a goodmethod, likely to continue, was Meton the Athenian, who not regarding the Clympiads, and the eighth yeares intercalation, devised a Cycle of 19. yeares, wherein the Moone having 235 times runne out her circuit, met with the Sunne in the fame place, and on the same day of the yeare, as in the 19. yeare before past she had done. This invention of Meton was entertained with great applause, and passing from Greece to Rome, was there inferted into the Kalendar in Golden Letters, being called the Golden Number, which name it retaineth unto this day. Hereby were avoyded the great and uncertaine intercalations that formerly had bin used; for by the intercalation of 7. moneths in the 19 yeares, all was so even, that no sensible difference could be found. Yet that errour which in one yeare could not be perceived, was very apparent in a few of those Cycles; the new Moones anticipating in one Cycle 7. hours, and some minutes of the precise rule. Therefore Calippus devised a new Cycle containing foure of Metons, that is to fay, 76. yeares; and afterwards Hipparchus, a Noble Astrologer, framed another, containing foure of Calippus his Periods, each of them finding some error in the former obfervations, which they diligently corrected. The last reformation of the Kalendar was that which Julius Cafar made, who by advice of the best Mathematicians, then to be found, examining the courses of those heavenly bodies, reduced the yeare unto the forme which is now in use with us, containing 365 dayes and fix houres, which houres in foure yeares make up one whole day, that is intercalated every fourth yeare, the 24.0f February, The correction of the Julian yeare by Pope Gregory the 13. Anno Domini 1582 is not as yet entertained by generall confent; it was indeed, but as a note added unto the worke of Cafar: yet a note of great importance. For whereas it was observed, that the Sunne, which at the time of the Nicene Councell, Anno Dom. 324. entred the Aquinoctiallon the 21. day of March, was in the yeare 1582. ten dayes sooner found, in that time Pope Gregorie strooke out of the Kalendar ten daies, following the fourth of Ottober, fo that in stead of the fifth day was written the fifteenth; by which meanes the moveable Fealts depending on the Suns entrance into Aries, were againe celebrated in such time, as at the Nicem Councell they had bin. And the better to prevent the like alterations, it was by the Councell of Trent ordained, that from thence forward in every hundreth yeare, the Leape day should be omitted, excepting still the fourth hundred because the Sunne doth not in his yearely course take up full fixe houres above the 365. dayes; but faileth so many minutes, as in 400. yeares make about three whole dayes.

CHAP.3.5.7.

But the Cycle of 20. yeares, which the Hebrewes used, was such as neither did need any nice curiofity of houres, minutes, and other leffer Fractions to helpe it; neither did in funming up the dayes of the whole yeare, neglect the dayes of the Moone, confounding one Moneth with another. For with them it fell out fo, that always the Kalends or first day of the Moneth was at the new Moone; and because that day was festivall, they were very carefull as well to observe the short yeare of the Moone, passing through all the 12. Signes in one Moneth, as that longer of the Sun, which is needfully regarded in greater accounts. First, therefore they gave it to Nisan their first Moneth, which is about our March or Aprill, 30. dayes; to Far their fecond Moneth 29. dayes; and fo succeffively 30. to one, 29. to another. Hereby it came to passe, that every two Moneths of theirs. contained somewhat evenly two revolutions of the Moone, allowing 29. dayes, 12. houres, and odde minutes, from change to change. The spare minutes were bestoweda. mong the superfluous or Epact dayes; which made up 7. Moneths in 19. yeares; to 6.0f which 7. were commonly given 30. dayes; to one of them 29. dayes, or otherwife s was found requisite. Their common yeare (as appeareth by the severall dayes of each Moneth) contained 354. dayes, which faile of the yeare, wherein the Sun finishethlis course, 11. whole dayes, with some fractions of time. But these dayes, and other broken pieces, howfoever they were neglected in one yeare, yet in the Cycle of 19. yeares were To disposed of by convenient intercalations, that still at the end of that Cycle, both the Sun and Moone were found on the same day of the yeare, moneth & weeke, yea common. ly on the same houre of the day, where they had beene at the beginning of it 19. yeares

Geneb Chron.

Divers have diverfly fer downe the forme of the Hebrew yeare, with the manner of their Intercalations. Sigonius tells us, that every fecond yeare they did adde a Monethol 22.dayes; every fourth yeare a Moneth of 23. in the regard of 11. dayes and a half wanting in 12. Moones to fulfill a yeare of the Sun. But herein Sigonius was very much deceived. For the Moone doth never finish her course in 22.01 23. dayes: and therefore to have added to many dayes to the end of the years, had bin the way to change the fashion of all the Moneths in the yeares following, which could not have begun, as they ought, with the new Moone. Genebrard faith, that every third yeare, or fecond years, a neede required, they did intercalate one Moneth, adding it at the yeares end unto the ther 12. This I believe to have bin true; but in which of the yeares the intercalation was (if it be worthy of confideration) me thinks they doe not probably deliver, who keepe all far from evennesse untill the very last of the 19. yeares. For (to omit such asent groffely) some there are who say, that after three yeares, when besides the dayes spenting 36. courses of the Moone. 33. dayes are left remaining, that is, 11 dayes of each yeare, then did the Hebrewes adde a Moneth of 30. dayes, keeping three dayes, as it were, in pluffage unto the next account. The like, fay they, was done at the end of the fixt year; at which time, befides the Intercalary Moneth, remained fix dayes, namely, three furmounting that Moneth, and the Epact of three yeares, besides the three formely refer ved. Thus they goe on to the 18. yeare; at which time they have 18 dayes in hand: which with the Epact of the 19. yeare, make up a moneth of 29. dayes, that being intercalated at the end of the Cycle, makes all even.

Whether this were the practice, I can neither affirme nor deny; yet furely it mult needs have bred a great confusion, if in the 18. yeare every Moneth were removed from his owne place by the distance of 48. dayes, that is, halfe a quarter of the yeare and more; which inconvenience by fuch a reckoning was unavoidable. Wherefore, I preferre the common opinion, which preventeth such dislocation of the Moneths, by setting downer a more convenient way of Intercalation in the 8. years. For the 6. dayes remaining after the two former Intercalations made in the third and fixt yeares, added unto the 22 dayes, arifing out of the Epacts of the 7-and 8-yeares, doe fitly ferve to make up a Moneth, with the borrowing of one day or two from the yeare following; and this borrowing of two dayes is fo far from caufing any disorder, that indeed it helpes to make the yeares enling vary the leffe from the proper season of every Moneth. This may suffice to be spoken of the Hebrew Moneths and yeares, by which they guided their accounts.

6. VII. Of the passage of Israel from Succoth towards the Red Sea and of the divers mayes leading out

Rom Succoth in the morning following, Moses led the Israelites towards the Defart of Etham, to recover the Mountaine foot, by the edge of that Wildernesse. though he intended nothing leffe than to goe out of that way, of all other the nearest. But being affured of the multitude of Horsemen and armed Chariots that followed him, he kept himselfe from being incompassed, by keeping the rough and mountainous ground on his left hand. At Etham he rested but one night, and then he restected backe from the entrance thereof, and marched away directly towards the South; the distance betweene it and Succost being about eight miles. That he forbare to enter Arabiabeing then in fight thereof, it feemeth to proceede from three respects; the first two naturall; the third divine. For Pharaoh being then at hand, and having received intelligence of the way which Moses tooke, perswaded himselfe, that the numbers which Moes led, confishing of above a Million, if nortwo Millions of soules, (for as it is written, it is probable Exoditie 12. Great multitudes of sundry sorts of people went out with them) could not post-that all those fibly paffe over those desart and high Mountaines with so great multitudes of Women, Egyptians and othersbrought Children, and Cattell, but that at the very entrance of that fastnesse he should have over-bythe Hebrers taken them, and destroyed the greatest numbers of them. For these his owne words: to the know-They are tangled in the Land, the Wildernesse hath shot them in, doe show his hopes and in-true God, tole tents ; which Mofes, by turning another way, did frustrate. Secondly, Mofes by offering lowed Mofes to enter Arabia that way, drew Pharaoh toward the East-side of the Land of Gosen, or this Rameses: from whence (missing Moses there) his pursuit after him with his Chariots wasmore difficult, by reason of the roughnesse of the way; and howsoever, yet while the Hibrewes kept the Mountaine foot on the left hand, they were better secured from the over-bearing violence both of the Horse and Chariots. Thirdly, Moses confidence in the All-powerfull God was fuch, by whose spirit; onely wise, he was directed, as he rathermade choice to leave the glory of his deliverance and victory to Almighty God, than either by an escape the next way, or by the strength of his multitude, confisting of 600000 men, to cast the successe upon his owne understanding, wise conduction, or valour. The third day he marched with a double pace from Etham towards the Valley of Pibacheroth, 16. miles distant; and sate down between two ledges of Mountaines adjoyning to the Red Sea, to wit, the Mountaines of Etham on the North, & Baal Zephon towards the South; the fame which Orofius calleth Climax: on the top whereof there stood a Temple dedicated to Baal. And, as Phagins noteth, the word fo compounded, is as much to climax is relay, as, Dominus specula, sive custodia. Lord of the watch tower. For the Egyptians believed, ther to called or at least made their slaves believe, that if any of them offered to escape that way in respect of a passage up and into Arabia, this Idoll would both arrest them, and force them to returne to their Lords downe, than and Masters. For the Egyptians had gods for all turnes. Egyptii diis facundi; The Egypti- that it is any ans were fruitfull in gods, faith Saint Hierome. But Moses, who encamped at the foot of this Mountaine with a million of foules, or as other conceive, with two millions, found this Lord of the watch-tower afleepe, or our of countenance.

Now these two passages leading out of Egypt into Arabia upon the firme land, Moses Exeditative refused, as well that of Pelusium and Casiotis, the fairest and shortest of all other, in respect of Judea, as the other by Etham, from which he reflected, for the reasons before remembred, and tooke the way by the Valley of Pihacheroth, betweene the Mountaines, which made a streight entrance towards the Sea. After whom Pharas made so great speed with his Horse-men and Chariots, as he gave the Hebrewes no time at all to rest them after so long a march; but gate fight of them, and they of him, even at the very brinke and wash of the Sea: infomuch as the Hebrewes being terrified with Pharachs sudden approach, began to despaire, and to mutine, at that time when it behoved them most to have taken conrage for their owne defence; laying it to Moses charge, that themselves foresaw those perls in which they were wrapped. And feare, Which, faith the booke of Wisedome, is the capitality betraying of those fuccours which reason offereth, made them both despaire in Gods former promites, and to be forgetfull of their owne strength and multitudes.

Exod.14.13.

Of their passage over the Red Sea : and of the Red Sea it selfe.

But Moses who seared nothing but God himselfe, perswaded them to be considered in his goodnesse, who hath never abandoned those, that affuredly trust in him, using this comfortable and resolved speech: Feare not, &c. for the Egyptians whom ye have seenethis day, ye shall never see them againe. The Lord shall sight for you. After which Moses called on God for succour, received encouragement, and commandement to go on in these words: Wherefore cryest thou unto me? Speake unto the children of Israel that they goe forward; and lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out thy band upon the Sea. Moses obeying the children of Israel goe on dry ground through the middess of the Sea. Moses obeying the voyce of God, in the darke of the night finding the sands uncovered, pate on towards the other side and coast of Arabia: two parts of the night being spent ere he entred the Foord, which it pleased God by a forcible Easterne winde, and by Moses rodto prepare.

Pharaoh followed him even at the heeles, finding the fame dry ground which Moles trod on. Therefore, as it is written : The Angel of God which went before the Hoft of Ifral. removed, and went behindethem; also the pillar of the cloud went from before them, and find behinde them; which is, that it pleased God therein either by his immediate power, or by the ministery of his Angel, to interpose his defence betweene the Hebrewes and their E nemies; to the end that the Egyptians might hereby be blinded, it fuch fort, as they could not purfue Ifrael with any harmefull speede. But in the morning watch Moses seized the other banke of Arabia fide : and Pharaob (as the dawne of day began to illighten the obscure aire) finding a beginning of the Seas returne, hasted himselfe towards his own, Coaft : But Moses stretched forth his hand, and the Seareturned to his force, that is, the Ser moved by the power of God, ran backe towards the land with unrefiftable fury & fwiftnesse, and overwhelmed the whole Army of Pharaob, so as not one escaped. For it is written, that God tooke off their Chariot wheeles, that is, when the waters began to coverth Sands, the Egyptians being strucken with feare of death, ran one athwart another, and milfing the path by which they had past on after the Hebrewes, their wheeles stucke fast in the mud and quick-fands, and could not be drawne out: the Sea comming against them with fupernaturall violence.

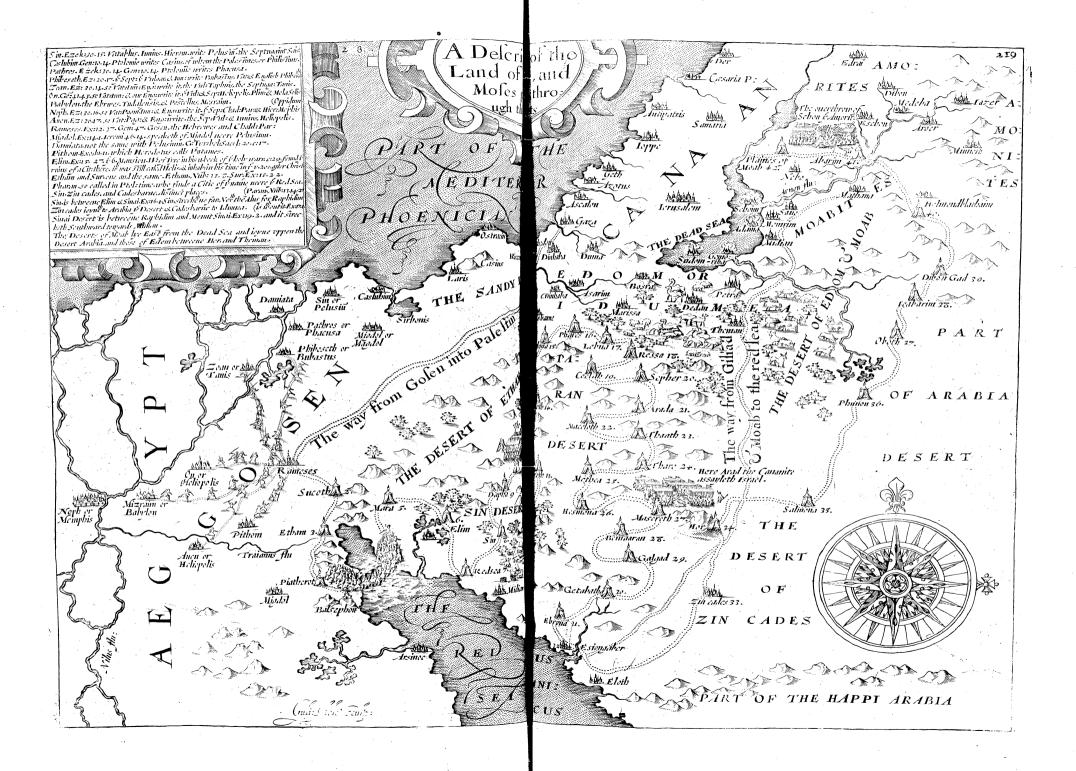

Lyranus upon Exad. 14. and others, following the opinions or old Traditions of the Hebrewes, conceived, that after Moses had by the power of God divided the Red Sea, and that the children of Israel were fearefull to enter it, Aminadab Prince or Leader of the Tribe of Juda first made the adventure; and that therefore was that Tribe ever after honored above the rest, according to the prophecy of Jacob, Gen. 49.8. Thy fathers somes shall bow downe unto thee. But Hierome upon the 11. of Hosea condemnes this opinion. And though it be true, that Juda had the first place in all their marches in the Desart, and, as we now call it, led the Vantgard, (whereupon it may be inferred, that he also led the way through the Red Sea) yet that Moses himselfe was the Conductor of Israel at that time, it is generally received. For, as it is written in the 77. Psalme: Thou didst leade thy peopletic sheepe by the band of Moses and Aaron.

The Hebrewes have also another fancy, that the Red Sea was divided into twelve parts, and that every Tribe past over in a path apart, because it is written in the 135. Pfalm, according to the vulgar: Divisit mare rubrum in divisiones, He divided the Red Sea in divisions. Also that the bottome of the Sea became as a greene Field or Pasture. But Origen, Epiphanius, Abulensis, and Genebrard, favouring this conceit, had forgotten to confider, that there were not twelve Pillars, nor twelve Armies of the Egyptians. It is written Pfalme 77.v.16.Tby way is in the Sea; not thy wayes: and in the last booke of Wisedoms, surface, that there was away.

Now this Sea, through which Moses past, and in which Pharaoh, otherwise called Chineses, perished in the 16 yeare of his reigne, is commonly knowned by the name of the Red Sea, though the same differ nothing at all in natural colour from other wates. But as Philostratus in his third booke noteth, and our selves know by experience, it is of a bluish colour, as other Seasare. It entreth at a narrow strait betweene Araba the Happy and Ethiopia, or the land of the Abysius: the mouth of the indraught from the Cape, which Ptolomy calleth Possedium, to the other Land of Athiopia, hath not above

fixe leagues inbreadth, and the fame also filled every where with Ilands, but afterwards it extendeth it selfe 58. Leagues from Coast to Coast, and it runneth up between Arabia the Happy, and Arabia Petras, on one fide, and Athiopia and Egypt on the other, as far as Sues, the uttermost end and indraught of that Sea: where the Turke now keepeth his fleet of Gallies. The Cosmographers commonly give it the name of the Arabian Gulfe: but the North part towards Sues, and where Mofes past, is called Heropolites of the City Hero; fometime Troy, and of later times Sues. Plinie cals it Cambifu, by which name it was Plin.lo.cizgo knowne, faith he, before it was called Hero many yeares. The Arabians call this Sea towards the North Apocopa, Eccant, & Eant. Artemidorus writes it Aleniticum: King Tuba Laniticum, others more properly Elaniticum, of the Port & Citie Elana: which the Septuagint call Elath: Ptolomy, Elana: Pliny, Lana: Josephus, Ilana: and Marius Niger, Aila: Josephus. there is also Ilalah in Affyria, to which Salmanaffar carryed the Ifraelites captive, 2. Kings c.8.v.11. which Ilalah in Affyria, the Septuagint call Elea: and in the first of Chro. the c. Ala. But as for this Red Sea or the parts thereof, thus diverfly named, the Moores and Arabians (Vassals to the Turk) know it by no other appellation, than the Gulfe of Meca, after the name of Mahomets Towne Mecca. The Greekes write it the Sea Erythraum, of a King called Erythras, or Erythraus: and because Erythras in the Greeke fignifieth Red hence it is, that being denominated of this Erythraus, the sonne of Perfeus and Andro- Ariande gellimeda, yet it tooke the name of the Red Sea, as Quin. Curtius conjectureth: which Aria- Alex. Mag. 1.8. nus and Srabo confirme. But it feemeth to me by the view of a discovery of that Sea in the yeare 1544. performed by Stephen Gama, Viceroy of the East India for the King of Portugal, that this Sea was so called from a reflection of rednesse, both from the banks. clifts, and fands of many Ilands, and part of the Continent bordering it. For I finde by the report of Castro, a principall Commander under Gama (which discourse I gave Master Richard Hacluit to publish) that there is an Iland called Dalaqua, forme time Legues, containing in length 25. Leagues, and 12 in breadth, the earth, fands, & clifts, of which fland, being of a reddish colour, serve for a foile to the waters about it and make it seeme altogether of the same colour. Secondly, the same Castro reporteth, that from 24 degrees of Septentrionall Latitude, to 27 (which make in length of Coast 180 miles, lying as it doth Northerly and Southerly) all the clifts and banks are of red earth or stone, which by reflection of the Sun-beames, give a kinde of reddish luster to the waters. Thirdly, those Portugals report, and we know it by many testimonies, that there are found in the bottome of this Seatowards the shore, great abundance of red stones, on which the greatest store of Corrall growes, which is carryed into most parts of Europe, & elsewhere. There are also on the Ilands of this Sea many red Trees, saith Strabo, and those growing under water may also be a cause of such a colour. Of these appearances of rednesse by the shadows of these stones, sands, earth, & clifts, I suppose that it first tooke the name of the Red Sea, because in so many places it seemeth to be such: which Johannes Barros in his second Decade, eight Booke and first Chapter, confirmeth.

The breadth of this Sea from Elana or Ezion-Gaber adjoyning, now Tere, called by the ancient Cosmographers Sinus Elaniticus, which washeth the banks of Madian or Midian, is for 16.01 17. Leagues together, along Northward towards Sues, some three Leagues or nine English miles over, and from this Port of Toro to Sues, and the end of this Sea it is in length about 28. Leagues, of which the first 26. have nine miles breadth, as aforefaid, and afterward the lands both from Egypt and Arabia, thrust themselves into the Sea, and streighten it so fast; as for six miles together it is not above three miles over; from thence upward the land on Egypt fide, falleth away, and makes a kinde of Bay or Cove for fome ten miles together, after which the land growes upon the Sea againe, and fo binds itinto the very end thereof, at four emiles breadth or thereabout, in which tract it was that Moses past it over, though others would have it to be over-against Elana or Toro, but without judgement: for from Ramases to Pibacheroth and Baalzephon, there is not above 30 miles interjacent, or 35 miles at most, which Moses past over in three dayes: and betweene the land of Egypt opposite to Elana or Toro, the distance is above 80 miles. For Namales, to which City Moles came (being the Metropolis of Golen) when he left Pharao at Zoan, and tooke his last leave, standeth in 30. degrees five minutes of Septentrionall Latitude; and Migdolor the Valley of Pihacheroth, at the foot of the Mountaine Climax, or Baail ephon, in nine and twenty and a halfe, which made a difference of five and

That the passage through the Red Seawas miraculous, and not a low Ebbe.

He Egyptians, and of them the Memphites, and other Heathen Writers, who in hatred of the Hebrewes have objected that Moses past over the Red Sea at a low ebbe, upon a great fpring-tyde, and that Pharaoh, conducted more by fury than discretion, pursued him so farre, as before he could recover the coast of Egypt, he was over-taken by the floud, and therein perished; did not well consider the nature of this place with other circumstances. For, not to borrow strength from that part of the Scriptures, which makes it plaine, that the Waters were divided, and that God wrought this mincle by an Easterly winde, and by the hand and rod of Moses (which authority to men that believe not therein, perswadeth nothing) I say, that by the same natural reason unto which they fasten themselves, it is made manifest, that had there beene no other working power from above, or affiftance given from God himselfe to Moses and the children of Israel, than ordinary and casuall, then could not Pharae and all his Army have perished in

For wherefoever there is any ebbing of the Sea in any gulfe, or indraught, there do the waters fall away from the Land, and runne downwards toward the Ocean, leaving all that part towards the Land as farre as the Sea canebbe, or fall off, to be dry Land Now, Moles entring the Sea at Migdol under BaalZephon (if he had taken the advantage and opportunity of the tyde) must have left all that end of the Red Sea towards Sues, on his left hand dry and uncovered. For if a paffage were made by falling away of the water to or twelve miles farther into the Sea than Sues, and betweene it and where Moles walk who entred the fame so farre below it, and towards the body of the same Sea: it followeth then, that if all that part of the Sleeve or Strait, had bin by the ebbe of a spring-tyde discovered, when Pharao found the floud increasing, he needed not to have returned by the same way toward Egypt side, but might have gone on in his returne before the tyd, on his right hand: and so taken ground againe at the end of that Sea, at Sues it selfe, orellwhere. But the Scriptures do truely witnesse the contrary, that is, That the Sea did mig fall away from the Land, as naturally it doth, but that Moses past on betweene two Sen, and that the waters were divided. Otherwise Pharas by any returne of waters could in have perished, as he did : and therefore the effects of that great Armies destruction, prove the cause to have beene a power above nature, and the miraculous worke of God himfelfe. Againe, those words of the Scriptures, that God caused the Sea to runne backety a ftrong East-winde, doe rather prove the miracle, than that thereby was caused an ebbe more than ordinary: for that Sea did not Ive East and West, but in effect North and South. And it must have beene a West and North-west winde, that must have driven those waters away through their proper Channels, and to the South-east into the Sta But the East winde blew athwart the Sea, and cut it asunder: so as one part fell backen towards the South and maine body thereof, the other part remained towards Suis, and the North. Which being unknowne to Pharao: while he was checkt by that Sta which used in all times before to ebbe away, the floud prest him and over-whelmed him. Thirdly, seeing Josephus avoweth, that Moses was not onely of excellent judgement generally, but also, so great a Captaine, as he over-threw the Athiopians in battels, being imployed by Pharao, and wanne divers Cities feeming impregnable: it were barbarous to condemne him of this groffenesse, and distraction: that rather than he would have endured the hardnesse of a Mountainous passage at hand (had not God commanded him to take that way, and foretold him of the honour which he would then winne upon Pharao) he would have trusted to the advantage of an ebbing water. For s he knew not the contrary, but that Pharao might have found him, and prest him, a well when it flowed as when it ebbed, as it feemeth he did. For the people, beholding Pharaohs approach, cryed out against Moses, and despaired altogether of their safetie: and when Moses prayed unto God for helpe, he was answered by God: Wherest cryest thou unto me ? Speake unto the children of Israel that they goe forward, and lift its up thy rod, and stretch out thy hand upon the Sea, and divide it : which proves, had there was not at the time of Pharoahs approach any ebbe at all; but that God did dipert and cut through the weight of waters, by a strong East-winde, whereby the Sands discovered themselves between the Sea on the left hand toward Sues, from whence the waters moved not, and the Sea which was towards the South on the right hand, So that the waters were a wall unto them on the right hand, and on the left hand, that is, the waters so defended them on both sides, as the Egyptians could only follow them in the same path, not that the waters stood upright as wals doe, as some of the Schoole-men have fancied. For had Pharaoh and the Egyptians perceived any such buildings in the Sea, they would soone have quitted the chase and pursuit of Israel. Furthermore, there is no man of judgement, that can think, that Pharaoh and the Egyptians, who then excelled all Nations in the observations of heavenly Motions, could be ignorant of the fluxes & refluxes of the Sea, in his owne Country, on his own Coast, and in his own most traded and frequented Ports and Havens; and wherein, his people having had fo many hundreds of years experience of the tydes, he could not be caught, ashe was, through ignorance, nor by any foreknown or naturall accident, but by Gods powerfull hand onely which then falleth most heavily on all men, when looking through no other spectacle but their own prosperity, they least discerne it comming, and least seare it. Lastly, if the Army of the Egyptians had been overtaken by the ordinary returne of the floud before they could recover their own Coast; their bodies drowned would have been carried with the floud which runneth up to Sues, and to the end of that Sea, and not have been castashore on that Coast of Arabia where Moses landed, to wit, upon the Sea-bank over against Baalzephon, on Arabia side: where it was that the Ifraelites saw their dead bodies, and not at the end of the Red Sea, to which place the ordinary floud would have carried them: Which floud doth not any where croffe the Channell, and run athwart it, as it must have done from Egypt side to Arabia, to have cast the bodies there; but it keeps the naturall course towards the end of that Sea: and to which their carkaffes should havebeen carried, if the worke had not beene supernaturall and miraculous. Apollonius in the lives of the Fathers affirmeth, that those of the Egyptians which stayed in the country, and did not follow Pharaoh in the pursuit of Israel, did ever after honour those Beafts, Birds, Plants, or other Creatures, about which they were bufied at the time of Pharaohs destruction: as he that was then labouring in his garden, made a god of that Plantor Root, about which he was occupied: and fo of the reft. But how those multitudes ofgods were erected among them, a more probable reason shall be given elsewhere. Orofus, in his first Booke and tenth Chapter against the Pagans, tels us, that in his time, who lived some 400. years after Christ, the prints of Pharaohs Chariot wheels were to be feen at a low water on the Egyptian fands: and though they were fometime defaced by wind and weather, yet soon after they appeared again. But hereof I leave every man to Ramefes, and marched to Succoth. Exod.13.

And departing thence, they made their third Station at Etham: and journying from E. tham, they encamped in the Valley of Pihacheroth, or Migdol, under the Mountain Ball, in zephon; and in the same night after mid-night, they past the Red Sea: Pharaob and his Army perishing in their returne, about the first dawne of the day. Moses having reco. vered the bankes of Arabia, gave thankes unto God, for the delivery of Israel; and ma king noftay on that coaft, entred the Defarts of Arabia Petræa, called Sur. But finding 10 water in that passage, he incamped at Marah, in the Desart of Etham, which in Exed. IS. v.22. is also called Sur, 25. miles from the Sea: where the children of Israel, prest with extreme thirst, murmured against Moses the second time; first at Pharaohs approach in Pihacheroth, and now in Arabia. But Moses taking the branches of a tree, growing neme a Lake of bitter water, and casting the same thereinto, made the same sweet : a plain Type and Figure of our Saviour; who upon the tree of the Croffe changed the bitternesseof everlafting death into the fweetneffe of eternall life. Plinie remembers these bitter Fountaines in his fixth Book and 29. Chapter. From whence to Delta in Egypt, Sefoftra first, Darius after him, and laftly, Ptolomie the second, began to cut an artificiall River, thereby by Boats and small Shipping to trade & navigate the Red Sea, from the great Citiesup on Nilus. From Marah he removed to Elim, the fixth Manfion, a march of eight miles where finding twelve Fountaines of fweet water, and threefcore and ten Palmetrees,

Whether this Helim were the name of a Towne or City in Moses time, I cannot s firme. And yet the scarcity of waters in that Region was such, as Helim, which twelve Fountaines, could hardly be left unpeopled. William, Archbishop of Tyre, in the History of the Holy Warre, found at Helim the ruines of a great and ancient City. An at fuch time as Baldwine the first past that way into Egypt. Ingressias (faith he) Helimo vitatem antiquissimam, populo Israelitico aliquando familiarem; ad quam cum pervenija loci illines incola, Regis adventu pracognito, naviculam ingredientes, in mare vicinum fem tulerunt: Entring Helim a very ancient City well known sometime to the people of I fracht ther, when he came the inhabitants, forewarned of the Kings approach, took Boate, and find themselves into the Sea, lying neere them. From Elim he returned again towards the South and fate downe by the banks of the Red Sea: the feventh manfion. For it feemeththat he had knowledge of Amalech, who repaired to refift his paffage through that part of A rabia. And Moses, who had not as yet trained those of the Hebrewes, appointed to beat a armes: nor affured the mindes of the rest, who encountring with the least misery, were more apt to returne to their quiet flavery, than either to endure the wants and pents which every where accompanied them in that passage, or at this time to undertaked fustaine so dangerous an enemie: he therefore made stay at this Mansion untill the teenth of this fecond Moneth called Zim, or Jiar: and made the eight Manfion in the Defart of Zin; where the children of Israel mutined against Moses the third time, having want of food. In the fixteenth chapter of Exodus, Moses omitteth this retrait from Ein to the red Sea, but in the collection of every feverall incamping, in the 33. of Numberia is set downe.

Here it pleased God to send so many slights of Quailes, as all the Country about their incamping was covered with them. The morning following it also rained Manna, being the fixteenth of their Moneth, which served them in stead of bread. For now was the Rore confumed which the people carried with them out of Egypt. And though the feed themselves with many of those: but reserved them, both for the milke to relect the children withall, and for breed to store themselves when they came to the Land promised.

From hence towards Raphidim they made two removes of twenty miles: the of to Daphea, the other to Alus, distant from Raphedim fixe miles. Here being againe prest with want of water, they murmured the fourth time, and repented them of their departure from Egypt, where they rather contented themselves to be sed and beaten after the manner of bealts, than to fuffer a cafuall and fometime necessary want, and to undergoe the hazzards and travailes which every manly minde feeketh after, for the love of God, and their own freedomes. But Mofes with the fame rod which he divided the Sea withand then own the Elders of Ifrael, brought waters out of the rocke, wherewith the Exedition of the Amalekites, Madianities, and Kenites, upon occasion of the battel with the Amalekites? and Jethroes comming: who being a Kenite, was Priest of Madian.

Nd while Mofes incamped in this place, the Amalekites who had knowledge of his approach, and gheffed that he meant to leade the children of Ifrael through their Country (which being barren of it felfe, would be utterly wasted by so great a multitude of people and cattell) thought it most for their advantage to set upon them at Raphidim: where the want of water, and all other things needfull for the life of man, infeebled them. On the other fide, Moses perceiving their resolutions, gave charge Exodard to Josuato draw out a sufficient number of the ablest Hebrewes, to incounter Amalech. Between whom and Ifrael, the victory remained doubtfull, for the most part of the day: the Hebrewes and Amalekites contending with equall hopes and repulses for many hours. And had not the strength of Moses prayers to God been of far greater force, and more prevalent, than all refistance and attempt made by the bodies of men; that valiant and warlike Nation had greatly endangered the whole enterprife. For those bodies which are macquainted with scarcity of food, and those mindes whom a servile education hath dulled, being beaten, & despaired in their first attempts, will hardly, or never be brought again to hazzard themselves.

After this victory, Jethro repaired to Moses, bringing with him Moses his wife, and his two Sons, which either Jethro forbareto conduct, or Moses to receive, till he had by this overthrow of Amalech the better affured himselfe of that part of Arabia. For it is written in the 18. of Exod.v.1. When Jethro the Priest of Madian, Moses Father in Law, heard all that God had done for Moses, erc. of which, the last deed, to wit, the overthrow of Amalech, gave Jethro courage and affurance, he then repaired to his fon in law Mofes, at Sinai; where among st other things, he advised Moses to appoint Judges, and other Officers, over Ifrael; being himselfe unable to give order in all causes and controversies, among so ma-my thousands of people, full of discontentment and private controversie.

This Jethro, although he dwelt amongst the Madianites, yet he was by Nationa Kenite, as in the fourth of Judges v.11.6 17. it is manifest: where it is written; Now Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, to wit, the sonne of Jethro, the father in law of Moles, was departed from the Kenites, and pitched his Tents untill the Plaine of Zaanaim, Casswas which is by Kedesh. Likewise in the first of Samuel, Saul commanded the Kenites to depart from among the Amalekites, left he should destroy them with the Amalekites. For the Kenites inhabited the mountains of Sin Kadesh: and the Amalekites dwelt in the Plains, Numra 40,28, according to the faying of Balaam, speaking of the Kenites; Strong is thy dwelling place, t Same.15. and thou hast put thy nest in the Rocke. And that Saul spared this Nation, he giveth for cause, that they shewed mercy to all the children of Israel, when they came up from General Egypt. For these Kenites were a Nation of the Madianites, and the Madianites were of the iffues of Madian, one of the fixe formes which Abraham begat on Kethura: and might also take that name of Kenites from Kethura, of whom they descended by the Mother, who (as it feemeth) kept the knowledge of the true God among them, which they received from their Parent Abraham. For Moses, whenhe fled out of Egypt flore consumed which the people carried with them out of Egypt. And thought and married the daughter of Jethro, would not (had he found them I had great numbers of cattell and sheepe among them, yet it seemeth that they dust a dolaters) have made Jethroes daughter the Mother of his children. And although the Kenites are named amongst those Nations, which God promised, that the seed of Abraham should root out, and inherite their lands; yet it cannot be meant by these who are descended from Abraham himselfe: but by some other Nation, bearing the same name; and in all likelihood of the race of Chus. For in the fifteenth of Genesis verse nineteene, these Kenites or Chustes are listed with the Hittites & Perizzites, with the Amorites, Canaanites, Gergefites, and Jebusites, which were indeed afterwards rooted out. But these Kenites, descended from Abraham, had separated themselves from amono the rest, which were altogether idolatrous. For, as it is before remembred, Heber the Ke. nite, which was of the children of Hobab, was departed from the Kenites; that is to fav. from those Kenites of Canaan, and inhabited in Zaanaim, which is by Kedelhor Cadelh. A gain, Moses nameth that Nation of the Kenites, before Midian, or any of Abrahams other fonnes were borne; which he did(referring my felfe to better judgement)rather, because they were more ancient, than by anticipation.

And as of the Kenites, fo we may confider of the Madianites, parted by Moses into five Tribes. For some of them were corrupted, and heathers; as those of Madian by the River Zared, afterwards destroyed by Moses. But the Madianites neer the banks of the Red Sea, where Moses married his wife Zippora, and with whom he left her & hischildren, till after the overthrow of Amalech, feeme likewise not to have been corrupted. For these Madianites with the Kenites, affished Ifrael, and guided them in the Delaris. But the Madianites in Moab, and to the North of the Metropolis of Arabia, called Petras. were by Ifrael rooted out, when those adjoyning to the Red Sea were not touched.

And though it may be doubted, whether those of Madian, of whom Fethro was Priest and the other Cities in Moab were the fame, yet the contrary is more probable. For Mo-13 fes would not have fent 12000. Ifraelites, as far backe as the Red Sea, from the Plainsof Most, to have destroyed that Madian, where his wives kindred inhabited; seeing himselfe comming with 600000. able men, was encountred by Amalech, in that passage. Neither could Moses forget the length of the way through those discomfortable Desarts, when himselfe and Israel had wandred 40. yeares.

That Jethro, or Jothor, Raguel or Revel, and Hobab, were but one person, the Scriptures teach us. For the Vulgar & Septuagint, which call him Raguel, and our English Revel, Ex. odus 2.18.cals him Jethro, or Jother, Exed. 3.6 v.1.6.4.v.18.6 6.18.1.6 6.9.10.612. and in Nam. c. 10. v. 29. Hobab. Others take fethro & Hobab to be the fame, but not Raguel.

He rest of the moneths of this yeare 2515. were spent in the Desart of Sinal, neere the mountaine of Sinai or Horeb, the twelfth Mansion- Eufebias thought that Sinai & Horeb were distinct mountaines: Hierome, to be but one, of adouble name. And fo it appeareth by many Scriptures. For, in Exod. 3. v.1. it is called Horeb : and in Exod. 24. v. 19. it is written Sinai. In the 106. Pfalme v. 19. Horeb : in Exod. 19.11. Sinai. And fo is it called, Galatians 4.24. and againe, Deut. 4.10. & 15. & Deut. 16 5.2. Horeb. And fo is it in the first of Kin. 8.6. and the second of Chron. 5.10. and in Ma. lachy 4.4. Finally, in Ecclefiasticus the 48.7. they are named as one. Which heardest (faith Ecclesiasticus) the rebuke of the Lord in Sinai, and in Horeb the judgement of the vengeand. Somewhat they are dis-joyned at the top by the report of Peter Belonius. who in the yeare 1588. past out of Egypt into Arabia, with Monsieur de Fumet, of France, and travailed to the top both of Sinai and Horeb: Sinai being by far the higher hill. From the fide of Horeb (faith he) there falleth a very faire fpring of water into the Valley adjoyning: where he found two Monasteries of Christian Marronites, containing some 100. Religious persons of divers Nations, who had pleasant gardens, delicate fruits, and excellent Fu.Bell. 2:6.61 wine. These (faith the same Author) give entertainment to all strangers, which passes

> Now that there was some such Torrent of water neere Sinai in Moses time, it is very probable: First, because he encamped thereabout almosta yeare, anddrew no water, as in other places, by miracle: secondly, because it is written, Exod.32.20. that when Moses had broken the golden Calfe to powder, which Aaron set up in his absence, he cast the powder thereof into the water, and made the children of I/rael to drinke thereof.

On this mountaine, the Law by the Angel of God was given to Moses, where he staied a whole yeare, wanting some ten or twelve daies: for he removed not till the 20. day of the second moneth of the second years; and he arrived about the 45 day after the egression: the Law being given the 50. day.

At this Manfion all was done, which is written from the beginning of the 29. Chapter of Exodus, to the end of that booke; all in Leviticus; and all in Numbers, to the 10. Chapter. Whereof (because there is no storie nor other passage) I will omit the repitition, and in place thereof speake somewhat of the Law, and the kindes and use thereof: whereby, if the Reader finde the ftory any way dif-joyned, he may turne over a few leaves, and, omitting this, finde the continuation thereof. We must first consider, that as to there can be neither foundation, building, nor continuance of any Common-wealth, without the rule, levell, and square of Lawes: so it pleased God to give thereby unto Moses the powerfullest mean (his miraculous grace excepted) to governe that multitude which he conducted; to make them victorious in their passage, and to establish them asfuredly in their conquest. For as the Northstarre is the most fixed directour of the Seamanto his defired Port: so is the Law of God the guide and conducter of all in generall, to the haven of eternall life: the Law of nature, from God his eternall law deduced, the rule of all his creatures: the Law humane, depending on both these, the guard of Kings, Magistrates, and vertuous men; yea, the very spirit, and the very sinewes of every Estate in the world, by which they live and move: the Law, to wit, a just law, being refembled to an Heart without affection, to an Eye without luft, and to a Minde without paffion; a Treasurer, which keepeth for every man what he hath, and distributeth to every man what he ought to have. This benefit the Ancient, though barbarous, efteemed folighly, that among them, those which were taken for the first makers of Lawes, were honoured as gods, or as the fons of gods: and the rest, that made either additions or corrections, were commended to all posteritie for men of no lesse vertue, and no lesse liberally beneficiall to their Countries, than the greatest and most prosperous Conquerours that ever governed them. The Ifraelites, the Lacedamonians, and the Athenians, received their Lawes from one : as the Ifraelites, from Mofes; the Lacedamonians from Lycurgus; the Athenians from Solon; the Romanes sometime from their first Kings, from their Decem wiri, from their Senatours, from their Lawyers, and from the people themselves: other from the Prince, Nobilitie, and People; as in England, France, and in other Christian Momarchies and Estates.

S. IV.
Of the name and meaning of the words, Law, and Right.

He word Lex, or Law, is not alwayes taken alike, but is diverfly, and in an indifferent sense used. For if we consider it at large, it may be understood for any rule prescribing a necessary meane, order, and methode, for the attaining of an end. And so the rules of Grammar, or other Arts, are called Lawes. Or it is taken for any private ordinance of Superiours to Inferiours: for the commandements of Tyrants₂ which they cause to be observed by force, for their decrees doe also usurp that title, according to the generall acceptation of the word Law : of which Efay, Woe unto them that Efay to decreewicked decrees, and write grievous things. Likewise, the word is used for the tumulmary resolutions of the people. For such constitutions doth Aristotle also call Lawes, though evill and unsufficient: Malalex est, qua tunneltwarie posita est; It is an evill law that though evill and unfufficient: Malatex est, qua tumultuarie posita est; It is an evill law that is made tumultuously. So as all ordinances, either good or evill, are called by the name of * Gen. 6.5.

The word Law is also taken for the morall habit of our minde, which doth (as it were) continuo has leges command our thoughts, words, and actions: framing and fashioning them according to atomaque sources it selse, as to their patterne and plat-forme. And thus the law of the flesh which the Divines call legem fomitis, is to be understood. For every law is a kinde of patterne of that where alloit is which is done according unto it: in which fense as *elsewhere, this morall habit or dispo- to be noted that he iowness there fition of the heart is called the frame or figmentum of the heart: fo in S. Also private contracts among Merchants and other Tradef-men, doe often put on the name of lawes. But law commonly and properly, is taken for a right rule, preferibing a necessary meane, for the good of a Common-wealth, or Civill communitie. The rest. to wit, the commandements of Tyrants, &c. which have not the common good for their end, but being leges iniqua, are by Thomas called violentia magis quamleges; rather com. pulsions than lawes: And what soever is not just, S. Augustine dothnot allow for lawes, howsoever established: for he calls them iniqua hominum constituta, que nec jura dicenda, nec putanda sunt; The unjust constitutions of men which are neither to bee termed no thought lawes. For, faith Aristotle, Legalia just a sunt factiva, & conservativa falicitain. Just lames are the workers and preservers of happinesse: because by them we are directed at vitam quietam, to a quiet life, according to Cicero: Yea, to life everlasting, according to the Scriptures. For the end of the Law, faith Plato, is God and his worship: Finis legis Deus & cultus ejus. Lex, or the Law is so called by the Latines à legendo, or à ligando, s reading or binding : Leges quia lecta & ad populumlata, faith Varro; For after Lawes were written and published, all men might reade them, and behold in them whereto they were bound. The other Etymology, a ligando, is no leffe agreeable with the nature of a Law. whence in the Scripture it is called also a yoke, and a band: as confregerunt jugum, dinny. runt vincula: they have broken the yoke, they have broken the bands. And in the fecond Pfalme, Dirumpamus vincula corum, & projiciamus à nobis funes ipsorum; Let us breakthin bands in funder and cast away their cords from us.

The Covenant it is called, because of the conditionall promises of God; and because Gods peoples voluntary submission of themselves unto it: for which word the Septengint, and the Epifle to the Hebrewes, usethe word Swann a Testament or last Will : which name it hath, because it is not otherwise effectuall for our salvation, but in respect of the death of the Testator; for without the death of the Testator, the Testament is of no force as Heb.9.17.it is faid, Testamentum in mortuis ratum est.

The Hebrewes call the law Thorah of teaching, because every man is thereby taught his dutic, both to God and Men. The Greekes call it Nomes of diffributing, because it distributions teth to every man his owne due; the power of the law is the power of God: Justice being an attribute proper unto God himselfe. Imperium legis imperium Dei est ; The reignoss the law, is the reigne of God.

Law in generall is thus defined by the Philosophers : Lex est vita regula, pracipiens que funt sequenda & qua fuzienda Law is the rule of life commanding what to follow, and what to shun : or Lex est omnium divinarum & bumanarum rerum Regina ; Law is the Queenor Princesse of things both humane and divine. But this description is grounded upon theopinion of inevitable fate. Law is the very wisedom of Nature: the reason and understanding of the prudent: and the rule of right and wrong. For as a right line is called Index | er curvi, the demonstrance of itself, and of the crooked: so is the law, the judge and man fure of right and wong.

M. Hooker calls the Law a directive rule to goodnesse of operation: and though laward touching the substance and effence, consist in understanding: Concludit tamen actum voluntatis; Tet it comprehends the act of our will. The word Jus is also diversly taken, as some time for the matter of the law and for common right: sometime for the law it selfe: as 744 civile, or Jus gentium. Isidore distinguisheth the two generall words Jus and Fas: whereof Jus, faith he, hath reference to men, Fas to God. Faslex divina, Jus lex humana. To goe over another mans field, is permitted, by Gods law, not by mans; and thereforeina thing out of controversie, Virgil used both these words: as Fas & jura sinunt, God and men permit.

The word Is or Right, is derived or taken from the old substantive Noune is a bidding or commandement : or perhaps from the Greeke Zeus which is the name of Jup ter, or of the Latine genitive case four; because as the Scripture speaks, the judgment is Gods For as it is certain that jus-jurandum came of Jovis-jurandum, (for fowe find it writtenin Nonius out of the ancient, in which fense the Scripture calls it juramentum Jehova) foalso we may fay, that fus came of fovis, quia fovis est: because as God is the Author & Pattern, and Maintainer of right, so also in his Vicegerents the Magistrates, he is the pronouncer and executor of right. Of this 7 w the just are denominated, justus à jure, and justitia à justo, 1he right gives name to the righteous : and justice takes her name from the just.

Of the definition of Lawes, and of the Law eternal.

Ut because lawes are manifold, and that every kind hath a proper and peculiar clefinition, it agreeth with order, first to divide and distinguish them. I meane those forts of lawes, from whence all other particulars are drawn: leaving the individuals of humane lawes to their infinite and horrible confusion.

Thelaw eternall is thus defined by Thomas. Lex aterna est aternus divina sapientia con- Va au anticeptus (ecundum quod ordinatur ad guber nationem rerum ab ipfo pracognitarum; The eternal law is the eternall conceit of Gods wisedome as it is referred to the government of things fore. knowneby himselfe.Or. Lex aterna est summa atque aterna ratio divine sapientia: quateness ves omnes ad destinatos fines ita dirigit, ut illis juxta conditionem infarum modum aliquem necessitatis adferat; It is the higher eternal reason of divine sapience: as it directeth all things in such fort to their proper ends, imposing a kinde of necessity according to their severall natures, or conditions. Now the difference lieth in this: That as the fame divine understanding directs all these to their proper ends; so it is called providence: but as it impofeth a necessity according to the nature of all things which it directs, so is it called a law.

Of this eternal law Cicero took knowledge, when in his booke of Lawes, he wrote in this manner: Erat ratio perfecta rerum natura, & adrecte faciendum impellens & à dilecto avocans : que non tum incipit lex esse cum seripta est, sed tum cum orta est. Orta autem simul est cummente divina: quamobrem lex vera atque princeps, apta adjubendumé ad vetandum. ratioel recta summi fovis; That perfect reason and nature of things, incouraging or impelling to rightfull actions, and calling us backe from evill, did not (faith lie) then begin to be alar when it was written, but when it had being. Being and beginning it had together with divine under standing and therefore a true law and a fit Princesse to command and forbid, is the right reason of the most high God. This eternall law, (if we consider it in God, or as God) is alwayes one and the fame; the nature of God being most simple: but as it is referred to divers objects, fo the reason of man findes it divers and manifold. It also seemeth one law in respect of things necessary, as the motions of the heavens, stabilitie of the earth, &c. but it appeareth otherwise to things contingent; another law to men, another to other creatures, having life, and to all those that be inanimate.

By this eternall law all things are directed, as by the counfell and providence of God: from this law all lawes are derived, as from the rule univerfall: and thereto referred, as the operation of the second to the first.

The eternall, and the divine Law, differ only in confideration; the eternall directing The charge more largely: as well every creature, to their proper and naturall ends, as it doth manto his supernaturall: but the divine law to a supernaturali end only: the natural law is thence derived, but an effect of the eternall: as it were a streame from this fountaine.

The Law humane or temporall is also thence drawn: in that it hath the forme of right reason: from which if it differ, it is then impesitio iniqua, a wicked imposition; and only borroweth the name of a law.

To this eternall law all things are subjected, as well Angels and Men, as all other creatures, creatures, or things created; whether necessary or contingent, naturall or morall, and humane. For the Law eternal I runneth through all the univerfall, and therefore it is the law also of things which are simple, naturall and inanimate.

Hence it is, that all things created are commanded to praise God their Creator and Directour: as, Praise him all ye his Angels: praise him Sunne and Moone, all bright Starres, beavens of heavens, for be hath established them for ever and ever. He hath made an ordi nancewhich shall not passe: Praise ye the Lord from the earth ye Dragons and all Deeps. Fin and haile, (now and vapours, flormy winds, which execute his word: mountains & hils, fruit. full trees and all Cedars: Beafts, and all Cattell, &c. Now as the reasonable Creatures are by this eternall law bound, by the glory and felicity proposed unto them (beatitude be to ing both the attractive, and the end) foall other naturall things and creatures, havein themselves, and in their own natures, an obedience formall to it, without any proper in tention, known cause, or end proposed. For beasts are led by sense, and naturall instinct things without life by their created forme, or formall appetites, as that which is heaviet fall downward: things light to mount upward, &c. and fire to heate what soever is appofed. This kinde of working the Aristotelians ascribe to common nature: others to fate;4 difference used in termes only; it being no other than Gods generall providence: for as it is truely faid of God, that he is omnia luper omnia: so are all things which appeare in them. felves thence derived: there-under subjected: thence-from by his eternall law and providence directed, even from the greatest to the least of his creatures, in heaven and had

The Schoolemen are very curious and ample in the confideration of these lawes: and in discourse of the profit, and of the matter, and object of the eternal law-But as the profit is manifest in the good of all creatures, who have thence-from, either reason, scrife, we getation, or appetition, to conduct them: so is the object and matter of the law, the whole creature. For according to S. Augustine, Lex aterna est, qua justum est, ut omnia sint ordinatisima; The law eternall is that, whereby it is just, that all things should be disposed in the best and goodliest order.

Lastly, it is disputed, whether the eternal law be immurable, yea or no ? But the folution is, that it changeth not; for which S. Augustine useth a sufficient argument in is; first Booke of Free-will, the fixth Chapter. For the law of Moses which had a time prefixed, was eternally by God ordained to last untill the time of the Pædagogie of Gos people, or introduction to Christ should be expired; which time of expiration some thinke our Saviour noted to be come, when on the Croffe he faid, Confammatum est. But I rather thinkethese words of our Saviour to have no other fignification, than that now the prophecie of their giving him Vinegar to drink was fulfilled. For fo Saint Johnson pounds it, when he faith v. 28. That Christ feeing all (other) things to be fulfilled, us con-Summaretur Scriptura, That the Scripture in this also might be fulfilled, said, I thirst: though I deny not, but at the same time also the date of the Law was expired, to wit, of the law ceremoniall, and of so much of the judiciall, as appertained peculiarly to the Jewes, and so agreeth not with the law of the new Testament and Gospel of Christ-For the immutable law of God, though prescribing things mutable, is not therfore changed in itselfe; but the things prescribed, change according to this eternal ordinance, of which the Wisedome of Salomon, And being one she can doe all things, and remaining in her selfe reneweth all.

Of the Law of Nature.

F the law of Nature as it is taken in generall, I finde no definition amongthe Schoole-men: only as it is considered in man, it is called the impression of divine light, and a participation of the eternall law in the reasonable creature. Lex naturalis est impressio divini luminis in nobis, & participatio legis aterna in rationali creatura. Ulpian defines the natural law to be the same which nature hath taught all living creatures: Ju na Gjure Li. til. turale est quod Natura omnia animalia docuit : and he afterward addeth, Jusistud non humani generis proprium, sed omnium animalium qua terra marique nascumtur, aviam quoque commune est; The law of nature is not proper to man alone, but the same is commonto all living creatures, as well to birds, as to those which the Lund and Son was inceth

But this definition is not generall, but of the naturall Law in things of life.

The Law of nature in generall, I take to be that disposition, instinct, and formall quality, which God in his eternall providence hathgiven and imprinted in the nature of eyes ry creature, animate, and inanimate. And as it is divinum lumen in Men, inlightning our formall reason; so is it more than sense in Beasts; and more than vegetation in plants. For it is not sense alone in Beasts, which teacheth them at first fight, and without experience or instruction, to flie from the enemies of their lives: seeing that Bulles and Horses appearcunto the fense more fearefull and terrible, than the least kinde of Dogges; and yer the Hare and Deere feedeth by the one, & flieth from the other, yea, though by them neverleene before, and that as foone as they fall from their Danimes. Neither is it sense which hath taught other Beafts to provide for Winter, Birds to build their nefts, high or low, according to the tempestuous or quiet seasons: or the Birds of India to make their nefts on the smallest twigges which hang over Rivers, and not on any other part of the tree, or elfe-where to fave their egges and young ones from the Monkies, and other Beafts, whose weight such a twigge will not beare: and which would scare to fall into the water. The instances in this kinde are exceeding many which may be given. Neither is it out of the vegetable or growing nature of plants, that fome trees, as the female of the Palmitte, will not beare any fruit except the male grow in fight. But this they do by that Law, which the infinite and unfearchable wisdome of God had in all eternity provided for them, and for every nature created. In man this Law is double, corrupt, and incormpt; corrupt, where the reason of man hath made it selfe subject, and a Vassall to paffions, and affections brutall: and incorrupt, where time and cuftome hath bred in men a newnature, which also, as is aforesaid, is a kinde of Law. For it was not by the Law of Nature incorrupt, which Saint Augustine calleth the Law of reason, but by a nature supra S.4.c. blinded and corrupted, that the Germans did anciently allow of theft: and that other Na-23. tions were by Law constrained to become Idolaters; that by the Lawes of Lycurgus it waspermitted to men to use one anothers Wife, and to the Women to choose them o- Theod. Lade thers besides their Husbands, to beget them with childe: which law in those parts hath curandis affect, lasted long, and is not forgotten to this day.

The Scythians, and the people of both Indies, hold it lawfull to bury with them the best dessess. beloved wives: as also they have many other customes remembred by G. Valentia, a-

And I know not from what authority it is, that these Lawes some men avow to be naturall: except it be of this corrupt nature, as (among others) to pay guile with guile: to becomefaithlesse among the faithlesse: to provide for our selves by another mans destruction: that injury is not done to him that is willing: to destroy those whom we seare, and the like. For taking the definition of naturall Lawes, either out of Saint Augustine or Nemo jure has Aquines, (the one calling it the impression of divine light; the other, the dictate or sen-rius detrimente tence of practique reason) the same can teach us, or incline us to no other thing, than to the locuples or siers exercise of Justice and uprightnesse: & not to offer or performe any thing toward others, debet, fave that which we would be content should be offered or performed toward our selves. For such is the Law of nature to the minde, as the eye is to the body; and that which according to David sheweth us good, that is, the observation of those things which leade Pala us thereby to our last end; which is eternall life: though of themselves not sufficient without faith and grace.

Now, that which is truly and properly the law of Nature, where the corruption is not taken for the Law, is, as aforefaid, the impression of Gods divine light in men, & a participation of the Law increated and eternall. For without any Law written, the right reason and understanding, which God hath given us, are abilities within our selves, sufficient to give us knowledge of the good and evill, which by our gratitude to God, and distribution of right to men, or by the contrary, we prepare and purchase for our selves. For when the Gentiles (faith Saint Paul) which have not the Law, do by nature those things contained in the Romana Law they having not the Law, are a Law unto themselves. Now, to love God by whom we are, and to doe the same right unto all men, which we desire should be done unto us, is an effect of the purest reason: in whose highest Turrers, the quiet of conscience hath made her resting place, and habitation; In arce altissima rationis quies habitat. Therefore, the Gentiles (faith S. Paul) which shew the effects of the Law written in their hearts, have their Roma. sonsciences for a witnesse of those effects: and the reprobate their thoughts to accuse them.

And it is most true, that whosoever is not a law unto himselfe(while he hopeth to a. busethe world by the advantage of hypocrifie) worketh nothing else, but the betraying of his owne foule, by crafty unrighteoufnesse, purchasing eternall perdition. For it helpethus nor to hide our corrupt hearts from the worlds eye, feeing from him, who is an infinite eye, we cannot hide them: fome Garlands we may gather in this May-game of the world, Sed flos ille, dum loquimur, arefeit, Those flowers mither while we discourse of their colours, or are in gathering them. That we should therefore inhabite and dwell within our felves, and become fearefull witnesses of our fecretest evils, did that reverend Philosophi Pythagoras teach in this golden precept: Nil turpe committas, neque coram alits, nequet. cum; maxime omnium verere teipsum; Commit nothing foule or dishonest, faith he, neither in be knowne to others, nor to thine owne heart : but above all men reverence thine owne confe. ence. And this may be a precept of nature and right reason: by which law, men, and a creatures, and bodies are inclined to those operations, which are answerable to the owne forme; as fireto give heate. Now, as the reasonable minde is the forme of man, is is he aptly moved to those things which his proper forme presenteth unto him: town to that which right reason offereth, and the acts of right reason, are the acts of venue and in the breach of the rules of this reason, is man least excusable : as being a reasonable creature. For all else, both sensitive, growing, and inanimate, obey the Law which God imposed on them at their first creation.

The Earth performeth her office, according to the Law of God in nature: for it bin., geth forth the bud of the hearbe which feedeth feede, &c. and the Beaft, which live thereon. He gave a Law to the Seas, and commanded them to keepe their bounds: which they obey. He made a decree for the raine, and a way for the lightning of the thunders. He caused the Sunne to move, and to give light, and to serve for signes and for seasons Were these as rebellious as man, for whose sake they were created, or did they one breake the law of their natures and formes; the whole world would then perish, and all returne to the first Chaos, darknesse, and confusion.

By this naturall Law, or Law of humane reason, did Cain perceive his owne wicked nesse and offence, in the murther of Abel: for he not onely feared the displeasure of God but the revenge of men: it being written in his reason, that whatsoever he performed w wards others, the same by others might be done unto him againe. And that this julge ment of well and evill doing, was put into our natures by God, and his eternal! Law, b fore the Law written, Mofes in the person of God witnesseth, Gen. 4. If thou doe well his show not be accepted? and if thou doe not well sinne lyeth at thy doore.

The Schoolmen are large also in this question of the natural Law: the same being open amply by Reinerius, Antonius, and Valentia. But it is not my purpose to write a Volume of this fub ject.

But this Law which Thomas Aquinas calleth an act of reason taken properly; and not habire, asitisan evident naturall judgement of practique reason: they divide intommonstrable, or needing no demonstration (as that good is to be followed, and eville) chewed) and demonstrable, which is evidently proved, out of higher and more univerfall propositions. Againe, as it answereth the natural appetite, prescribing things to defired as good, or to be avoyded as evill (as of the first, to defire to live, and to faish hunger, &c. and of the fecond, to eschew paines, forrow, and death) in this confidentian The 4.94.47.2. they divide it, according to the divers kindes of appetites that are in us. For in every min there are three forts of appetites, which answere the three degrees of naturall Law. The first is, to be that which we are ; in which is comprehended the desire, both to live, and to preserve our being and life, also the defire of issue, with care to provide for them: forth Father after his death, lives in his children; and therefore the defire of life comprehends the defire of children. And to these appetites are referred the first indemonstrable laws of nature, for the most part. For it needs no proofe, that all creatures should defire to be to live, and to be defended, and to live in their iffue, when they cannot in themselves. And as man is a being, Ens or Res: fo he doth defire good, and shun evill. For it is common to all things, to defire things agreeable to their ownenatures, which is, to defire their owner good. And so is Good defined by Aristotle, to be that which all defire. Which definition Bafil uponthe 44. Pfalme approveth : Rette quidem Bonum definierunt, Quodonnia expetunt; Rightly have some men defined Good, or Goodnesse, to be that which all things desire.

The fecond kinde of appetite is of those things which appertaine to us, as we have fense. Whence, by the law of Nature, we desire the delights of every sense; but with such moderation, as may neither glut us with fatiety, nor hurt us with excesse. For as Sense in felfe is for the preservation of life and being: so is it meete, even by the Law of nature, that the sensitive appetite should not carry us to the destruction, either of our life or being. And although (feeing both these kindes of appetites are in beasts) we may well fay, that Nature hath given divers Lawes unto them: In which fenfe the Civilians define Naturall right, or Jus naturale, to be the same which Nature hath taught all living creatures: Yet the Schoolemen admit not, that the instincts of beasts can be properly called a Law. but only a Jus, or Right, which is the matter, and aime of every Law. For so they diffinouish it; where Ulpian affirmeth, that Jus naturale is that, which Nature hath taught all living creatures. In this place (faith Valentia) Jus is not to be taken for a Law, but for the matter of the Law. And yet where ulpian also distinguisheth the right belonging to living creatures in generall, from the right belonging to men; calling the one Jus nature, the other Jus genzium: the Divines understand the law of nature more largely, that is, for all evident dictates, precepts, or biddings of divine reason, both in beasts and men; and restraine the law of Nations to a kinde of humane right.

The third appetite is of those things which appertaine properly to man, as he is aliving creature reasonable: as well with relation to God, and to our Neighbour, as for our selves: and the Lawes of this appetite are the Commandements of our Reli-

Now although there are many other branches and divisions of this law of nature and fwering the division of matter, which it prescribeth, and as manifold, as the morall actions are which it commandeth or forbiddeth: yet is the law of nature but one law according to Aquinas : first, because it hath one fountaine or roote in the naturall or motive faculty, which is but one, ftirring up to good, and declining the contrary; fecondly, becauseall is contained in that generall naturall precept. That good is to be followed. and illavoyded: and thirdly, because all the parts are reduced to one and the same last

That this Law of nature bindeth all creatures, it is manifest: and chiefly man; because he is indued with reason; in whom as reason groweth, so this band of observing the law of nature increaseth; Postquam ratio ad perfectum venit, tune sit anod for iptum est. Adveni-Bassi ente mandato, peccatum revixit; When reason grew to perfection, then it came to passe, which was written by S. Paul. When the Commandement came, sinne revived. Neither is it a small warrant for this law of nature, when those which breake the same, are said by Saint Paul, Rom 1.18 Tobe delivered over into a reprobate sense (or minde) to doe those things which are not con-Romais venient and againe, that their consciences beare witnesse, and their thoughts accuse them. For, though this law of nature stretch not to every particular; as to command fasting, and the like: yet, it commandeth in generall all good, and what soever is agreeable to right and reason. And therefore, said Damascene 3 Homines fasti sunt mali, declinando inid quod con- L.s. Fidorchi? tranaturam est; Men (faith he) are made evillaby declining unto that which is contrary to 6.30. nature: and Saint Augustine, Omne vitium naturæ nocet, ac per hoc sontra naturam est; Every vice doth wrong to nature, and is therefore conwary unto it.

Neither yet are the rules of this law of nature fo straight, but that they suffer exceptions in some particulars. For whereas by this law all menareborne Lords of the earth, yet it well alloweth inequality of portions, according to unequal merit: by taking from the evill, and giving to the good: and by permitting and commanding that all men shall enjoy the fruits of their labours to themselves: according to the rules of justice and equitie.

And though the Law of nature command, that all things be restored which are left in trust, yet in some causes, this her law she suffereth to be broken: as to deny a mad man his weapons, and the like, which he left in keeping while he was sober. But the universall principles can no more be changed, than the decrees of God are alterable: who accor- 2 Time?

6.VII. Of the written Law of GOD.

Free the eternall, and naturall, the law Positive or imposed is the next in order, which law, being nothing but an addition, or rather explication of the former, hath two kindes: Divine and Humane. Againe, the divine positive law is double, the Old and New: The Old was given unto Moses in Mount Sinas or Horeb, at such time as the world had stood 2513. whole yeeres : and in the 67. day of this yeare, whonas Afcatades or Afcades governed the Affgrians, Marathus the Sycionians, Triopus the Ar- 10 gives, Cecrops Attica, & Acherres Egypt: to wit, after the promise to Abraham, 430. years, And this it seemes, was the first written law which the world received. For the very word Nomes, fignifying a law, was not then, nor long after invented by the Gracians: no noting Homers time, who lived after the fall of Troy 80. yeares at least: and Troy it selfe was cast downe 335. yeares, after Moses led Ifrael out of Egypt. This Law, it pleased Godto ingrave in stone, that it might remaine a lasting book of his exprest will in the Churchia that the Priests and people might have wherof to meditare, till the comming of Christ& that fo these Children of Israel, though bred among an Idolatrous people in Egyps, might be without excuse, the slight defences of ignorance being taken from them.

The reason known to us why this Law was not written before, is, that when the people is were few, and their lives long, the Elders of Families might eafily, without any written Law, instruct their own Children: and yet as they increased, so doubtlesse they had, befides the law of Nature, many precepts from God, before the Law written. But nowa length, for a simuch as the law of Nature did not define all kindes of good, & evill; nor condemne every fin in particular: nor fufficiently terrifie the confciences of offenders: norfo expound divine worship, as for those after ages was required, who gave every day lest authority than other to the naturall Law; In these respects it was necessary, that the law fhould be written, & fet before the eyes of all men: which before, they might, but would not, reade in their own consciences. The Schoolemen, and the Fathers before them, inlarge the causes and necessity, why the Law was written; whereof these are the chiefest.

The first, for restraining of sin, directly grounded upon this place of David, The laws the Lord is undefiled, converting soules : The restimonies of the Lord are faithfull, giving wisedome to children. For the humane Law, faith Saint Augustine, meeteth not with all offences, either by way of prohibition or punishment; seeing thereby it might take away fomething feeming necessary, and hinder common profit: but the divine law written, forbiddeth every evill, and therefore by David it is called undefiled.

Secondly, it serveth for the direction of our mindes. For the Lawes of men can only take knowledge of outward actions, but not of internall motions, or of our disposition and will:and yet it is required, that we be no leffecteane in the one, than in the other And therfore were the words converting our foules, added by David: wherein are all out # ourward acts first generated, according to the Cabalifts. Actiones hominum nulla effort, wist prims in mente dicerentur 3 The actions of men (fay they) would be none at all, werethen not first conceived in the minde.

Thirdly, it leadeth us to the knowledge of truth, which by reason of diversitie of opinion, & difference of peculiar Lawes among fundrie Nations, we cannot be affured of; but the Law of GOD bindeth all men, and is without errour: and therefore also faid David, That thetestimony of the Law of God is faithfull : giving Wisedome to children.

Of the unwritten Law of God, given to the Patriakes by Tradition.

TOw, that in all this long tract of time, between the creation and the written Law, the world & people of God were left altogether to the law of reason & nature, it doth not appeare. For the Patriarkes of the first Age received many precepts from God himself, & whatsoever was first imposed by Adam, the same was observed by Seth, who instructed Enos: from whom it descended to Noah, Sem, Abraham, I face, Jacob, Joseph and Moses. Yea many particular Commandements afterward written, were formerly imposed and delivered over by Tradition; which kinde of teaching the Jewes afteward called Cabala, or Receptio: precepts received from the mouth of their Priests and Elders: to which the Jewes after the law written, added the interpretation of fecret mysteries, referwed in the bosomes of their Priests, and unlawfull to be uttered to the people. But the true Cabala was not to be concealed from any ; as being indeed the divine law revealed to the Patriarks, and from them delivered to the posterity, when as yet it was unwritten. The Commandements which God gave unto Adam in the beginning, were, that he should impose names to all beasts, according to their natures; to whose perfection of understanding they were fufficiently knowne. For finding the reason of his own name Adam, or Adamah, Earth, or red clay, he gave other names fignificant, not onely to beafts, but to his To Children and Nephewes, which afterward his iffues imitated; as the name of Seth fignifiethas some take it, one that was laid for the ground or foundation of the Church, or rather, one given in recompence for Abel that was flaine and Enolb fignifieth man or miferable, &c. Further, God commanded Adam to till the ground, and to live by the labour thereof: God also gave him the choice of all fruits, but the forbidden; and in Adam also was marriage first instituted: all men thence-after being commanded to co-habit with their Wives, rather than with their Father or Mother.

That murther and cruelty was also forbidden, both before the law written, and before the flood it felfe, it is manifest. God himselfe making it appeare, that it was one of the greatest causes of the destruction of mankinde by the generall slood. For God faid unto o Noa, An end of all flesh is come before me: for the earth is filled with cruelty through them: and "The common behold, I will destroy them * from the earth. That offence therefore, for which all perished, trra: but God could not be unknown to all that perished: Gods mercy and justice interposing betweene didnot dethe unraught, and revenge. This commandement God repeated to Noa, after the waters and why may were dried up from the earth : Who fo sheddeth mans blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for not this propos in the Image of God bath he made man.

Alfothe law of honouring and reverencing our Parents, was observed among the faith-fameforce, full, and the contrary punished by the fathers curfe: as, Curfed be Canaan, a fervant of fer. which it hath wants shall he be unto his brethren. Againe, we finde that the unnatural fin of the Sodomites funing on 4. was punished in the highest degree, as with fire from heaven. The sinne of Adulterie and 1. Itam 44.4. was pinnined inthe nighest degree, as which the troth the arthur the mine of the latter and & Douts 4.1.

Ravishment, was before the law no leffe detected than the reft, as appeareth by that re defectally, feedepending to the law no leffe detected than the reft, as appeareth by that re defectally, feevenge, taken for Dina's forcing: and by the judgement which Juda gave against Tamar, ingthese That she should be burnt : and by the repentance of Pharaoh & Abimelech, against whom Words are but this sentence was proportized. Thin are but dead, because of the Woman which they have this sentence was pronounced, Thou are but dead, because of the Woman which thou hast ta- that which is ken: for she is amans Wife: To these we may adde the ordinance of Sacrifice, of distinction said, verseof cleane and uncleane beafts; of Circumfion, of the brother to raife up feed to his brother nem de superfici that left a widow childleffe, and divers other constitutions, partly Morall & partly Cere- cictorie. monial, which being delivered before the written law, were after by it confirmed. So that Gen. 9.6. this Divine Law imposed, of which the Law of Moses containeth that which is called The Gen 3425. old Testament, may be said, not only to have bin written in the hearts of men, before itwas Gen. 38.24. Pengraven in stone, but also in substance to have bin given in precept to the Patriarkes. For as S. Paul witnesseth of himselfe, I knew not sinne, but by the Law: so ever the Law naturally preceded, & went before offences, though written after offences committed. It is true, that all the creatures of God were directed by some kinds of unwritten law; the Angels inmitively; Men by reason, Beasts by sense and instinct, without discourse; Plants by their vegetative powers; and things inanimate by their necessary motions, without sense or preception.

§. IX.0f the Morall, Judiciall and Ceremoniall Law, with a note prefixed, How the Scripture speaketh not alway in one sense, when it nameth the Law of Moses.

TOw as the word (Law) in generall, as is aforetaid, hath divers fignifications, & is ta-Romand ken for all do ctrine which doth prescribe & restrains to the law called the Law of Moses in particular, is taken by S. Paul diversly ; as somtime for all the old Testament, as, Now we know what foever the law faith, it faith to them which are under the Law. When it is opposed or differenced from the Prophets and Pfalmes, it is there taken for the five Bookes of Mojes. For to S. Luke harh diftinguished them; as, All muft be fulfilled Lucation which are written of me in the Law in the Prophets, and in the Pfalmes.

When

James 2. 10.

Bem. 7.12.

When it is opposed to the Gospell, then it is taken for the Law Morall, Ceremonial, and Judiciall; as, Therefore we conclude, that a man is justified by Faith, without the works of Rom.3.28.

When it is opposed to Grace, it signifies that the declaration of Gods wrath, and our guilt of condemnation; or the extremity of the law, and summum is: as, For ye are not under the Law, but under Grace. Rom.6 4. Gal.3.18.

When it is opposed to the Truth, namely, where the Ceremonies or fignes are taken for the things fignified; as the Sacrifice for Christ, and the like: then it fignifieth but flat dowes & figures ; as, The Law was given by Moses, but grace & truth came by Jesus Chris,

Lastly, when it is opposed to the time of Christs comming, it signifies the whole poli-John 1.17. cy of the Jewes Common wealth; as, Before faithcame, we were kept under the Law or. Or the Law of the order & institution of the Aaronical Priest bood; as, All the Prophets Gal.3.23. Luc.16.6. the Law, or the Priests prophesied unto John. And if the Priesthoud be changed, the Lawal.

Hcb.7.12.80 fo, to wit, of the Priest bood, must needs be changed. 10.1.

The word (Law) is sometime also taken by the Figure Metonymia, for Interest, Au. thority, and Empire, or for constraining force; as, The Law of the Spirit of life, the lawn the force of sinne and death, the enforcements of concupi sence, &c.

But the Written Law of Moses, or the Law of the Olde Testament, of which wenow speake, is thus defined. The Law is a doctrine, which was first put into the minds of men by God, and afterwards written by Moses, or by him repeated, commanding Holinesten and Justice, promising eternall life conditionally, that is, to the observers of the law, and threatning death to those which breake the law in the least. For according to S. Janu, Who soever shall keepe the whole, & faileth in one point, is guilty of all. The definition used by the Schoolemen, in which both the Old & New law are comprehended, is thus given. List divina est divinum decretum, hominibus præscribens modum necessarium ut apte pervenu possint ad supernaturalem beatitudinem, qua est ultimus humanæ vitæ finis; The divinelu (fay they) is the decree of God, prescribing unto men a necessary meane, whereby they my apely attaine supernaturall beatitude which is the last end of mans life.

The law of Moses hath three parts: Morall, Ceremoniall, and Judiciall. The Moral part commandeth this or that good to be done, and this or that evill to be avoyded, in part ticular; as also it declareth, for whole sake it is to be done; as, Dothis, for I am the Long whereas the law of nature commands it but in generall. Againe, the Morall law entrateth of vertue and goodnesse; the Ceremoniall of divine service, and of holinesse; (in externall worship, and the order of hallowing our selves unto God is called Ceremony) and the Judiciall teacheth the particular government, fit for the Common-wealth of it Jewes, and prescribeth orders for justice and equity. And therefore was it said of S. P.M. The Commandement is just, holy, and good : just, or justice being referred to the Judicial: holy, or holinesse to the Ceremoniall; good, or honest to the Morali. The Judiciall part is touching the government of the Common-wealth of the Jewes, in which many thing must needs be proper to that estate, as such as were instituted either in respect of place of

The Ceremoniallis divided into foure parts, according to the foure kindes of things of which it speaketh, to wit, Sacrifice, Holy things, Sacraments, and Observances. To Sa crifices belong beafts, and the fruites of the earth; to Holy things the Tabernacle, Tenple, Vessels, Altars and the like; to Sacraments, Circumcision, the Passeover, and such like. For Observances, they consisted either in prohibition of certaine meates, as not to eate the blood and fat of beafts: or in some other outward things, as in washings, purifyings, annoyntings, and attire, as not to weare mixt garments of Linnen and Woollen: a alfoit prohibiteth other unnaturall and unproper commixtions, as, Thou shalt not youke to gether in a Plough an Oxe and an Affe, or cast mingled seed in one field. It also exhorten to naturall compassion, and forbiddeth crueltie even to beasts, birds, and plants, whereby the creatures of God might be destroyed without any profit to man. For so some referen these precepts, Thou shalt not kill the bird sitting on her nest; nor beare downe the first badies the tree, nor muzzell the labouring oxe, and the like, to the Ceremoniall Law.

Neither is their any of these three parts of the Law of Moses, but it hath as yet in some respects, the same power which it had before the comming of Christ. For the Moralliveth still, and is not abrogated or taken away . faving in the ability of justifying or condemning; for therein are we commanded to love and worship God: and to use charitie one towards another: which for ever shall be required at our hands. Therein also are we in particular directed, how this ought to be done: which power of directing by specials rules and precepts of life, it retaineth still. For these things also are commanded in both Testaments to be observed: though principally for seare of God in the one, and for the love of God in the other.

The Ceremoniall also livethin the things which it fore-fignified. For the shadow is not destroyed, but perfected, when the body it selfe is represented to us. Besides, it still liweth, in that it giveth both inftruction and testimony of Christ, and in that it giveth direction to the Church, for some Ceremonies and Types of holy fignification, which are to fillexpedient; though in a farre fewer number than before Christs comming, and in a far

CHAP. S.10.

Laftly, the Judiciall liveth in Substance, and concerning the end, and the naturall and univerfall equitie thereof.

But the Morall faileth in the point of justification, the Ceremoniall as touching the use and external l observation (because Christ himselfe is come, of whom the ceremonies were fignes and shadowes) and the Judiciall is taken away, as farre forth as it was pecutiar to the Jewes Common-weale and policie.

S.X. A proposall of nine other points to be considered, with a touch of the five first.

A S for that which remaineth in the generall confideration of the divine written Law,

1. The dignity and worth of the Law.

2. The Majesty of the Law-giver.

3. The property and peculiarity of the people receiving it.

4. The conveniency of the time in which it was given.

5. The efficacie and power thereof.

6. The difference and agreement of the old and new Testament.

7. The end and use of the Law.

8. The fense and understanding of the Law.

9. The durance and continuance thereof.

1. The dignity of the Law is sufficiently proved by S. Paul, in these words: Wherefore the Law is holy, and the Commandement is boly, and just, and good : which three attributes are referred, as aforefaid, to the Morall, Ceremoniall, and Judiciall.

2. The Majesty of the Lawgiver is approved in all his creatures: who as he hath given all things their lives and beings, so he onely gave the Law, who could onely give the end & reward promised, to wit, the salvation of mankind: but he gave it not to Moses immediately, but by the ministery of Angels, as it is said: And the Law was ordained by Angels, in Galath 3.1% the hand of a Mediator: and in the Acts, He gave the Law by the ordinance of Angels.

3. The propriety and peculiarity of the people, receiving the Law is in three respects. First, in that they were prepared. Secondly, in that they were a Nationapart and dissevered: Thirdly, in that they were the children of the promise made to Abraham. Prepared they were, because they had the knowledge of one God, when all other Nations were Idolaters. A Nation apart and severed they were, because of Gods choice and election. Children of the promise they were, for the promise was made by God unto Abraham and his feed: not unto his feedes, as to Efan & Jacob, but to his feed, as to Jacob or Ifrael fingularly, of whom Christ. Now to Abraham and his feed were the promifes made: he faith not Gal.3. to the feeds, as speaking of many but to thy seed, as of one, which is Christ.

4. The conveniency of the time, in which it was given, is noted by S. Augustine: that it was about the middle time betweene the Law of Nature, and Grace: the Law of Nature continued from Adam to Moses: the Law written in the Commandements received by Moses in the worlds yeare 2514 continued to the Baptisme of John: from which time, begunthe Law of Grace, which shall continue to the worlds end. Other reasons for the conveniency are formerly given.

1. The fift confideration is of the efficacie of this Law, the fame being a disposition to, or figne of our Justification: but not by it felfe sufficient, but as a figure of Christ in ceremonies, and a preparation to righteoufnesse in morall precepts. For through the passion of Christ were sinnes forgiven, who taketh away the sinnes of the world: and therefore S. Paul calleth the rudiments of the law beggerly and weake; beggerly as containing no grace, weake as not able to forgive and justifie. The bloud of Goats and Bulles, and theathes of an Heifer could onely cleanse the body; but they were figures of Chriss blood, which doth cleanse the inward soule. For if the law could justifie, then Christ died in vaine.

§.X I. Of the fixt point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the Old and New Testament.

■He Old and New Testament differ in name,& in the meane & way proposed for attaining to falvation; as the Olde by works, the New by grace but in the thing it selfe, or object & remote end, they agree: which is mans happinesse & salvation The Old Testament, or Law, or Letter, or the Witnesse of Gods will, was called the Old, because it preceded the New Testament; which is an explication of the Old: from which the New taketh witnesse. Yet the New is of more excellencie, in that it doth more lively expresse, and openly and directly delineate the wayes of our redemption. It is also called the Old, to shew that in part it was to be abrogated : In that he faith the New Tells ment, be bath abrogated the Old. For the Old law, though greatly extolled by the Prophen, and delivered with wonderfull miracles, yet was it constituted in a policy perishable: the New was given in a promise of an everlasting Kingdome, and therefore called in Apocalyps, a Testament and Gospel for ever during.

The Old Testament is called the Law, because the first and chiefe part is the Laws Moses, of which the Prophets and Psalmes are Commentaries, explicating that Law.

The New Testament is called the Gospell, because the first and chiefe part thereof the glad tidings of our Redemption: the other Bookes, as the Epiftles, or Letters of Apostles, and the Acts or story of the Apostles, are plentifull interpreters thereof: The word Evangelion, signifying a joyfull, happy, & prosperous message, or (as Homer usedi) the reward given to the Messenger, bringing joyfull newes. It is also formetime taken in a facrifice, offered after victory, or other pleafing successe, as by Xenophon. In the Scripuls it hath three fignifications. First, for glad tydings in generall, as in Esay the 52. versa, concerning peace: Secondly, by an excellencie it is restrained, to signific that most in full meffage of Salvation, as in Luc. 2.10. whence also by figure it is taken for the History of Chrift: and fo we understand the foure Gospels.

Lastly, for the preaching and divulging the doctrine of Christ, as I Cor. 9.14. & 24.

The agreement of both Testaments (taken, I thinke, as they are divided in volums) is by Dancus comprised in these foure.

In their Author.

In the substance of the Covenant, or things promised.

In the foundation, to wit, Christ.

In the effects, that is, in righteousnesse and justification,

In the Author they agree, because both are of God, and therefore both one Testaman and will of God in Substance of doctrine. For as there was ever one Church, so was det one Covenant, one Adoption, and one Doctrine. As the old law doth point at Chile, to doth the new Law teach Christ: the olde proposing him as to come, the new as alreade come; one and the fame thing being promifed in both; both tending to one, and the fame end, even the falvation of our foules: which according to S. Peter, is the end of our Faith For although it be faid, that Mofes did promise by observing the Law, an earthly King dome, a land flowing with milke & hony, the propagation of children, and other worldly bleffings: yet all thefe were but figures to teach, & pledges to affure the Fathers of thou spirituall bleffings by Christ sfor by the earthly, he raised their minds to the hope of hear venly. And the Fathers not with standing these worldly goods, did yet acknowledge them felves strangers, & pilgrims, expecting the heavenly Hierusalem: according to this place the Hebrewes : Allthefe dyed in faith, and received not the promifes, but faw them a farre and believed them confessing that they were strangers and pilgrimes on the earth. which purpose also Saint Augustine, Omnine pausi veterem legem intelligunt, non attender tendentes per promissa terrena, eterna promitti: Few (faith he) do understand the old law: not attending that by things earthly eternall are promifed. And S. Hierome. Noluit Deus pascere in sonhonead. Indaos more pecorum corporalibus donis opibusque, ut Judai somniant : God would not feed 3 . . 9. the Jewes as beafts with corporall gifts and riches, as themselves dreame. And this may be gathered out of Gods own words, Ego fum Deus tuus; & ero vobis in Deum; I am thy God. and I will be your God. For the words, I will be your God, prove that it was not for the prefenr or for perishable things, that God gave them this promise, but in respect of the furure: to wit, the fafety of their foules. For as God created both body and foule, so hath he of his goodnesse, not left the better part uncared for, which liveth ever.

The agreement between the Old and New Testament in Substance, inferres also the a. greement in foundation. For Christ is called the foundation of the law, laid both by the Apostles and Prophets; in whom all the promiles of God in the Old and New, are affured: the Fathers having eaten the same spirituall foode, which we eate in our Sacraments.

The agreement in effects is, in that the knowledge of our fine miferie, which is taught us by the law, maketh way, and, as it were, ferveth in subordination to the Gospel, the proper effects whereof are mercy and falvation: to which the Law ferving as an introduction (for to those which acknowledge their fin & misery, God sheweth his mercy & salvation) may be said to agree with the Gospell in the effect. For otherwise, if we sever the Law from Subordination to the Gospel, the effects are very different: the one sheweth the way of righteousnesse by workes, the other by faith the Law woundeth, the Gospel healeth : the Law terrifieth, the Gospell allureth : Moses accuseth, Christ defendeth: Moses condemneth, Christ pardoneth. The Old restraineth the hand, the New the minde. Data eftlex que non fanaret (faith Saint Augustine) sed que agrotantes probaret; The Law was Homitad Rem given, not to helpe, but to discover sicknesse : and Saint Chrysostome; Data est len, at se home inveniret nonut morbus fanaretur, fed ut medicus quareretur The Law was given that manmight finde and know his owne imperfection : not that his disease was thereby holpen but that he might then feeke out the Phylician. For Christ came to fave the world, which the lawhadcondemned. And as Moles was but a servant, and Christ a Son; so the greatest benefit was referved to be brought, as by the worthiest person, faith Cyril: for this law Hebri made nothing perfect, but was an introduction of a better hope.

> 6. XII. Of the rest of the points proposed.

He seventh consideration is of the end, and use of the law: which is to bring us to Christ: for finding no righteouspesse in our own workes, we must seeke it in some other. But this is the last, and remote, and utmost end: the next and proper end of the law, is to prescribe righteousnesses, & to exact absolute and perfect obedience to God. Levi-18. Cursed is he which continueth not in all the things of this law.

The second end of the Law, is to render us inexcusable before God: who knowing so perfect a law, doe not keepe it the law requiring a perfect and intire, not a broken or halfe obedience: but both inward and outward righteousnesse, and performance of duty to God and Men.

The third and chiefe end of the law, is, as hath bin faid, to fend us to Christ, and his grace, being in our felves condemned and loft. For the law was delivered with thunder, and with a most violent and searefull tempest, threatning eternall death.

The fourth end of the law was to defigne, and preferve, the place of the Church and true people of God: and to hold them in one Discipline, and awe, till the comming of Christ: after whom the Church was to be dispersed over the whole world.

These be the ends of the Morall law. The end and use of the Ceremonial law, is to confirme the truth of Christ, and the new Testament. The use of the Judiciall, to teach us naturall equity and right, whereto we must conforme our selves.

The sense and understanding of the Law is double, literall and spirituall: by the literall we are taught the worship and service of God: by the spiritual the sigures and my- The seeper flicall fore-speakings of Chrift.

Lastly, for the durance or continuance of the Law, the same had being until the past-danor a Law. flonof Christ: before which time, and while Christ taught in the world, both the old and giver from be the new were in force. But after that the true factifice was offered upon the Altar of the feet, until shirt Croffe, come

Crosse, then the Jewish facrifices and ceremonics, which were Types and figures of Christ (Christ being the body of those shadowes) ceased to binde the conscience any longer: the mystery of our redemption being now by Christ and in him finished. Intoken where. of, the vaile of the Temple rent afunder; noting that the ceremoniall vailes and shadowes were now to be removed, northat the morall law of the Commandements was hereby abolished, or weakned at all: otherwise than that it had not power to condemne according to the Jewish doctrine, as aforefaid. For the observing of the law was by Christ himfelfe severely commanded : our love towards God being thereby to be witnessed. And herein David so much rejoyced, as he preferred the observation of the Law, before all that the world could yeeld. In viatestimoniorum tuorum delectatus sum, sicut in omnibus so divisies; I have bin delighted in thy law, as in all manner of riches: And again, The law of thy mouth is good for me above thousands of gold & silver. This is the love of God (faith S. John) that we keep his Commandement. And that there is no excuse for the neglect of the things commanded in the law, God himselfein Deuteronomy witnesseth. This Commandement (faith he) which I command thee this day, is not hid from thee, neither is it far off. It is not in heaven, that thou shouldest say, Who shall go up for us to beaven, and bring it us, and canse us u heare it that we may doit? neither is it beyond the Sea, that thou shouldest say, Who shall ge over the Scafor us & bring it us? &c. but the word is very neere unto thee even in thy mouth, or in thy heart for to do it. Behold (faith Moses) I have set before thee this day life and death, good and evill, in that I command thee this day, to love the Lord thy God, to walke in his wait, and to keepe his Commandements, and his Ordinances, and his Lawes, that thou maist live, or, Neither is it said in vaine in S. Matthew : Si vis ad vitamingredi, serva mandata; If the wilt enter into life, keepe the Commandements: and in S. John; Scio quia mandatum ejus ville aternaest 3 I know that his Commandement is life everlasting. And if this be the charities God, or of Mentowards God, as S. John hath taught, to wit, that we keepe his Commadements: certainely he is but a lyar, that professeth to love God, and neglecteth to ob ferve the word of his will, with all his power. And though I confesse it not in manual bility, without the speciall grace of God to fulfill the law (Christ only as man excepted) yet if we rightly consider the mercifull care which God had of his people in thosels Commandements, we shall finde in our felves, how we borrow liberty, and ratherly Thip our affections, and voluntarily loofen them from the chaines of obedience, to which the word of God and divine reason hath fastened them, than that we are excusable by those difficulties and impossibilities, which our minde (greedy of libertie) proposeth it selfe. For this is the love of God, that we keepe his Commandements, & his Commandements are not grievous. I John 5.12. and if we examine every precept apart, and then weigh them each after other, in the ballance of our consciences: it is not hard for any mann judge, by what easie perswasions, we steale away from our owne power, as unwilling to use it against our pleasing desires.

6. X III.

Of the severall Commandements of the Decalogue: and that the difficulty is not in respect of the Commandements, but by our default.

Or by the first we are commanded to acknowledge, serve, and love one God Now, whereby are we inticed to the breach of this precept e feeing every reasonable may represent the divided into many infinites: may conceive and know, that infinite power cannot be divided into many infinites: and that it is of necessitie, that by this almighty Unitie, all things have bin caused, and are continued. And if brute beafts had this knowledge of their Creator, and how in his providence he hath also provided for every of them, Which giveth to beaftes their foode; &. there is no doubt but that they would also serve and love him only.

The second precept is the forbidding of Idolatry, and worship of Images: the making whereof, out of doubt, was not the invention of an ill intent in the beginning, feeing this is generally true : Omnia mala exempla bonis initiis orta funt; All ill examples did spring and arise from good beginnings. For their first erection was to keepe the memory of menfamous for their vertue: untill (faith Lattantius) the divell crept into them, and (having blotted out the first intent) working in weake and ignorant foules, changed the nature of the one, and the reason of the other, to serve himselfe thereby. For what reasonable man, if he benot for faken of God, will call on those blinde, deafe, dumbe, and dead stocks, more worthlesse than the most worthlesse of those, that having life and reason, implore their helpe, which have neither: yea, of more vile prize and baser, than the basest of beasts, who have sense and estimation . For what doe we thereby (faith the Wiscours of Salomon) wisd. 3. vis. but call to the weake for helpe, pray to the dead for life, require aide of him that hath no experience, assistance in our journies of him that cannot goe, and successe in our affaires of him that hathno power? And whether the Idolater, or the blocke, to which he prayeth, be more senselesse, David maketh a doubt. For (faith he) they that make them are like unto them. Psalme 33.18. and so are all the rest that trust in them.

The breach of the third Commandement, is neither perfeaded by worldly pleafure. nor worldly profit: the two greatest inchanters of mortall men. No, we are no way allured to this horrible disdaine of God, unlesse the hate of good men, and Gods curse, be accounted an advantage. For as our corruptest nature gives us nothing towards it, so can ir latisfieno one appetite, except everlasting forrow, and hell dwell in our defire. And therefore this strange custome hath the divell brought up among men, without all subrletic of argument, or cunning perswasion, taking thereby the greatest and most scornfull advantage over us. For flaughter fatisfieth hatred, Theft gives fatisfiction to need, Adultery to lust, Oppression to covetousnesse: but this contemptuous offence of blasphemy, and the irreverent abuse of Gods name, as it giveth no helpe to any of our worldly affections, fo the most salvage Nations of the world do not use it.

The fourth Commandement, to keepe the Sabbath day holy, hath neither paine, burthen, nor inconvenience. For it giveth rest to the labourer, and consolation to their Masters. And that this law was imposed on man for his benefit, Moses teacheth in the reason of the law: as in Exod. 23.12. And in the seventh day thou shalt rest, that thine Oxe & thine Affe may rest, and the sonne of thy maide, and the stranger may be refreshed.

The first of the second Table to honour our Parents, with whom we are one and the fame, is a gratitude which nature it felfe hath taught us towards them, who after God gave us life and being, have begotten us, and borne us, cherished us in our weake and helplesse infancie, and bostowed on us the harvest and profit of their labours and cares. Therefore, in the Temporall and Judiciall ordinances, curfing of Parents, or the offering them violence was made death.

The next is that thou shalt not Murther, that is thou shalt not do the actes following the affections of harred. For the law of God, and after it our owne lawes, and in effect the law of all Nations, have made difference betweene flaughter cafually and furious. Affectio enim tua (faith Bracton) imponit nomen operi tuo; It is the affection and will that makes the worke fuch as it is. And certainly, who soever cannot forbear to commit murther, hath neither the grace of God, nor any use of his owne will.

The third of the fecond Table, commands us from Adultery. Now if the prefervation of Virginity have beene possible for thousands of Men and women, who in all Ages have mastered their stessly desires, and have returned chaste to their grave: It cannot be accounted a burthen, to forbear the dishonour and injurie, which we offer to others by such misse Paradia violation, feeing marriage is permitted by the lawes of God and Men, to all that affect furn. it. And there is no man living, whom the defire of beauty and forme hath so constrained, but he might with ease forbeare the prosequation of this ill, did not himselfe give sucke to this infant, and nourish warmth till it grow to strong heat, heat till it turne to fire, and fire to flame.

The fourth of the fecond Table, is, that we shall not steale. And if that kinde of violent robbery had beene used in Moses time, which many Ruffians practise now a-dayes. in England, and, to the dishonour of our Nation, more in England, than in any Region of the world among Christians; out of doubt, he would have censured them by death, and not by restitution, though quadruple. For I speake not of the poore and miserable soules, whom hunger and extreme necessitie inforceth; but of those detested Theeves, who to maintaine themselves Lord-like, assault, rob, and wound the Merchant, Artificer, and Labouring man; or breake by violence into other mens houses, and spend in Braverie, Drunkennesse, and upon Harlots, in one day, what other men sometime have laboured for all their lives: impoverishing whole Families, and taking the bread and foode from the mouthes of their children. And that this Commandement might eafily be observed, it would foone appeare if Princes would refolve, but for a few yeares to pardon none. For, it is the hope of life, and the argument of sparing the first offence, that incourageth thefe Hell-hounds. And if every man prefume to be pardoned once, there is no State or Common-wealth, but these men would in a short time impoverish or destroy it.

The second Booke of the first part

The fifth Commandement of this fecond Table, is, the prohibition of false witnesse. from which if men could not forbeare, all furety of estate and life were taken away. And so much did God detest a false witnesse, and a false accuser, especially in matters criminall, that the law ordained him to suffer the same death or punishment, which he sought by

The last of the ten Commandements forbiddeth us to covet any thing, which belon. geth to another man, either the bodies of their wives for concupifcence, or their goods for desire of gaine. And this precept seemeth the hardest for men to observe; so estee., med by reason of our fraile affections : and yet if we judge hereof rightly, it may be doubted whether it extend to all our inconfiderate fancies and vaine thoughts. For, although it benot easie to master all our sudden passions, yet we may restraine and hinder the growing, and farther increase, if we please to intend our strength, and seeke for grace, How the word Coveting reacheth to all those, it is to be considered. For Concupificatia, according to some, Est effranatus habendi appetitus; An unbridled, or unrestrained appein of having: And as touching such an appetite, we cannot excuse our selves by any ournaturall frailty, or unadvised error; But as I suppose, the word Concupiscence is more largely taken, either for adeterminate and unbridled evill intent, or for fome urging inclination thereunto. All the question is of the later fort : which is, Actus imperfectus, id est, now deli., beratus ratione, qua est principium proprium actus boni aut vitiosi; Such passions, or inclina. tions are unperfect acts, that is, not deliberated upon by reason, which is the proper principle of agood or vicious action. And fure, it may feeme, that fo long as we refift fuch motions, they harme us not: as they say, Quandiurefragamur, nibil nocent : nocent autem cames dominari permittimus; As long as we give no affent unto them, it is thought by some the they burt us not ; and that then onely they burt, when we suffer them to be are sway. But these men, as it feemes, make nothing forbidden in the tenth precept, but what hath beeneforbidden in the other: for in every Commandement, not only the outward act, but also the inward affent unto evill, though it breake not out into act, is forbidden: therefor, that we may know the difference between this Commandement and the reft, the diffin-Ction of defires is to be held: that fome are with affent, and unbridled; others bridled, and without affent. For so even the Morall Philosopher can tell us, that the Continent man hath evill desires, but without affent (for they are bridled by the strength of right reason) as on the other side the Incontinent hath good desires, but restrained and suppreffed by contrary paffions. The evill defires, when they are accompained with affait are in every Commandement forbidden, together with the outward act: and therefor, if we will have any thing proper to this Commandement, we must needs say, that the evill desires of the Continent man (that is, even those which we resist and bridle) are hereforbidden. For though he that bridleth his evill defires, be much better than he that yeeldeth unto them: yet fuch a man, even according to the Heathen Philosopher, is a not worthy the name of a vertuous man. For Aristotle himselfe makes Continentia, not to be vertue, but onely a degree unto it: confessing, that though the Continent man doe well in bridling his evill affections, yet he doth not all, feeing he ought not so muchasto have them at all. Neither is it much more, that true divinity delivereth touching this materials. ter. For, as he faith, that in the continent man the having of these evill desires, though he refift them, is the cause that he cannot be called a vertuous man: so we, that the having of them is a finne. Onely in this we excell him here: that we are able out of divinity to give the true reason of this doctrine: which is that every one sinneth, that dothnot love God with his whole heart and affection: whence it followeth, that the evill defires of the Continent man; that is, of him which bridleth them, must needs be sinne: seeing s fuch defires, though bridled, are a pulling away of a part of our heart and affection from

Seeing therefore it hath pleafed God, to make us know, that by our faithfullendevours to keepe his commandements, we witnesse our love toward himselse: we may not fafely give libertie to our vanities, by casting backe upon God(who is justice it selfe) that he hath given us precepts altogether beyond our power, and Commandements impolfible for us to keepe. For, as he is accurfed (faith Saint Hierome) that avowes that the Law is in all things possible to be observed: to he hath made the addition: Maledidus qui dicit impossibilia Deum pracepisse; accursed is he that saith that God hath commanded things (in themselves, and not through our fault) impossible. Now, as the places are many which command us to keepe the Law: fo is our weakenesseasso in the Scriptures laid before us, and therefore it is thus fafely to be understood, that we should without evafion or without betraying of our felves, doe our faithfull endevours to observe them: which if we doe unfainedly, no doubt, but God will accept our defires therein. For that there is no manjust, David witnesseth: Enter not into judgment with thy fervant, for in thy Pfal. 143. fight nostleft that liveth shall be justified. And in the first of Kings, There is no man that fin- Cap.8 v.46. nethnot: And againe, Who can say, I have made my heart cleane? But seeing there is no fin grievous without deliberation; let every mans conscience, judge him, whether he give way willingly, or restraine himselfe in all that he can, yea, or no. For when a King gives to his subject a commandement upon paine of losse of his love, to performe some services if the subject neglecting the same, seek to satisfie his soveraign with shifting excuses, out of doubt fuch a Prince will take himselfe to be derided therein.

§. XIIII.

If there were not any Religion, nor Judgement to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessary to be observed.

Nd if we confider advisedly and soberly of the Morall Law, or ten Commande-A fuch was his merciful providence in the choice of them; as were there neither pain or not observing of them; were there neither pain nor profit adjoyned to the observing, or not observing of them; were there no divine poweratall, nor any Religionamong men; yet if we did not for our own fakes strive to observe these Lawes, all society of men, and all endevours, all happinesse and content ment in this life would be taken away : and every State and common-weale in the World fall to the ground and dissolve. Therefore, these Lawes were not imposed as a burden, but as a bleffing: to the end that the innocent might be defended, that every man might enjoy the fruits of his owne travaile, that right might be done to all men from all men: that by jultice, order, and peace, we might live the lives of reasonable men, and not of beasts; of free-men, and not of flaves; of civill men, and not of favages. And hereof making our humane reason only Judge, let us see the inconveniences in this life which would follow by the breach and neglect of these Lawes.

As first, what would the issue be if we acknowledged many Gods: would not a far great ter hatred, war, and bloud-shed follow, than that which the difference of ceremonie; and diverfity of interpretation, hath already brought into the World, even among those Nations, which acknowledge one God, and one Christ?

And what could it profit mankinde to pray to Idols, and Images of gold, metall, dead stones, and rotten wood, whence nothing can be hoped, but the losse of time, and an impossibilitie to receive thence-from, either helpe or comfort:

The breach of the third Commandement bringeth therewith this disadvantage, and ill to man, that who foever taketh the name of God in vaine, shall not at any time benefit himselse by calling God to witnesse for him, when he may justly use his holy name.

The observing the Sabbath holy, giveth rest to men and beasts, and nature her selferequireth intermission of labour.

If we despise our Parents, who have given us being, we thereby teach our owne children to scorne and neglect us, when our aged yeares require comfort and help at their hands.

If murther were not forbidden, and severely punished, the race of mankinde would be extinguished: and whosoever would take the liberty to destroy others, giveth liberty to others to destroy himselfe.

If adultery were lawfull and permitted, no man could fay unto himselfe; This is my onne: there could be no inheritance proper, no honour descend to posterity, no endeyour by vertue and undertaking to raise Families: murthers and poylonings betweene man and wife would be daily committed: and every man subject to most filthy and uncleane diseases.

If stealth and violent rapine were suffered, all mankinde would shortly after perish, or live as the falvages, by rootes and acornes. For no man laboureth butto enjoy the fruits thereof. And fuch is the mischiefe of robbery, as where Moses for lesser crimes appointed restitution fourefold, policie of State and necessity hath made it death. To permit false witnesses to take all mens lives and estates from them by corruption:

the wicked would fweare against the vertuous: the waster against the wealthie: the idle beggar and loyterer, against the carefull and painfull labourer: all triall of right wereta-

ken away, and justice thereby banished out of the world. The covering of that which belongs to other men, bringeth no other profit than a di-Araction of minde, with an inward vexation: for while we covet what appertaines too. thers, we neglect our owner our appetites are therein fed with vaine and fruitlesse hopes, in fo long as we doe but covet; and if we doe attaine to the defire of the one, or the other, to wit, the wives or goods of our neighbours; we can looke for no other, but that our felves fhallalfo, either by theft or by strong hand, be deprived of our owne.

Wherein then appeareth the burthen of Gods Commandements, if there be nothing in them, but rules and directions for the generall and particular good of all living Surely, for our own good, and not in respect of himselfe, did the most mercifull and provident God ordaine them; without the observation of which, the vertues of heavenly bodies, the fertility of the earth, with all the bleffings given us in this life, would be unto usaltogether unprofitable, and of nouse. For we should remaine but in the state of brute bealt, if not in a far more unhappy condition.

6. XV. Of humane Law, written and unwritten.

MmaneLaw, of which now it followeth to speak, is first divided into two: (Mi) Written, and Unwritten. The unwritten confifts of usage, approved by time: which Isidore calls Mores: & he defines Mores to be Consuctudines vetustate m. bata; to be customes approved by antiquitie, or unwritten lawes. Now custome different from use, as the cause from the effects in that custome is by use and continuance established into a Law: but yet there where the law is defective, faith Isidore.

And of customes there are two generall natures, containing innumerable particular; the first are written customes, received and exercised by Nations, as the customes of Bur. gundy and Normandy, the ancient generall cultome of England, and the cultoms of Cafill, and other Provinces.

The second are these perty customes, used in particular Places, Cities, Hundreds, and Mannors. The generall or Nationall cultomes are some written, others unwritten.

The particular or petty customes are seldome written, but witnessed by testimony of the inhabitants. The Customes of the Duchie of Cornwall, comprehending also the Stannary of Deven, as touching Tin, and Tin causes are written in Deven, but not in Cornnell. Bur howfoever use and time hath made these customs as lawes, yet ought every customs to be rationabilis, as well as prascripta. Non firmatur tractutemporis quod de jure ab initia non subsistit; That which at first was not grounded upon good right, is not made good by conti. nuance of time. And (faith Ulpian) quod ab initio virio fum est, non potest tracta temporis conwalefore; Course of time amends not that which was naught from the first beginning. For these two deserves are necessary in all lawes of custome; the onesthat it be not repugnant to the law divine, and naturall: the other, that the cause and reason be strong, proving a right birth, and necessary continuance: it being manifest, that every custome which is a gainst the law, had his beginning from evill deeds, and therefore not without the formet considerations to be allowed. And it is true, that all customes of this nature, were but to lerated for a time, by the Law-makers, though they have beene fince continued; because posterity is not bound to examine by what cause their Ancestors were thereto moved For Non sufficit simplex toleratio. And it is in this fort over-ruled in the law Per popular consuetudo contra legeminduci non potest, nisi de voluntate illius, qui novam legem d'novam constitutionem statuere potest, qui folus Princeps est The people cannot bring in a new custom against law; fave by his will, who hath power to make a new law and ordinance, which is only

Humane Law generally taken, towit, humane law written, is by some definedit be the decree or doome of practique reason: by which humane actions are ruled and directed. Papinian calls the Law a common precept, the advisement of wife men, and d restraint of offences committed, either willingly or ignorantly. Isdore calls the Law a Constitution written, agreeing with Religion, fittest for Government and common profit: And more largely, Omneid quod ratione confifit; All that stands with reason.

Lastly, and more precisely, it is thus defined. Humane Law is a righteous decree, agree- Greg. de Valo ing with the Law natural and eternall: made by the rational discourse of those, that exer- 22 Those 91. cife publike authority: prescribing necessary observances to the subject. That every Law art. sught to be a righteous decree, S. Augustine teacheth, saying: Mihi lex esse non viderur. quajusta non fuerit; It seemes to be no law at all to me, which is not just and just it cannot be except it agree with the law naturall and eternall. For there is no Law just and legitimate, faith S. Augustine) which the Law-makers have not derived from the eternall. Nebil L. I. deliberte justum atque legitimum est, quod non ab aterna lege sibi homines derivaverune.

Secondly, it ought to be constituted by discourse of reason, whereby it is distinguished from the Law naturall, to wit, the naturall, indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration from whence the law humane is taken and deduced.

Thirdly, that it ought to be made by an authorised Magistracie, it cannot be doubted, be the government of what kinde foever. For it falleth otherwise under the Title of those decrees called Violentia, or iniqua constitutiones; Violences, or wicked confitutions.

Of humane Law there are foure properties, especially answering these foure conditi-4.Parts? onsinthe former definition. First, as it is drawne out of the law of nature: so every particular of the humane Law may be refolved into some principle or rule of the na-

Secondly, it is to be confidered as it is referred unto, and doth respect the common

Thirdly, it is to be made by publike authority.

Fourhly, concerning the matter of the Law, it prescribeth, and directeth all humane actions. And fois the law as large and divers, as all humane actions are divers, which may fallunderit. For according to Thomas, Alia lex Julia de adulterit, alia Cornelit de Sicaria: The Law of Iulian against Adultery, is one, the Cornelian against Ruffians, is another. Now the humane Law, generally taken, is in respect of the first of these considerations, divided into the Law of Nations, and the Civill.

The Law of Nations is taken leffe or more properly; leffe properly for every Law which is not of it felfe, but from other higher principles deduced: and foit feemeth that Mpian understands it : for he defineth Im gentium, or the Law of Nations, to be that which is onely common amongst Men, as Religion, and the worship of God: which is not in thevery nature of this Law of Nations; but from the principles of the Scriptures, and other divine Revelations. But the Law of Nations properly taken, is that diffate, or fentente, which is drawne from a very probable, though not from an evident principle, yet so probable, that all Nations doe affent unto the conclusion, as that the free passage of Ambasadours be granted betweene enemies, &c. which Nationall Law, according to divers acceptations, and divers confiderations had of the humane Law, may be fometime taken for a Species of the Naturall, sometime of the Humane.

Im Civile, or the Civill Law, is not the same in all Common-wealths, but in divers estates it is also divers and peculiar, and this Law is not so immediately derived from the Law of Nature, as the Law of Nations is: For it is partly deduced out of fuch principles as all Nations doe not agree in, or eafily affent unto; because they depend on particular circumstances, which are divers, and doe not fit all estates. Hereof ulpian, Ins civile, neg; in Leg 6.14 ff in totum à naturali & gentium recedit neque per omnia ei servit: itaq; cum aliquid addimus de fufficie jute vel detrahimus Juri communi, Jus proprium, id est, Civile efficimus, The Civill Law (faith he)doth neither wholly differ from the Law of Nature, and Nations, nor yes in all points obey it: therefore when we adde ought to or take from the Law that is common, we make a Law proper, that is , the Civill Law.

The Lawnow commonly called the Civill Law, had its birth in Rome: and was first Written by the Decem-viri, 303 yeares after the foundation of the City. It was com-Pounded as well out of the Athenian, & other Grecian Lawes, as out of the ancient Roman customs & Lawes Regall. The Regall Lawes were divised by the first Kings; & called Leges Regia, or Pappriana, because they were gathered by Papyrius, Tarquin then reigning. For though formany of the former Lawes as maintained Kingly authority, were abolished with the name; yet those of Servius Tullius, for Commerce and contracts, and all that appertained to Religion, and common utility, were continued, and were a part of the c.signon.t.i.out Lawes of the twelve Tables. To these Lawes of the twelve Tables were added (as the times gave occasion) those made by the Senate, called Senatuf confulta: those of the common people, called Plebei-feita, those of the Lawyers, called Responsa-prudentum: and the mon people, cancul Magistrate: which Edicts being first gathered and interpreted by Edicts of the Annual Magistrate: Julian, and presented to Adrian the Emperour, they were by him confirmed and made perpetuall Lawes, and the Volume stiled Edictum perpetuum; as those and the like Colle. ctions of Justinian afterward were.

The difference anciently between Lawes and Edicts, which the French call Reglements, to confifted in this, that Lawes are the Constitutions made or confirmed by foveraigneau thority (be the foveraignty in the people, in a few, or in one) and are withall generall and permanent: but an Edict (which is but Jussum Magistratus, unlesse by authority it be made a Law) hath end with the Officer, who made the fame, faith Varro. Qui plurimum Edicto tribuunt, legem annuam effe dicunt; They who afcribe the most unto an Edict, say that it is a Lawfor one yeere: Though Isdore doth also expresse by the word Constitutions or Edicts, those Ordinances called Acts of Prerogatives; as Constitutio vel Edictum est quod Rex, vel Imperator constituit, vel edicit; An Ordinance or Edict is that which a King or

Lastly, the Humane Law is divided into the Secular, and into the Ecclesiasticall, or Can non. The Secular commanding temporall good, to wit, the peace and tranquility ofthe Common-weale: the Ecclesia fical the spiritual good, and right Government of the Ecclesiasticall Common-wealt b, or Church: Illud natur a legem, hoc divinam spectat; That refe. Eteth the Law of Nature, this the Law of God. And fo may Jus Civile be taken two wayes, first, as distinguished from the Law of Nations, as in the first division: Secondly, as its the same with the Secular, and divers from the Ecclesiasticall. But this division of the Schoolemen is obscure. For although the Civil be the same with the Secular, as the Grall is a Law, yet the Secular is more generall, and comprehendeth both the Civill, and allo ther Lawes not Ecclesiastials. For of Secular Lawes, in use among Christian Princes, and in Christian Common-weales, there are three kindes; the Civill, which hath every where a voyce, and is in all Christian estates (England excepted) most powerfull; the Lawesof England called Common, and the Lawes of custome or Provinciall. In Spaine besides the Law Civill, they have the customes of Castill, and other Provinces. In France besides the Civill, the cultomes of Burgundy, Blogs, Berri, Nivernois, and Lodunois, &c. Tous lines situes & assis en Lodunois, seront governez selon les costumes du dit pays; All places lying mithin the precincts of Loduneis, shall be governed according to the customes of that plan There are also in France the customes of Normandy, and these of two kinds; General, ad Locall; and all purged and reformed by divers Acts of the three Estates. The Charters of confirmation of these ancient customes, before and fince their reformation have these words; Nos autem, registrum pradictum, usus laudabiles, & consuetudines antiquas, ou i laudamus, approbamus, & authoritate Regia confirmamus ; The Register aforesaid, laudable use, and ancient customes we praise, approve, & by our Kingly authority confirme. The common Law of England is also compounded of the ancient customes of the same, and of certaine Maximes by those customes of the Realme approved. Upon which customes all are grounded those Courts of Record, of the Chancery, Kings Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, with other small Courts.

These ancient customes of England have bin approved by the Kings thereof from age to age: as that custome by which no man shall be taken, imprisoned, disseised, not otherwise destroyed, but he must first be put to answer by the Law of the Land, was confirmed by the Statute of Magna Charta. It is by the ancient custome of England, that is the eldest sonnes should inherite without partition. In Germany, France, and elsewhere otherwise, and by partition. In Ireland it is the custome for all Landes (that have not bin refigned into the Kings hands) that the eldest of the House shall enjoy the Inheritance during his owne life: and fo the fecond and third eldeft (it there be so many brothers) before the Heire in lineall descent: this is called the custome of Tanistrie. For example, if a Lord of Land have foure sonnes, and the eldest of those their Brother, enjoy their Fathers Lands before the Grand-childe: the custome being grounded upon the reason of necessity. For the Irish in former times, having alwayes lived in a fubdivided Civill Warre, not only the greatest against the greatest, but every Bas ron and Gentleman one against another, were enforc't to leave successors of age and ability, to defend their owne Territories. Now as in Normandy, Burgundy, and other Provinces of France, there are certaine peculiar and petty Customes, besides the great and generall cultome of the Land, so are there in England, and in every part thereof. But the greatest bulke of our Lawes, as I take it, are the Atts of Parliament: lawes propounded and approved by the three estates of the Realm, and confirmed by the King, to the obedience of whichall men are therefore bound, because they are Alls of choice, and selfe-desire. of which alia caufa nos tenent, quam quod judicio populi recept a funt; The lawes doe there - vip ff.de. he devised, but by the approbation of the people confirmed.

Isidore fasteneth their properties to every Christian Law, that the same be honest, that it be possible, that it be according to Nature, and according to the custome of the Country salfo for the time and place, convenient, profitable, and manifest, and without respect of private profit, that it be written for the generall good. He also gives foure effects of the Law, which Modestinus comprehends in two; to wit, obligation, and instigation: the former bindes us by feare, to avoid vice; the latter encourageth with hope, to follow verthe For according to Cicero, Legem oporte; effe vitiorum emendatricem, commendatricem aut viriutum: It behoveth the Law to be a mender of vices, and a sommender of vertues. The part obligatorie or binding us to the observation of things commanded or forbidden, is aneffect common to all lawes : and it is two-fold; the one constraineth us by scare of our consciences, the other by feare of externall punishment. These two effects the law performeth, by the exercise of those two powers, to wit, Coactive and Directive.

The second of these two effects remembred by Modestinus, is Instigation, or incourage ment to vertue, as Aristotle makes it the end of the law, to make men vertuous. For lawes being such as they ought to be, doe both by prescribing and forbidding, urge us to welldoing laying before us the good and the evill, by the one and the other purchased. And this power affirmative commanding good, and power negative forbidding evill, are those into which the law is divided, as touching the matter: and in which David comprehendeth the whole body and substance thereof: saying, Declina à malo, of fac bonum, Decline Pfalme ??

CHAP.4.5.16.

6. XVI.

That onely the Prince is exempt from humane Lawes, and in what fort.

Now whether the power of the humane Law be without exception of any perfon, it is doubtfully disputed among those that have written of this subject, as well Divines as Lawyers: and namely, whether Soveraigne Princes be compellable yea,orno: But whereas there are two powers of the law, as aforefaid; the one Directive, the other Coactive: to the power Directive they ought to be subject, but not to that which constraineth. For as touching violence or punishments, no man is bound to give a prejudiciall judgement against himself; and if equals have not any power over each other, much leffe have inferiours over their superiours, from whom they receive their authority and strength.

And speaking of the supreme power of lawes, simply then is the Prince so much above the lawes, as the foule and body united, is above a dead and senselesse carkasse. For the King is truly called. Jus vivum, & lex animata: An animate & living lam. But this is true, that by giving authority to lawes, Princes both adde greatness to themselves, & conserve it; and therfore was it faid of Bratten out of Justinian; Merito debet Rextribuere legi quod Bigital lex attribute ei:nam lex facit ut ipse sit Rex; Rightfully ought the King to attribute that to the law, which the Law first attributeth to the King; for it is the Law that doth make Kings. But whereas Bratton ascribeth this power to the humane law, he is therein mistaken. four have alfo a Sonne, the three Brothers of the eldest Sonne, shall, after the death of the laws are made by God, and lawes divine; and by humane lawes onely, declared to be Kings. As for the places remembred by the Divines and Lawyers, which inferre a kinde of obligation of Princes, they teach no other thing therein, than the bond of conskings of congacon of the examples of vertuous Princes, who are to give an acticience, and profit arising from the examples of vertuous Princes, who are to give an act count of their actions to God only.

ount of their actions to God only against thee only have I sinned: therefore, the Prince can not be faid to be subject to the Law; Princeps non subjectur legi. For seeing, according to the Schoolemen, the Law humane is but quoddam organum & instrumentum potestatis qubernativa:non videtur posse ejus obligatio ad eum se extendere, ad quem ipsa vis potestatis humana non pertinet; sed vis potestatis humana non se extendit ad gubernatorem, in quo illa residet. Ergo neq; lex condita per talem potestatem obligare potest insum conditorem. O mnis enim potentia activa, est principium transmutandi aliud; Seeing humane Law (say they) is but 416 kind of Organ or Instrument of the power that governeth, it seems that it cannot extend the to binde any one whom no humane power can controll, or lay hold of : but the Governous him. self, in whom the governing power doth reside, is a person that cannot by himselfe, or by his own power be controlled. And therefore the Law which is made by such a power, cannot bindeshe law-maker himselfe: for every active ability, is a cause or principle of alteration in another body, not in the body in which it selfe resides. And seeing Princes have power to deliver Greg de Valen- others from the obligation of the Law : ergo etiam potest ipsemet Princeps sive legislator sur se voluntate pro libito ab obligatione legis liberare; Therefore also may a Prince or Lan-ma. ker at his owne will and pleasure, deliver himselfe from the bond of the Law. Therefore in the rules of the Law it is thus concluded: Subditi tementur leges observare necessitate coactionin, 10 Princeps vero sola voluntate sua, & intuitu boni communus The subjects are bound to fulfilth Law by necessity of compulsion, but the Prince onely by his own will, and regard of the common

Now concerning the politique Lawes, given by Moses to the Nation of the Israeling whether they ought to be a Prefident, from which no civill institutions of other people should presume to digresse, I will not presume to determine, but leave it as a question for fuch men to decide, whose professions give them greater ability. Thus much I may be bold to affirme, That we ought not to seeme wiser than God himselfe, who hath toldis that there are no Lawes fo righteous, as those which it pleased him to give to his Elect people to be governed by. True it is, that all Nations have their feverall qualities, wherein they differ, even from their next borderers, no leffe than in their peculiar laguages: which difagreeable conditions to governe aprly, one and the same Law very hardly were able. The Roman civill Lawes did indeed containe in order a great panof the then knowne World, without any notable inconvenience, after fuch time as once it was received and become familiar: yet was not the administration of it alike in all parts, but yeelded much unto the naturall customes of the fundry people, which it governed For whether it be through a long continued perswasion; or (as Astrologers more willing ly grant) fome influence of the Heavens; or peradventure some temper of the soilead climate, affoording matter of provocation to vice (as plenty made the Sybarites luxurious want and opportunity to steale, makes the Arabians to be Theeves) very hardit were to forbid by Law an offence so common with any people, as it wanted a name, whereby to be diffinguished from just and honest. By such rigour was the Kingdome of Congo un happily diverted from the Christian Religion, which it willingly at the first embraced but after with great fury rejected, because plurality of Wives was denied unto them, I know not how necessarily, but more contentiously than seasonably. In such cases, me thinkes it were not amisse to consider that the high God himselfe permitted some things to the Ifraelites, rather in regard of their natural disposition (for they were hard-heared) than because they were consonant unto the ancient rules of the first perfection. So, where even the generall nature of man doth condemne (as many things it doth) for wicked and unjust; there may the Law, given by Moses, worthily be deemed the most exact reformer of the evill, which forceth man, as neere as may be, to the will and pleasure of his Maker. But where nature or custome hath entertained a vicious, yet not intolerable habite, with fo long and fo publike approbation, that the vertue opposing it would seem as uncouth, as it were to walk naked in England, or to weare the English fashion of apparell in Tarkie: there may a wise and upright Law-giver, without presumption; onit formewhat that the rigour of Moses Law required; even as the good King Hezekiab did, in a matter meerely Ecclefiasticall, and therefore the lesse capable of dispensation, praying for the people; The good Lord be mercifull unto him, that prepareth his whole heart to feek the Lord God, the God of his Fathers, though he be not cleanfed according to the 2 Chro 304 purification of the Sanctuary: which prayer the Lord heard and granted.

To this effect it is well observed by Master Doctor Willer, that the morall Judicials of Moles doe partly binde, and partly are let free. They doe not hold affirmatively that we aretyed to the same severity of punishment now, which was inflicted then; but negative-To they doe hold, that now the punishment of death should not be adjudged, where senrence of death is not given by Moses: Christian Magistrates ruling under Christ the Prince 1629 of peace, that is, of Clemency and Mercy, may abate of the feverity of Moses Law, and mitigate the punishment of death, but they cannot adde unto it to make the burden more heavie: for to shew more rigour than Moses, becommeth not the Gospell. But I will not wander in this copious argument, which hath beene the subject of many learned discourses, neither will I take upon me, to speak any thing definitively in a case which dependeth still in some controversie among worthy Divines. Thus much (as in honour of the Judiciall Law, or rather of him that gave it) I may well and truly fav that the defence of it hath alwayes beene very plaufible. And furely howfoever they be not accepted (neither were it expedient) as a generall and onely Law: yet shall we hardly find any other ground, whereon the conscience of a Judge may rest, with equal satisfaction in making interpretation, or giving fentence upon doubts, arifing out of any Law befides it. Hereof, perhaps, that Judge could have beene wittnesse, of whom Fortescue, that norable Bulwarke of our Lawes, doth speake, complaining of a judgement given against a Gentlewoman at Salisbury; who being accused by her owne Man, without any other proofe, for murdering her Husband, was thereupon condemned, and burnt to ashes: the Man who accused her, within a year after being convict for the same offence, confest that his Miltris was altogether innocet of that cruel fact, whose terrible death he then (though over-late) grievously lamented: but this Judge, saith the same Author, Sapius ipse mihi fassues, quod nunquam in vita sua animum ejus de hoc facto ipse purgaret. He himself often caps confessed unto me, that he should never during his life, be able to cleare his conscience of that fatt. Wherfore that acknowledgment which other Sciences yeeld unto the Metaphyliques. that from thence are drawne propositions, able to prove the principles of Sciences, which out of the Sciences themselves cannot be proved, may justly be granted by all other politique institutions, to that of Moses,; and so much the more justly, by how much the subject of the Metaphysiques, which is, Ens quatenus Ens , Being as it is being ; is infinitely inferiour to the Ens Entium; The being of beings, the onely good, the fountaine of truth, whole feare is the beginning of wifedome. To which purpose well faith Saint Augustine, Conditur legum temporalium si vir bonus est & sapiens, illam ipsam consulit aternam, de qua nullianima judicare datum est; The Author of temporall Lawes, if he be good and wife doth. therinconsult the Law eternall to determine of which there is no power given to any soule. And as well Prince Edward, in Fortescue his discourse, Nemo potest melius aut aliud fundamentumponere, quam posuit Dominus: No man can lay abetter, or another foundation than the Lord has blazed.

The Story of the Israelites from the receiving of the Law to the death of Moses.

Of the numbring and disposing of the Host of Israel, for their marches through the Wilderness with a note of the reverence given to the worship of God in this ordering of their troupes.

Hen Moles had received the Law from God, and published it among the people, and finished the Tabernacle of the Arke and Santuary; he must red all the Tribes and Families of Israel: and having seene what numbers of Men sit to be are armes, were found in every Tribe, from 20. yeares of age upwards; he appointed unto them, by direction from the Lord, such Prinseand Leaders, as in worth and reputation were in every Tribe most eminent. The number of the whole Army was 603550. able men for the wars, befides women & chilnumber of the whole Army was only followed them out of Egypt. This great Army dren; also, besides the strangers which followed them out of Egypt. was divided by Moses into source grosse and mighty Battalions, each of which contained the strength of three whole Tribes.

The first of these containing 186400 able men, consisted of three Regiments, which may well, in respect of their numbers, be called Armies; as containing the three whole Tribes of Judah, I Jachar and Zabulon. In the Tribe of Judah were 74600 fighting men. led by Naasson: in I fachar 54400.led by Nathaniel in Zabulon 57400.led by Eliab. All these marched under the Standard of the Tribe of Judah, who held the Vaunt-guard, and was the first that moved and marched, being lodged and quartered at their general incam-10 ping on the East fide of the Army, which was held the first place, and of greatest dignity.

The fecond Battalion or Army, called in the Scriptures the Host of Reuben, had joyned unto it Simeon and Gad, in number 151450. All which marched under the Standard of Reuben. In the Tribe of Reuben were 46500. under Elizur: in Simeon 59300. under Shelumiel: in Gad 45650 under Eliafaph: These had the second place, and incamped on the South-fide of the Tabernacle.

The third Army marched under the Standard of Ephraim, to whom were joynedthe Regiments of Manasse and Benjamin; who, joyned together, made in number 108100. able men. These marched in the third place, incamping on the West quarter of the Tabernacle. Ephraim had 40500 under Elishama: Manasse 32200 under Gambiel: Ben. 10 jamin 35400. under Abidam.

The fourth and last Army, or Squadron, of the generall Army, containing 157600 able men, marched under the Standard of Dan; to whom were joyned the two Tribes of Nephtali and Alber. And these had the Rere-ward, and moved last, incamping on the North-side. Dan had 62700 under AbieZer: Asher 41500 under Pagiel: Nephtali 53400

Besides these Princes of the severall Tribes, there were ordained Captains over Thosa fands, over Hundreds, over Fifties, and over Tens; as it may appeare by that mutinican insurrection against Moses; Num. 16.v. 1. & 2. For there arose up against Moses 250. Cap. tains of the Affembly, famous in the Congregation, and men of renowne: of which numbers were Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. Which three principall Mutiners, with those 250. Cap tains that followed them, were not any of the 12. Princes of the Tribes or generall Colo nels before spoken of, as by their names, Num. 1 is made manifest. The bleffing which Ifrael gave to his children, tooke place not onely in the division the Land of promise, and other things of more consequence, long after following; but even in forting them under their severall Standards in the wildernesse it was observed For Judah had the precedency and the greatest Army, which also was wholly component ded of the Sonnes of Leah, 7 acobs wife. Reuben having lost his birth-right, followed in the second place, accompanied with his brother Simeon, who had under-gone his Fathers curse; and with Gad, the sonne of his Mothers Hand-maid. Foseph, who in temporall blef fings had the prerogative of the first borne a double portion, was accounted as two Tribes, and divided into two Regiments: the younger (according to Jacobs prophecy) king place before the elder. He was affifted by Benjamin, his best beloved brother, theo ther fon of Rachel. To Dan, the eldest son of Jacobs Concubines, was given the leadings the fourth Army, according to Jacobs prophecy. He had with him under his Standard none of the Children of Leah, or Rachel, but onely the fonnes of the Hand-maides.

In the middle of these foure Armies, was the Tabernacle, or portable Temple of the Congregation carried, fur-rounded by the Levites. Neere unto which, as the Heathers and Pagans could not approach, by reason of these foure powerfull Armies which grave ded the same : so was it death for any of the children of Ifrael to come neere it, who were not of the Levites, to whom the charge was comitted. So facred was the moveable Tenple of God, and with fuch reverence guarded and transported, as 22000. persons wert dedicated to the service and attendance thereof: of which 8580. had the peculiar charges according to their severall offices and functions; the particulars whereof are written the third and fourth of Numbers. And as the Armies of the people observed the forms order in their incampings: so did the Levites quarter themselves, as in an inner square on every fide of the Tabernacle; the Geshurites on the West, within the Arms, and Standard of Ephrains, over whom Eliasaph commanded, in number 75

The Family of Cobath on the South-fide guided by Elizaphan, within the Army of Reuben, and betweene him and the Tabernacle, in number 8600. The third company were of the Family of Merari, over whom Zuriel commanded, in number 6200, and these were lodged on the North fide, within the Army of Dan; on the East-side, and next within those Tribes and Forces which Juda led, did Moses and Aaron lodge, and their children who were the first and immediate Commanders, both of the Ceremonies & of the people; under whom, as the chiefe of all the other Leviticall Families, was EleaZar the fon of Agron, his fuccessour in the high Priest-hood.

This was the order of the Army of Ifrael, and of their incamping and marchingsthe Tabernacle of God being alway fet in the middle & center therof. The reverend care which 10 Moles the Prophet, and chosen servant of God, had in all that belonged even to the outward and least parts of the Tabernacle, Arke and Sanetuary, witnessed well the inward and most humble zeake born towards God himselfe. The industry used in the framing therof, and every, and the least part thereof; the curious workmanship thereon bestowed; the exceeding charge and expence in the provisions; the dutifull observance in the laying up, and oreferving the holy Vessels; the solemne removing thereof; the vigilant attendance thereon, & the provident defence of the same, which all Ages have in some degree initated, is now fo forgotten and cast away in this super-fine Age, by those of the Family, by the Anabaptift, Brownift, and other Sectaries, as all coft & care bestowed and had of the Church, wherein God is to be served and worshipped, is accounted a kinde of Popery, and as proceeding from an idolarrous disposition: informuch as time would foon bring to passe (if it were not refifted) that God would be turned out of Churches into Barnes, & from thence again into the Fields and Mountains, and under the hedges, and the Offices of the Minifen(robbed of all dignity and respect) be as contemptible as those places; all Order, Discipline, and Church-government, left to newneffe of opinion, and mens fancies: yea, and foon after, as many kinds of Religions would fpring up, as there are Parish-Churches wirhin England:every contentious and ignorant person clothing his fancy with the Spirit of God, and his imagination with the gift of Revelation; infomuch, as when the Truth, which is but one, shall appeare to the simple multitude, no lesse variable than contrary to it self, the Faith of Men will soone after dye away by degrees, and all Religion be held in scorn and contempt. Which distraction gave a great Prince of Germany cause of this answer to those that perswaded him to become a Lutheran, Si me adjungo vobis, tune condemnor ab aliis : & mealis adjungo à vobis condemnor ; quid fugiam video, sed quid sequar, non habeo : If I adtown my selfe to you, I am condemned by others; If I joyn with others, I am condemned by you. what I should avoide I fee, but I know not what I should follow.

§. II. The offerings of the twelve Princes: the Passeover of the second yeere: The departing of Jethro.

Ow when Moses had taken order for all things necessary, provided for the fervice of God, written the lawes, numbred his Army, & divided them into the battells and troups before remembred, & appointed them Leaders of all forts; The twelve Princes or Commanders of the Tribes brought their offerings before the Lord, to Num. wit, fixecovered Chariots, and twelve Oxen to draw them, therein to transport, as they marched, the parts of the Tabernacle, with all that belonged thereunto, the Sanduary excepted, which for reverence was carried upon the shoulders of the sons of Korah, to whom the charge was committed; and the Charlots, in which was conveyed the other parts of the Tabernacles and Vessels thereto belonging, were delivered to the Levites for that fervice, namely to the Sonnes of Gershan and Merari.

Befides these Chariots, each of these Commanders, Princes, or Heads of Tribes, offered unto God, and for his service in the Temple, a Charger of fine filver, weighing The Hebrew 30 heckles; a filver Bowle of 70 fleckles, after the sheckle of the Santhury; and an In- Gerab weighcense-Cup of gold, of ten sheekles, which they performed at the same time when the Altar was dedicated unto God by Aaron: and before they marched from Sinai towards Gerab effiver rhe Egyptian flavery, his feeding them, and conducting them through that great and terrible Wildernesse (for so Moses calleth it) with the victory which he gave them against the

Ceremoniall, the weight of all the twelve filver Chargers, and twelve filver Bowles, amounted unto 2400. sheckles of silver; and the weight of gold in the Incense-Cups, to 120. sheckles of gold; which makes of sheckles of filver 1200. every sheckle of gold valuing ten of filver, so that the whole of gold and filver which they offered at this time, was about foure hundreth and twenty pound sterling. This done, Moses, as in all the rest, by the Spirit of God conducted, gave order for the celebrating of the Passeover, which they performed on the fourteenth day of the fecond moneth of the fecond yeare: and on the twentieth day of the same, the cloude was lifted up from above the Tabernacle, as a figne of going forward; Moses beginning his march with this invocation to God: Rise 10 up Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered; and let them that have thee flie before thee. Then all the people of Ifrael removed from their incamping at the foot of the Mountaine Sinai, towards Paran, the Armie, or great squadron of Inda, led by Naashon, taking the Vaunguard, followed by Nathaneel and Eliab, Leaders of the Tribes of Islachar and Zabulon. after whom the rest marched, as in the figure exprest. And because the passage through fo many defarts and mountaines, was exceeding difficult: Moses leaving nothing unforethought which might serve for the advancement of his enterprise, he instantly intreated his Father in Law, whom in the tenth of Numbers he calleth Hobab, to accompany them in their journey towards Canaan; promising him such part and profit of the enterprise, as God should bestow on them: for this man, as he was of great understanding & judge-26 ment (as appeared by the Counsell he gave to Moses for the appointing of Judges over the people) fo was he a perfect guide in all those parts, himselfe inhabiting on the from tier thereof, at Midian, or Madian: and (as it seemeth) a man of great yeares and expenence; for he was then the Priest or Prince of Madian, when Moses sted first out of Egypt, and married his Daughter, which was 42. yeares before this request made. And though Moses himselfe had lived 40. yeares in these parts of Arabia, through which he was now to travell: yet the better to affure his paffage, and fo great a multitude of foules; which could not be so sew as a Million, it was necessary to use many guides, and many conductors. To this request of Moses, it may seem by the places, Exed. 18.27 and Num. 10.30. that Jethro, otherwise called Hobab, yeelded not: for it is evident, that he went back from 30 Moses into his owne Countrey. But because it appeareth by other places of Scripture, And Regio. that the posterity of this Hobab was mingled with the Ifraelites, it is most likely that this his returne to his owne Countrey, was rather to fetch away his Family, and to take his leave of his owne Countrey, by fetting things in order, than to abide there.

> The voyage from Horeb to Kades: the mutinies by the way: and the cause of their turning backe to the Red Sea.

Frer this difmission of Hobab, I frael began to march towards the Defarts of Paran. and after three daies wandring, they fate down at the Sepulcbres of luft, afterward called Tabeers, or Incensio: by reason that God consumed with fire those Mutiners and Murmurers which rose up in this remove, which happened about the 23 day of the same Moneth. And from this 23. day of the second Moneth, of the second yeare, they rested and sed themselves with Quailes (which it pleased God by a Sea-winde to castupon them) to the 24. day of the third moneth; to wit, all the moneth of sinan or June: whereof surfeiting there dyed great numbers: from whence in the following month, called Thamus, answering to our July, they went on to Hazeroth, where Miriam the fifter of Moses was stricken with the leprosie, which continued upon her seven dayes, after Num.11.& 13. whole recovery Israel removed toward the border of Idumaa, and incamped at Rithma, 50 neere Kades Barnea, from whence Moses sent the twelve discoverers into the Territory of Canaan, both to informe themselves of the fertility and strength of the Country; as also to take knowledge of the Wayes, Passages, Rivers, Fords, and Mountaines. For Arad king of the Canaanites furprized divers companies of the Ifraelites, by lying in ambush neere those wayes, through which the discoverers and searchers of the Land had formerly past. Now, after the returne of the discoverers of Kades, the wrath of God was turned against Israel; whose ingratitude and rebellion after his so many benefits, so many remissions, so many miracles wrought, was such, as they esteemed their deliverance from powerfull Amalekites, to be no other than the effects of his harred, thinking that he led rhem on and preserved them, but to bring them, their wives, and children to be slaughtered, and given for a prey and spoyle to the Amorites or Canaanites. For it was reported unto them, by the learchers of the Land, that the Cities of their enemies were walled and defended with many strong Towers and Castles; that many of the people were Grantlike of for they confest that they saw the sonnes of Anat there) who were men of fearefull stature, and so farre over-topped the Ifraelites, as they appeared to them, and to them felves, but as Grashoppers in their respect. Now, as this mutiny exceeded all the rest wherein they both accused God, and consulted to choose them a Captaine (or as they callitnow adayes, an Eletto) to carry them backe againe into Egypt; fo did God punish the same in a greater measure, than any of the former. For he extinguished every soule of the whole multitude (Josua and Caleb excepted) who being confident in Gods promiles, perswaded the people to enter Canaan, being then neere it; and at the mountaine footeof Idumes, which is but narrow; laying before them the fertility thereof, and affuring them of victory. But as men, whom the passion of feare had bereaved both of rea- Num 1416 1 fonandrommon fense, they threatned to stone these encouragers to death; accounting themas men either desperate in themselves, or betrayers of the lives, goods, and children to of all their brethren, to their enemies; but God refifted these wicked purposes, and interpoling the feare of his bright glory betweene the unadvised fury of the multitude, and the innocency and constancy of his servants, preserved them thereby from their violence; threatning an intire destruction, of the whole Nation, by sending among them a consti- Num.14223 ming and mercilesse pestilence. For this was the tenth insurrection and rebellion, which they had made, fince God delivered them from the flavery of the Egyptians. But Mofes Numaza (the mildest or meekest of all men) prayed unto God to remember his infinite mercies: alledging, that this fo fevere a judgement, how defervedly foever inflicted, would increase the pride of the Heathen Nations, and give them occasion to vaunt, that the God of Ifiael, failing in power to performe his promiles, fuffered them to perish in these barrenandfruitlesse Desarts. Yet as God is no lesse just than mercifull, as God is slow to anger, fois his wrath a confuming fire; the same being once kindled by the violent breath of mans ingratitude: and therefore, as with a hand leffe heavie than hoped for, he scourged this iniquity; fo by the measure of his glory (evermore jealous of neglect and derision)he suffered not the wicked to passe unpunished; reserving his compassion for the innocent: whom, because they participated not with the offences of their Fathers, he was pleased to preserve, and in them to performe his promises, which have never beene fru> of their unwillingnesse to returne: with the punishment thereof, and of divers accidents in the returne.

Tow when Moses had revealed the purposes of God to the people, and made them know his heavie displeasure towards them, they began to bewaile themselves though overlate: the times of grace and mens repentance, having also their appointment. And then when God had left them to themselves, and was no more among them, after they had to often plaid and dallied with his mercifull fufferings, they would needs amend their former disobedience by a second contempt, and make offer to enterthe Land contrary against to the advice of Moses; who assured them, that God was not among them; and that the Arke of his covenant should not move, but by his diretion, who could not erre; and that the enemies fword, which God had hitherto bended and rebated, was now left no leffe sharpe than death; and in the hands of the Amale. kites and Canaanites, no leffe cruell: But as men from whom God hath with-drawne his grace, doe alwayes follow those counsels which carry them to their owne destructions: To the Hebrewes, after they had for faken the opportunity by God and their Conductors offered: and might then have entered Judes before their enemies were prepared and joyhed; did afterward, contrary to Gods commandement, undertake the enterprise of themfelves, and ranne head-long and without advice into the mountaines of Idumaa. the Canaanites and the Amalekites being joyned, and attending their advantage, feton them, brake them, and of their numbers flaughtered the greatest part and following their victory and pursuit, confumed them all the way of their flight, even unto Hormah: the A. malekites in revenge of their former loffe, and overthrow at Raphidim the Canaanites to prevent their displantation and destruction threatned. Of which powerfull assembly of those two Nations (assisted in all likelihood with the neighbour Kings, joyned together for their common safety) it pleased God to forewarne Moses, and to direct him another way, than that formerly intended. For he commanded him to returne by those paineful pailages of the Delarts, through which they had formerly travelled, till they found the bankes of the red Sea againe: in which retrait before they came backe to paffe over for to dan, there were confumed 38. yeares; and the whole number of the 600 and odde thoufand, which came out of Egypt (Moses, Josua, and Caleb excepted) were dead in the Wildernesse, the stubborne and carelesse generations were wholly worne out, and the promifed Land bestowed on their children; which were increased to 600000 and more. For besides the double fault, both of refusing to enter the Land upon the returne of their difcoverers, and the prefumption then to attempt it, when they were countermanded: it fee. meththat they had committed that horrible Idolatry of worshipping Moloch, and the Host of Heaven. For although Moses doth not mention it, yet Amos doth, and so doththe Martyr Stephen; as also that the Israelites worshipped the Sun and Moon in after-times, it is proved out of fundry other places.

Now after the broken Companies were returned to the Campe at Cades, Moses according to the commandement received from God, departed towards the South from whence he came, to recover the shoares of the Red Sea. And so from Cades or Ritima he removed to Remmonparez, so called of aboundance of Pomegranates there found, and divided among them. From whence he went on to Libnah, taking that name of the Frakincense there found. From Librah he crost the Valley, and fate downe at Ressa, near the foot of the mountaine. And after he had rested there, he bended towards the Well, and incamped at Ceelate; where one of the Hebrewes, for gathering broken wood on the Sabbath, was stoned to death. After which, Moses, alwayes keeping the Valley between two great ledges of mountaines, (those which bound the Defart of Sin, and those of Pharan) crost the same from Ceelata, and marched Eastward to the mountaine of Sapha, or Sepher: this making the twentieth manfion. From thence he passed on to Harada, then to Maceloth; and then to Thahah, and fo to Thara or Thare; the foure and twentien mansion. Where Moses rested, the people began that insolent and dangerous mutiny of Korah, Dathan, & Abiram; who for their contempt of God & his ministers, were some of them swallowed up alive, and by the Earth, opening her mouth, devoured; others, em two hundred and fifty which offered incense with Korah, were consumed with firefrom Heaven; and 14700. of their party, which murmured against Moses, stricken dead with sudden pestilence: one of the greatest marvailes and judgments of God, that hath been shewed in all the time of Moles his government, or before. For among so great a multiple tude, those lay-men who would have usurped Ecclesiasticall authority, were suddenly fivallowed up alive into the Earth with their families and goods; even while they fought to overthrow the Order, Discipline, and Power of the Church, and to make all men alike zherein, rebelliously contending against the High Priest and Magistrate, to whom God had committed the government both of his Church, and Common-weal of his people And the better to affure the people, and out of his great mercy to confirme them, it peat feth him in this place also to approve by miracle the former election of his servant Maron, by the twelve rods given in by the Heads of thetwelve Tribes; of which Mofeste ceived one of every Head, and Prince of his Tribe: which being all withered and dried Wands, and on every rod the name of the Prince of the Tribe written, and Aarons on 9 that of Levi, it pleased God, that the rod of Aaron received by his power a vegetable spirit, and having laine in the Tabernacle of the Congregation, before the Arke one night, had on it both Buds, Blossomes, and ripe Almonds.

From Tharah the whole Army removed to Methra; and thence to Efmona; and thence to Moseroth, (or Masurit, after Saint Hierome) and from Moseroth to Benefacan; and ford Gadzad, which Hierome calleth Gadgada; thence to Jetabata, the thirtieth Manfion; where from certaine fountaines of water gathered in one, Adrichomius maketh a River, which falleth into the Red Sea, betweene Madian and Asiongaber.

Now although it be very probable, that at A fiong aber, where Salomon furnished his Fleetes for the East India, there was store of fresh water; and though Herodoins maketh Heridage mention of a great River in Arabia the Stonie, which he calleth Corys, from whence (faith he) the inhabitants conveigh water in pipes of leather to other places, by which device the King of Arabia releeved the Army of Cambyfes: yet is Adrichomius greatly deceived. as many times he is, in finding these Springs at Gadgad, or Jetabata, being the nine and twentieth or thirtieth Mansion. For it was at Punon, that those Springs are spoken of which in Deuteronomy the tenth, and the feventh Verse, is also called Jetabata, or Jot bath, a Land of running waters, and which by all probability fall into the River Za-Fored, the next adjoyning. And that these Springs should fall into the Red Sea ar Assongaber, or Eloth, I cannot believe, for the way thither is very long. And this I finde in Belonius, that there are divers Torrents of fresh water in those fandy parts of Arabia: which though they continue their course for a few miles, yet they are drunke up by the hor and thirsty fand, before they can recover the bankes of the Red

From Jetabata, Moses directed his journey towards the Red Sea, and incamped at Hebrong, and from thence to Estongaber: which City in Josephus time had the name of Berenice and in Hieromes, Essia. From thence, keeping the Sea, and Eloth on his right hand, he turned towards the North, as hee was by God commanded: Estonga-Deuter o ber being the farthest place towards the South-East, that Moses travailed in that pas-

It feemeth that Estiongaber or Astongaber, Eloth and Madian, were not at this time in Numceo, v.t.3. the possession of the Kings of Edom. For it is said, That the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron in the Mount Hor, neere the Coast of the Land of Edom; so as the Mount Hor wasatthis time in the South border of Idumaa. And if Esiongaber, and the other places neere the Red Sea, had at this present bin subject unto the Idumaans. Moses would also have demanded a free passage through them. It is true, that in the future the Idumeans obtained those places : for it is said; And they arose out of Midian, and came i Kings 11.18. to Paran, and tooke men with them; which were those companies that followed young Adad of Idumaa, into Egypt, when he fled from Joab. Likewife it is faid of Salomon, that hemadea Navie of shippes in Estongaber besides Eloth, in the Land of Edom.

Of Moses arrivall at Zin Kades: and of the accidents while that they abode there.

Rom Efiongaber he turned against owards the North, and pirched in the Wilderneffe of Zin, which is Kadesh: or in Beroth, of the children of Jacan; where they fate downe in the first Moneth of the fortieth yeare, after they left Egypt. For at the next Mansion Aaron died in the first day of the fifth Moneth of the fortietle yeare: the nine and thirtieth yeare taking end at Estongaber. And at this City of Cades (for fo it was thought to be) or neere it, died Miriam, or Mary, Moses fifter, whose Se-Num.2012 pulcher was to be feene in Saint Hieromes time, as himfelfe avoweth. From hence ere Num 20.3% they departed to the Mountaine Hor, all the people murmured most violently against Moses, by reason of the scarcity of water. For neither the punishments by fire from Heaven; by being devoured and fwallowed up by the earth; by the fudden pestilence, which often seized them; nor any miracle formerly shewing, either the love or wrath of God, could prevaile with this Nation any longer, than while they were full fed and fatiffied in every of their appetites: but in stead of seeking for helpe and reliefe at Gods hands, when they fuffered hunger, thirst, or any other want, they murmured, repined, and rebelled, repenting them of their changed estates, and casting ungratefully on Moses all their miladventures; yea, though they well knew that their own Fathers had left their bodies in the Defarts, and that they were now entred into the fortieth yeare, wherein all their miseries were to take end. And being, as it were, in the fight of the Land Promifed, they againe as obstinately tempted God as in former times, and neither trusted his promises, nor feared his indignation. But as the will and purposes of God are without beginning; so his mercies being without end, he commanded Moses to strike a Rocke adjoyning with his rod; and the waters issued out in a great abundance, with which both themselves and their cattell were satisfied. Neverthelesse, because God perceived a kinde of diffidence both in Moses and Aaron, at this place; therefore he permitted neither of them to enter the Land promised, whereto perchance their worldly desires might invite them. But it pleased him to end the travailes of Aaron at the Mountaine Hor, being the next, and foure and thirtieth Station. At which Mountaine of Hor, Aaron was despoyled of the garments of his Priest-hood, and the same put on Eleagar, his sonne, as God had commanded. Which done, Moses and EleAZAR descent ded the Mountaine; but GOD received Aaron on the top thereof, and he was no more in

Of this Mountaine called Hor, otherwise Mosera, as in Deuteronomy 10. Verse 6. those Horites tooke name which the Idumeans had formerly vanquished. Some there are which make Mosera, which was the seven and twentieth Mansion, and Mosera which they write Moseroth for difference, which was the foure and thirtieth Mansion, and is also cl. led Hor, to be two distinct places : because Moses in passing from Cadesbarne towards E. fiongaber, incamped at Mosera, after he departed from Hesmona, and before he came to Benjaacan. And this Mosera, which is also called Hor, he came unto after he left cades, where Miriam, Moses fister, dyed; the first being the seven and twentieth, and the se cond being the foure and thirtieth Mansion. But for Hor, which is also called Mostra, it should have bin written, Hor juxta Mosera; Hor neere Mosera: for it is but one roote of a Mountaine, divided into divers tops, as Sinai and Horeb are: Whereof the West part Mofes calleth Mofera, and the East part Horeb. By the West part Moses encamped, six past towards the Red Sea, on his left hand; by the East part, as he went backe again North-wards towards Moab: as in the description of Moses his passage through Arthu

Now it was from Cades, before they came to Hor, because Hor belonged to Edomini the Reader may perceive. Moses sent messengers to the Prince of Idumes, praying him that he might passe within people of Ifrael through his Territory into the Land of Canaan, which bordered it. In it was the neerest way of all other from the City of Kadesh, where Moses then encampage whereas otherwise, taking his journey by the Rivers of Zared, Arnon, and Jordan, might have runne into many hazzards in the passage of those Rivers, the far way about and the many powerfull Kings, which commanded in those Regions. Now the bear to perswade the Prince of Idumaa hereunto, Moses remembred him, that he was of famerace and family with Ifrael: calling him by the name of brother, because both Edomites and Ifraelites were the formes of one father, to wit, Ifaac; inferring therebying he had more reason to savour and respect them, than he had to assist the Canaanite; & gainst whom Efan his Ancester had made warre, and driven out the Horites (who wered their ancient races descended of Cham) out of the Region of Seir, calling it by his out name Edom, or Edumas. He also making a short repetition of Gods bleffings bestowd on them, and of his purposes and promises; affured Edom, or the King thereof, that h would no way offend his people, or waste his Country, but that he would restraine in Army within the bounds of the Common, and Kings high wayes, paying money in whatsoever he used, yea, even for the water, which themselves or their Cattellshould drinke. For Moles was commanded by God, notto provoke the children of Elas, But the King of Edumea knowing the strength of his owne Country, the same being nere Canaan, rampir'd with high and sharpe mountaines: and withall suspecting, as a natural wife man, that 600000. ftrangers being once entred his Countrey, it would restintly wills to give him law, resolvedly refused them passage, and delivered this answer to the Messengers: That, if they attempted to enter that way, he would take them for enemies, and resist them by all possible meanes. And not knowing whether such a denial might fatisfie or exasperate, he gathered the strength of his Countrey rogether, and shewed himselfe prepared to defend their passage. For, as it is written; Then Edom came out a gainst him(to wit, Moses) with much people, and with a mighty power. Whereupon Mose confidering, that the end of his enterprise was not the conquest of Seir or Edward that the Land promifed was that of Canaan: like unto mimicate who was that the World had who in the twelfth Chapter and four eteenth Verse, nameth this Arad by the name of his

he refused to adventure the Army of Ifrael against a Nation, which being overcome gave but a passage to invade others; and which, by reason of the seate of their mountain nous Countrey, could not but have endangered, or (at least) greatly enfeebled the Grength of Ifrael, and rendred them leffe able, if not altogether powerleffe, to have conquered the rest.

9. VI. of their compassing Idumas; and travelling to Arnon, the border of Moab.

Etherefore leaving the way of Idamea, turned himfelfe towards the East: and marched towards the Defarts of Moab. Which when Arad King of the Canaamarched towards the Detaits of and blanched the way of Idumaa; and knowing that it was Canaan, and not Edom, which If act aimed at he thought it fafest, rather to finde his enemies in his neighbours Countrey, than to be found by them in his own: which he might have done with a farre greater hope of victory, had Moles bin enforc't first to have made his way by the Sword through Idumes, and thereby, though victorious, greatly have lessened his numbers. But although it fell out otherwise than Arad hoped for, yet being refolved to make trial, what courage the Ifraelites brought with them out of Egypt. hefore they came neerer his owne home; leading the strength of his Nation to the edge of the Defart, he fet upon some part of the Army; which, for the multitude occupied a great space, and for the many heards of Cattell that they drave with them, could not enrampe so neere together, but that some quarter or other was evermore subject to surorife. By which advantage, and in that his attempts were then perchance unexpected, he lew some few of the Israelites, and carried with him many prisoners.

Now it is very probable, that it was this Canaanite, or his Predecessous, which joved his forces with the Amalekites, and gave an overthrow to those mutinous Israelites. Numadas. which without direction from God by Moles, would have entred Canaan from Cadel arne. For it feemeth that the greatest number of that Army were of the Canaanites, beause in the first of Deuteronomy, 44. the Amorites are named alone without the Amale, ites, and are faid to have beaten the Israelites at that time. And this Arad, if he were the ame that had a victory over Ifrael, neere Cadesbarne; or if it were his Predecessour hat then prevailed; this man finding that Mofes was returned from the Red Sea, and in his way towards Canaan, and that the South part of Canaan was first to be invaded, and in langer of being conquered, not knowing of Moses purpose to compasse Moses, determined while he was yet in the Desart, to trie the quarrell. And whereas it followeth in the hird verse of the twelfth Chapter of Numbers, that the Israelites utterly destroyed the anaanites and their Cities, they are much mistaken that thinke, that this destruction was presently performed by the Israelises. But it is to be understood, to have beene done in he future, to wir, in the time of Josea. For had Moses at this time entred Canaan in the pursuit of Arad, he would not have fallen backe againe into the Defarts of Zin and Moak, nd have fetcht a weartsome and needlesse compasse, by the Rivers of Zared and Neither is their conjecture to be valued at any thing, which affirme, that Arad did not phabite any part of Canaan it selfe, but that his Territory lay without it, and neare the Mountaine Hor. For Hor and Zin Cades were the South borders of Edom, and not of Ca-Num 33.40 naan. And it was in the South of the Land of Canaan, that Arad dwelt: which South part of Canaan was the North part of Edom.

Againe, Horma (for so farre the Ifraelites after their victory pursued the Canaanites) is cated in the South of Judaa. There is also a City of that name in Simeon. But there is no Such place to the South of Edom. And were there no other argument, but the mutiny which followed prefently after the repetition of this victory, it were enough to prove, that the fame was obtained in the future, and in Josus his time, and not at the instant of Arads affault. For had the Ifraelites at this time fackt the Cities of Arad, they would not the next day have complained for want of water and bread. For where there are great Cities, there is also water and bread. But it was in the time of Josua, that the Isaconfidering, that the end of his enterprite was not the conquest of our of formans in the time of Jojua, that the Land promised was that of Canaan: like unro himselfe who was of natural in the Land promised was that of Canaan: like unro himselfe who was of natural in the Land promised was that of Canaan: like unro himselfe who was of natural in the Land promised was that of Canaan: like unro himselfe who was of natural in the Land promised was that of Canaan: like unro himselfe who was of natural in the Land promised was that of Canaan: like unro himselfe who was of natural in the Land promised was that of Canaan: like unro himselfe who was of natural in the Land promised was that of Canaan: like unro himselfe who was of natural in the Land promised was that of Canaan: like unro himselfe who was of natural in the Land promised was that of Canaan: like unro himselfe who was of natural in the Land promised was that of Canaan: like unro himselfe who was of natural in the Land promised was that of Canaan: like unro himselfe who was of natural in the Land promised was that of Canaan: like unro himselfe who was of natural in the Land promised was that of Canaan: like unro himselfe was the like unro himselfe who was of natural in the Land promised was that of Canaan: like unro himselfe was the like unrounded was the l Citie fo called; and with him the King of Horma: to which place the Ifraelites purfued the Canaanites-And he nameth them amongst those Kings, which he vanquished, and put ro death.

Now after this affault and furprize by Arad, Moses finding that all entrance on that fide was defended, he led the people Eastward to compasse Idumaa and the Dead Sea, and to make his entrance by Arnon and the Plaines of Moab, at that time in the possession of the Amorites. But the Ifraelites, to whom the very name of a Defart was terrible, began a. gaine to rebell against their Leader; till God by a multitude of fiery Serpents, (that is, by the byting of Serpents, whose venom inflamed them, and burnt them as fire) made them know their error, and afterward, according to his plentifull grace, cured them againe by h their beholding an artificiall Serpent, by his Commandement fet up.

From the Mount Hor, Moles leaving the ordinary way which lyeth between the Red Sea, and Calofiria, encamped at Zalmona; and thence he removed to Phunon, where he erected the Brazen Serpent; making these journyes by the edge of Idumea, but without it. For Phunon was sometime a principall City of the Edomites. Now where it is witten in Numbers 21. Verse 4. That from Mount Hor they departed by the way of the Red Sea, which grieved the people, it was not thereby meant that the Ifraelites turned back towards the Red Sea; neither did they march (according to Fonfeca) per viam qua habet à latre mare rubrum; By the way that sided the Red Sea, but indeed they crost, and went athwar the common way from Galaad, Traconitis, and the Countries of Moab, to the Red Su, that is, to Effongaber, Eloth, and Midian: which way, as it lay North and South, folial to thun the border of Edom, and to take the utmost East part of Moab, crost the common way towards the East, and then they turned againe towards the North, as before.

From Phunon he went to Oboth; where they entred the Territory of Moab, adjoyning to the Land of Suph, a Country bordering on the Dead Sea; and from thence to Abarin, the eight and thirtieth Mansion, that is, where the Mountaines so called take beginning and are as yet but small Mountures of Hills, on the East border of Moab; from theme they recovered Dibon Gad, or the River of Zared, which rifethin the mountaines of Ant bia, and runneth towards the Dead Sea, not farre from Petra the Metropolis thereof, being the nine and thirtieth Station. And having past that River, they lodged at DibonGal & from thence they kept the way to Diblathaim, one of the Cities of Moab; which Him. mie the Prophet Chap. 48. Verse 22. calleth the House of Diblathaim, the same which & terward was destroyed among the rest by Nabuchadnezzar. From thence they camen the River of Arnon, and encamped in the mountaines of Abarim: though in the 22. of Numbers, Moses doth not remember Helmondiblathaim, but speaketh of his remove from the River of Zared, immediately to the other fide of Arnon; calling Arnon the border of Mosh, betweene them and the Amorites: speaking, as he found the state of the Country at that time. For Arnon was not anciently the border of Moab, but was lately conque red from the Moabites, by Schon, King of the Amorites: even from the Predecessour of Balac Peor then reigning. From Diblathaim, Mofes fent meffengers to Schon, King of the Amorites, todefire a paffage through his Countrey which though he knew would be denied him, yet he defired to give a reason to the neighbour Nations, of the warrelt undertooke. And though Edom had refused him as Sehon did, yet he had no warrant from God to enforce him. Moses also in sending messengers to Sehon, observed the same precept, which he left to his posterity and successours, for a law of the warre; namely in Deut. 20. Verfe 10. in these words; When thou comest neere unto a Citie to fight against, shou shalt offer it peace, which if it doe accept of and open unto thee, then let all the people found therein be tributaries unto thee, and servethee; but if it refuse, &c. thou shali smitt all the neales thereof with the edge of the fword. Which ordinance all commanders of Armies have observed to this day, or ought to have done.

TOw concerning the Warre betweene Ifrael and Sehon, Mofes feemeth to referre great part of this Story to that Booke intituled, Liber bellerum Domini , The bookt of Gods bassailes: and therefore paffeth over many encounters, and other things memorable, with greater brevity in this place. His words after the Geneva Translation are these: Wherefore it shall be spoken in the booke of the battailes of the Lord, what things be did in the Red Sea, & in the Rivers of Arnon. The Vulgar copie differeth not in sense from this: But the Greeke Septuagint vary. For the Greeke writes it to this effect . For thus it is faid in the Booke: The warre of the Lord hath burns (or inflamed) Zoob, and the brookes of Arnon. Junius for the Red Sea, which is in the Genevian & Vulgar Edition, names the Region Num. 21.

of * Suph; a Countrey bordering the Dead Sea towards the East, as he conjecture the trey of Suph; trey of Suph; Text he readeth thus. Ideireo dici solet in recensione bellorum Jehovæ, contra Vahebum in see more chapa Regione Suph: & contrassumina, sumina Arnonis . Therefore is it spoken in repeating of the 10.5.4.1.2. battailes of Jehovah, against Vaheb, in the Countrey of Suph and against the Rivers, the & of the word Rivers of Arnon. In which words he understands, that amongst the wars which the Lord subjection and disposed for the good of the Israelites, there was in those times a famous memory in the 18.5.3. mouth of most men, concerning the warre of Sehon against Vaheb, the King of the Moa- Num 21,261 hites, and of his winning the Country neere Arnon, out of the possession of the Moahites. For this Vabeb was the immediate predeceffour of Balac, who lived with Moles: though it be written that this Balac was the fon of Zippor, and not of Vabeb. For it feernes I Chronesis. (as it is plaine in the fuccession of the Edomites) that these Kingdomes were elective, and not fucceffive. And as Junius in this Translation understanderh no speciall Booke of the battailes of the Lord: fo others, as Vatablus in his Annotations, doubt whether in this place any speciall Booke be meant; and if any, whether it be not a prediction of warres infuture ages, to be waged in these places, and to be written in the Booke of Judges. Syra. cides c.46. tells us plainely, that those battailes of the Lord were fought by 70 ua . Who muthere (faith he) before him like to him? for he fought the bateailes of the Lord. But fecing the Hiltories of the Scripture elsewhere often passe over matters of great weight in few words, referring the Reader to other Bookes, written of the fame matter at large: thereforeit feemeth probable, that fuch a Booke as this there was; wherein the feverall victories by Ifrael obtained, and also victories of other Kings, making way for the good of the Ifraelites, were particularly and largely written. And that the fame should now be wanting, it is not strange, seeing so many other Volumes, filled with divine discourse, have perished in the long race of time, or have bin destroyed by the ignorant and malicious Heathen Magistrate. For the Bookes of Henoch, howsoever they have bin in later ages corrupted, and therefore now suspected, are remembred in an Epistle of Thaddaus, and cited by Origen wel dexw, and by Tertullian.

That worke also of the Patriarch Abraham, of Formation, which others bestow on Rabbi Achiba, is no where found. The Bookes remembred by Fofnac. 10. v. 13: and in the second of Samuel, c. 1. v. 18 called the Booke of Jasher, or Fustorum, is also lost; wherein the stay of the Sunne and Moone in the middest of the Heavens is recorded, and how they stood still till Israel had avenged themselves of their enemies: out of which also David tooke the precept, of teaching the children of Juda, to exercise their bowes against their enemies.

Somethinke this to be the Booke of eternall Predestination, in which the just are written, according unto the fixty and ninth Pfalme, Verfe 28. where it is faid; Let them be put out of the Booke of Life, neither let them be written with the righteons. Hierome Hieronin queft. thinkes, that David by this Booke understood those of Samuel; Rabbi Salomon, that super-libe regumthe Bookes of the Law are thereby meant, in which the acts of the just Abraham, of Isac, Jacob, and Moses, are written; Others, that it was the Booke of Exodus; others, as Theodoretus, that it was a Commentary upon Fosua, by an unknowne Au-

The booke of Chozai, concerning Manasse, remembred in the second of Chron.33. v.18.6 19. Of this booke, also loft, Hierome conceives that the Prophet Ifay was the Hierom.in an-Authour.

The same mischance came as well to the Story of Salomon, written by Ahia Silonites, whomet with feroboam, and foretold him of his obtaining the Kingdome of Ifrael from the some of Salomon; as to the bookes of Nathan the Prophet, and to those of feedo the Seer; remembred in the second of Chron.c.g.v.29. With these have the bookes of Shemaiah and of Iddo, remembred in the second of Chron.c. 12. v. 15. perished: and that of Jehn the sonne of Hanani, of the acts of Jehosaphat, cited in the second of Chron.c.20. 2.34. Of these and other Bookes many were consumed with the same fire, wherewith No. buchadne Xar burne the Temple of Hiernfalem. But let us returne thither where we of Moses his sparing the issue of Lot; and of the Giants in those parts; and of Schon and Og.

Hen Moses had past Arnon, he incamped on the other side therof at Abarim opposite to the City of Nebo; leaving the City of Midian on the left hand, and attempting nothing upon the Moabites on that fide. For Moab dida this time inhabite on the South-fide of arnon, having lost all his ancient & best Territory, which was now in the possession of Sebon the Amorite. For Moses was commanded by God not to moleft Most, neither to provoke them to battaile, God having given that Land to the children of Los; the same which was anciently possest by the Emins, who were men of great stature, and comparable to those Giants called Anakims, or the sons of Anac God also commanded Moses to spare the Ammonites, because they likewise werede, scended of Lot: who had expelled from thence those Giants, which the Ammonites called Zam Zummims. For it feemeth that all that part, especially to the East of Jordan, evento the Defart of Arabia, as well on the West, as on the East-side of the Mountaines of Gilud was inhabited by Giants. And in the plantation of the Land promifed, the Ifraeling did not at any time passe those Mountaines to the East of Basan, but left their Country to them, as in the description following is made manifest. We find also, that as there were many Giants both before and after the floud: fo these Nations, which anciently inhabited both the border of Canaan, and the Land it selfe, had among them many Families of Giant-like men. For the Anakims dwelt in Hebron, which fometimes was called the City of Arbah, which Arbah in Josua is called the father of the Anakims; and the greatestim of the Anakims. There had also bin Giants in the Land of the Moabites, called Emini: and their chiefe City was Areer or Ar, neere the River of Arnon. To the Giants of the Replains, the Ammonites gave the name of Zam Zummins; which were of the same cient Canaanites: and their chiese City was Rabba, afterward Philadelphia. They were also called Zuzims, which is as much to fay, as Virirobusti, horrendiq; Giantes; Sinng men, and fearefull Giants, who inhabited other Cities of Ham, or Hom, in the fame Province, and not farre to the North of Areer.

Now Moses having past Arnon, and being encamped at Abarim; and having (as before) fent to Sehon, as he had done to Edom, to pray a paffage through his Country, was denied it. For Sehon being made proud by his former conquest upon Vaheb the Moabite; which Nation the Amerites esteemed but as strangers and usurpers, (themselves being of the fons of Canaan, and the Moabites of Lot) refused to grant Ifrael any entrance that way; and withall prepared to encounter Moses with as much speed as he could, because Moses encamped in the Countrey of his new conquests, to wit, the Plaines of Moab, the two& fortieth and last Mansion: which Moses wasted with the multitude of his people, and cattell. Towards him therefore hafting himselfe, they encountred each other at Jaha. where Sehon with his children and people were broken and discomfitted: and the victory fo pursued by Moses, as few or none of the Amorites escaped. He also slaughtered all these Women and Children of the Amorites, which he found in Effebon, and all the other Cities, Villages, or Fields; they being of the race of Canaan, as those of Basan also were, and descended of Emoreus or Amoreus: for Moses callerh the Basanites also Amorites. And although Israel might now have taken a ready way and passage into Judaa, being at this time, and after this victory at the bankes of Fordan: yet he knew it to be perillous to leave fo great a part of that Nation of the Amorites on his backe, as inhabited all the Region of Bajan or Traconitis: and therefore he led on his Army to invade Og: a person of exceeding frength and stature, and the onely man of marke remaining of the ancient Giants of those parts, and who at that time had 60. Cities walled and defenced: lying betweene the Mountaine of Hermon (which Mountaine, faith Moses, the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amerites Shewir) and the River of Jordan. And it befell unto the King of Balan (who artended Mofes comming at Edrei) as it did unto Sehon: for he and his fonnes perished. and all his Cities were taken and possest. After this, Moses with-drawing himselfe backe as gaine to the Mountaines of Abarim, left the profecution of that warre unto Jair the some of Manaffe: who conquering the East parts of Bafan, to wit, the Kingdome of Argob. even unto the Nations of the Geffuri and Machati, 60. walled Cities, called the fame after his own name Havoth Jair : of all which conquests afterward the halfe Tribe of Mamalle possest the North part as farre as Edrei, but the East part that belonged to Sebon the Amorite, with the Mountaines of Gilead adjoyning, was given to Reuben and unto Gad.

of the troubles about the Madiavites, and of Moses his death.

Fter these victories, and while Ifrael sojourned in the valley of Moab, the Madianites and Moabites (over both which Nations it feemeth that Balac King of the Moabites then commanded in chiefe I fought, according to the advice of Balaam, both by alluring the Hebrewes to the love of their daughters, and by perfwading them to honour and serve their Idols, to divide them both in Love and Religion among themfelves: thereby the better both to defend their own interest against them, as also to beate them out of Moab, and the Countries adjoyning. The Israelites as they had ever bin inclined, so were they now easily perswaded to these evill courses, and thereby drew onthemselves the plague of pestilence, whereof there perished 24000 persons: besides which punishment of God, the most of the offenders among the Hebrewes, were by Num 25 w. his commandement put to the Sword, or other violent deaths: after this, when that Phineas the fonne of Eleazar had pierced the bodies of Zimri, a Prince of the Simeonites, together with Coshi, a Daughter of one of the chiefe of the Midianites, the plague ceased, and Gods wrath was appealed. For such was the love and kindnesse of his all-powerfulnesse, respecting the ardent zeale of Phineas in prosecuting of Zimri (who being a chiefe among the Hebrewes, became an Idolater) as he forgave the rest of Ifrael, and stayed his hand for his fake.

In this valley it was that Moses caused the people to be numbed the third time : and there remained of able men fit to beare armes, 601730. of which as his last enterprise, Num. 16.1.51 he appointed 12000, to be chosen out, to invade the Cities of Midian, who together with the Moabites practifed with Balaam to curse Ifrael: and after that fought to allure them (as before remembred) from the worship of the true God, to the service of Beth-Peor: and to the rest of their barbarous Idolatry. Over which companies of 12 000. Num. 3 t.v. 8. Moses gave the charge to Phiness, the sonne of Eleazar the high Priest: who slew the Joseph Joseph five Princes of the Midianites, which were, or had lately bin, the vaffals of Sehon, as appeareth by Josuah. These five Princes of the Midianites slaine by Eleas ar, were at this time but the vassals of Schonthe Amonite, to wit, Evi, Rekem, Zur, Hur, and Rera, the Dukes of Schon faith Josush. He flew also the men, male-children, and women: faving Cap. 13.212 such as had not yet used the company of men, but those they saved, and dispiere't them

And Moses having now lived 120. yeares, making both his owne weakenesse of body Deut. 31. v. i. knowne to the people, and his unability to travaile: and also that he was forewarned of his end by the Spirit of God, from whom he received a new commandement to af-Deut-31.7.2 cend the Mountaines of Abarim, and thereon to render up his life: He haftned to settle the Government in Fosca: whom he perswaded with most lively arguments to prosecute the conquest begun, assuring him of Gods favour and assistance therein. Observations out of the Story of Moses, how Goddisposeth both the smallest occasions, and the greatest resistances, to the effecting of his purpose.

TOw let us a little, for instruction, looke backe to the occasions of fundry of the great events, which have bin mentioned in this Story of the life of Moses, for (ex. cepting Gods miracles, his promife, and fore-choice of this people) he wrought in all things else by the medium of mens affections, and naturall appetites. And so we shall finde that the feare which Pharaoh had of the increase of the Hebrewes, multipled by God to exceeding great numbers, was the next naturall cause of the sorrowes and losse, which befell himselfe, and the Egyptian Nation: which numbers when he sought by cruell and ungodly policies to cut off and leffen, as when he commanded all the male children of the Hebrewes to be flaine, God (whose providence cannot be resisted, nor his purposes prevented by all the foolish and salvage craft of mortall men) moved compassion in the hear of Pharao's ownedaughter, to preferve that childe, which afterward became the most wife, and of all menthe most gentle and milde, the most excellently learned in all Divine and Humane knowledge, to be the conductor and deliverer of his oppressed brethren, and the overthrow of Pharao, and all the flower of his Nation; even then, when he found by the strength of his men of Warre, of his Horse, and Chariots, to tread them under, and bury them in the dust. The griefe which Moses conceived of the injuries, and of the violence offered to one of the Hebrewes in his owne presence, moved him to take reverge of the Egyptian that offered it: the ingratitude of one of his own Nation, by threatning him to discover the saughter of the Egyptian, moved him to flie into Madian: the contra tion betweene the Shepheards of that place, and Jethro's Daughters, made him known to their Father; who not onely entertained him, but married him to one of those Sisters and in that solitary life of keeping of his Father in lawes sheepe, farre from the press of the World, contenting himselfe (though bred as a Kings Sonne) with the lot of a poor Heards-man, God found him out in that Desart, wherein he first suffered him tolve many yeares, the better to know the wayes and paffages through which he purpoled that he should conduct his people, toward the Land promised and therein appearing unto him, he made him know his will and divine pleasure for his returne into Egypt. The like may be faid of all things elfe, which Mofes afterward by Gods direction performed in the Story of Ifrael before remembred. There is not therefore the smallest accident, which may feeme unto men as falling out by chance, and of no confequence, but that the same is caused by God to effect somewhat else by : yea, and oftentimes to effect things of the greatest worldly importance, either presently, or in many yeares after, when the casions are either not considered, or forgotten.

CHAP. 6. S.I.

N like manner if we looke to the quality of the Mations, while the first like safter their comming out of Egypt, had to doe, either in the Wilderneffe, or afterward, we shall finde them long before-hand, by the disposing providence of God, as it were prepared for enmity spartly in respect that they were most of them of the issue of Ganaan, or at least of Ham; and N like manner if we looke to the quality of the Nations, with whom the Ifraelites, after their comming out of Egypt, had to doe, either in the Wil-therest (as the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, and Israelites) were mingled with them by mutuall marriages: whereas the I fraelites still continued strangers, and separate from them: and fo partly in this respect, and partly by ancient injuries or enmitties, and partly by reason of diversity in Religion, were these Nations, as it were prepared to be enemies to the Israelites : and so to serve for such purposes as God had reserved them for. To make these things more manifest, we must understand that this part of Syria, bounded by the mountaines of Libanus, and Zidon on the North, by the same mountaines continued as farreas the Springs of Arnon on the East: by the way of Egypt, and the Red Sea, on the South: and by the Mediterran Sea on the West: was inhabited and peopled by two Nations, the one springing from the sonnes of Chamathe other from Sem: but those of Sem, were but as strangers therein for a long time, and came thither in effect but with * one *It seemethallothat Hus. Family, to wit, that of Abraham, and a few of his kindred. The other for the greatest part the Some of the s were the Canaanites, the ancient Lords and possessor of those Territories, by processes Nachor, and of time divided into feverall Families and names: wherof fome of them were of eminent the ulanted flature and strength, as the Anakims, Zamzummins, or Zuzei, Emins, Horites, & others, themselves in These (as men most valiant and able commonly do) did inhabite the utter borders and the East side of forders, about mountaines of their Countries: the rest were the Zidonians, Jebusites, Amorites, Hevites, Basan: where Hetites, and others, who tooke name after the fonnes of Canaan, and after whom the they finde the Country in generall was still called.

As for the Hebrewes which descended of Shem by Abraham, they were of another Fadweltasone milie, and ftrangers in that Country, especially the Israelites: and this was some cause Husthe Some that the Canaanites did not affect them, or indure them, no more than the Philiftims did, of Nathor, and who descended also of Chamby Mizraim. For though Abraham himselfe being a stran- Elibu, his friend which is called ger, was highly efteemed and honoured among them; efpecially by the Amorites inhabiting the West part of Jordan: yet now even they which descended from Abraham, or hereaster cha. from his kindred, abode and multiplied in those parts, were alienated in affections from Exeditate the Ifraelites, as holding them strangers and intruders: making more account of their alliance with the Canaanites, and the rest of the issue of Cham, with whom they daily con-

True it is, that these Nations descended of Abraham, or of his kindred, who had lin-Deut 11.50 ked themselves, and marched with the Canaanites and others, had so farre possess themfelves of the borders of those Regions, as they began to be equall in strength to the bordering Canaanites, if not superiour. For of Lot came those two great Families of the Moabites, and Ammonites: of Efan the Idum wans: of Madian the Madianites: of Ismael the eldest sonne of Abraham, came the Ismaelites, with whom are joyned as of the same Nation, the Amalekites; whom though the more common opinion thinketh to have bin a Tribe of Edom, because Esau had a grand-childe of that name, yet manifest reason con-

The second Booke of the first part 262 Deut. 11.11.1.1. vinceth it to have bin otherwife. For the Ifraelites were forbidden to provoke the Edomites, or do them any wrong, whereas contrariwife Amalek was curfed, and endlesse Exalci7.v.16 warre decreed against him: but hereof more elsewhere, Chap. 8. §. 3. Of Ismaels eldest sonne Naboth sprung the Arabians of Petraa, called Nabathai. Now even as Abrabam besought God to blesse Ismael, so it pleased him both to promise and performe it. For of him those twelve Princes came, which inhabited, in effect, all that Tract of Land Gcn.17. betweene Havilab upon Tigris, and Sar which is the West part of the Defart of Arabia Petras. Yet howfoever the strength of these latter named Nations, which descended from Abraham, were great; it is not unlikely, but that fome reason which moved them not to favour the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan, was in respect of seare: because in all Princes and States doe not willingly permit any stranger or powerfull Nation to enter their Territories. Wherefore, though all these Families before named, were not fo united in and among themselves, but that they had their jealousies of each other, and contended for dominion: yet fearing a third more strong than themselves, whether they stood apart or united, they were taught by the care of their own preservation, to jovne themselves together against Israel: though they did it nothing so maliciously and refol. vedly as the Canaanites did. For the Edumæans onely denied the Hebrewes a passage, which the Moabites durst not denie : because their Country lay more open ; and because themselves had lately bin beaten out of the richest part of their Dominions, by the Amorites: and as for the Ammonites, their Countrey lay altogether out of the way, & the strength of Sehon and Og Kings of the Amorites, was interjacent: and besides that, the border of the Ammonites was strong, by reason of the mountains which divided it from Numeral National Pagan. Againe, that which moved the Moabites in their own reason not much to intermpt

If ael, in the conquest of Sehon the Amorite, and of og his confederate, was that the Moabites might hope after such time as the Amorites were beaten by Moses, that themselves might recover againe their owne inheritance: to wit, the Vallies and Plaines lying betweene the mountaines of Arabia and Jordan: But as foone as Sebon was flaine, and that the King of Moab, Balac, perceived that Moses allotted that valley to the Tribes of Gal and Ruben, he began to practife with Balaam against Ifrael, and by the daughters of Midian, as aforefaid, to allure them to Idolatry: and thus at the length the Moabits by speciall occasion were more and more stirred up to enmity against Israel. And as for divers of the rest that were descended from Abrahams kindred, we may note, how in the beginning, between the Authors of their Pedigrees, God permitted some enmittes to ke as it were presages of future quarrels, which in the posterity might be the easier incented by the memory of old grudges: and withall by some disdaine from the elder in name to the younger. For the Ismaelites being descended from the eldest some of Abraham, and the Edomites from the eldest sonne of Isaac, 3acob, being but a second sonne, of alecond brother; those Princes which were descended of the elder Houses, being natural men, might scorne to give place, much lesse to subject themselves to their inferiours, 15 they tooke it : and for a more aggravation, the issues of Esas, Princes of Idamea, might keepe in record that their Parent was bought out of his birth-right by Jacobs taking his

after reconciliation came not unto him as he promised, into Seir or Idumea. So also in the posterity of Ismael, it might remaine as a seed or pretence of enmity, that their fore-father was by the infligation of Sara, cast out into the Defart, with his mother Hagar; and had therein perished, but that it pleased God by his Angell to relieve them. Ismael also had an Egyptian both to his mother and to his wife: and Amalec was also an Horite by his mother: which Horites were of the ancient Canaanites. The Edumæans also, or Edomites, were by their Maternall line descended of the Canaanites. For Efau tooke two wives of that Nation: one of them was Adath, the daughter of Elon, the St Hittite; and the other Abolibamah, the grand-child of Zibeon the Hevite, Lord of Seir, before the fame was conquered by Efan, and called after his name, Edom, or Edumaa.

Lastly, it appeareth that all those Families of the Ismaelites, Amalekites, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, &c. were in processe of time corrupted, & drawn from the knowledge, and worship of God, and became Idolaters, infected and seduced by the conversation of those people among whom they dwelt, and by those wives of the Canaanites which they had married : onely a few of the Kenites and those Madianites, which inhabited on the edge of the Red Sea, whereof Jethro was Priest, or Prince, or both, worshipped the true audever-living God.

Fthe Kings of the Canaanites, descended of Cham, (for Melchizedek may be thought to be of a better Petigree) we finde foure named by Mafes : and one and thirty remembred by Jofus, though few of these named, otherwise than by the Cities over which they commanded: to which each of them had a small Territory adjoyning, and no other Dominion. These Canaanites in a generall consideration are to he understood for all those Nations, descended of Chamby Canaan, as the Hettites. Februs fites, Amorites, Gergefites, Hevites, erc. and fo here we understand this name in speaking of the Kings of the Canaanites: and so also we call the Countrey of their habitation, the holy land, or the Land of promife: for God hath appointed that the feven principle Families hould be rooted out, and that his own people should inherit their Lands and Cities. But if we consider of the name and Nation in particular, then is their proper habitation bounded by fordan, on the East, and by the Mediterran Sea on the West: in which narrow Countrey, and in the choy fest places thereof, those Canaanites which held their Paremall name chiefly inhabited.

The first King of these Nations, named in the Scriptures, was Hamor or Hemer, of the Gen 343 Hevites, whom Simeon and Levi flew, together with his fon Sicken, in revenge of their fifters ravishment.

And was the fecond King which the Scriptures have remembred, who had that part of Consan towards the South, neighbouring Edom and the dead Sea; the same which fur Num 21.1 prifed Ifrael, as they encamped in the Wilderneffe in the edge of Edumaa.

The third named was Sehon King of Ellehon, who before Moles arrivall had bearen the Mosbites out of the West part of Arabia Petras or Nabathes, and thrust them over Arnon Numas 2.de into the Defarts, the fame whom Mofes overthrew in the plaines of Moab: at which time hetooke Effebon, and all the Cities of the Amorites.

Prefently after which victory, og was also flaine by Ifrael, who commanded the North and the North part of that Valley between the Mountaines Traconi or Galand and Fordan, who was also Numer. a King of the Amorites.

The fift was Adonizedek King of the Jebusites, and of Hierusalem, with whom Josud namethfoure other Kings.

Hoham, King of Hebron. Piram King of farmuth. Papia King of Laches: and Deber, King of Eglon, who were all Amorites overthrowne in battell; and hanged by John Roll Folia. After this overthrow Josua nameth Fabin, King of Hazor, and

After these Adonibezek that notorious Tyrant is named: who confest that he had cut off the thumbes of the hands and feete of seventy Kings, inforcing them to gather fulls follows trummes under his Table: who, after Juda and Simeon had used the same execution 465.689.20 sponhimselfe, acknowledged is to be a just revenge of God: this King was warried to Hierufalem where he died.

The last King named is Jabin the second, who as it seemeth had rebuilt Hazer, burnt by Josia. For at such time as he employed Sisara against Israel, whom he opprest twenty yeares, after the death of Ebud, He inhabited Hazor. This Jabin, Barac (encouraged by Jud. Debora) overthrew; and his Captaine Sifare had by Jack, the wife of Heber the Kenite; a had a nailedriven into his head while he slept in her Tent: Jabin himselfe perishing afterward Pfal.837 in that warre.

The Madianites had also their Kings at times, but commonly mixt with the Moabites: Tolephils at and they held a corner of Land in Nabathea: to the South-east of the Dead Sea. This Jethroishe were not the fame with Hobab, must be his father: and this Hobab had seven daughters. At fuch time as Saul invaded the Amalekites, he knowing the good affection of the Ke. nites to Ifrael, gave them warning to separate themselves : and yet the Kenites had firon & Sam. 15.60 seates, and lived in the mountaines of the Defarts. The Kings of the Canaanites, and Madianites, and the Amalekites, as many as I find named, were these:

1. Homer the Hevite of Sichem 2. Arad of the South parts 3. Sehon of Effebon 4. Og of Bafan 5. Adonizedek the Jebusite, King of Hierufalem 6. Hoham of Hebron 7. Piram offarmath 8. Fapia of Lachis 9. Debir of Eglon 10.7abin of Hazor 1 1. Jobab of Meden

12. Adonibezek of Bezek, and 13. Jabin the second King of Hazor.

After the death of Barac, Judge of I frael, the foure last named of these Madianite King Gideous victory: vexed Ifrael feven yeares: till they being put to flight by Gideon, two of them, town Oreb and Zeb, were taken and flaine by the Ephraimites, at the passage of Jordan, winter 6.7 and 8. of Judges it is written at large. Afterward in the pursuite of the rest, Giden himselse laide hands upon Zebah and Salmana, or Zalmunna, and executed them, being pi foners in which expedition of Gideon there perished 120000 of the Madianites and that confederates. Of the Idumans, Moabites, and Ammonites, I will speake hereafter with description of their Territories.

6. III. Of the Amalekites, and Ismaelites.

Fthe Kings of the Amalekites and Ismaelites, I finde few that are named; and though of the Ismaelises there were more in number than of the rest (forther were multiplied into a greater Nation, according unto the promise of God made unto Abraham) yet the Amalekites, who together with the Midianits were number among them, were more renowned in Mojes time than the reft of the Ismaelites. So all were they when Saul governed Ifrael. For Saul purfued them from Sur unto Havilah, withover a great part of Arabia Petras, and the Defart. The reason to me seemeth to Vations have valuated of those their antiquities, accompanied not onely with civill this: That the twelve Princes which came of Ismael, were content to leave those band Defarts of Arabia Petraa, called Sur, Paran, and Sin, to the iffue of Abraham by Cethan that joyned with them (for fo feemethe Amalekites to have bin, and fo were the Madianites:) themselves taking possession of a better soyle in Arabia the Happy, and about the Mountaines of Galaad in Arabia Petraa: For Nabaioth the eldest of those twelve Princes planted that part of Arabia Petraa; which was very fruitfull; though adjoyning to the Defart in which Moses wandred afterward called Nabathea: the same which neighbourreth Judes on the East-side. They also peopled a Province in Arabia the Happy, whereof the people were in after-times called Napathei (B) changed into (P).

Kedar, the second of Ismaels sonnes, gave his owne name to the East-part of Basar, of Retained, which was afterward possest by Manasse, so much therof as lay within the mounraines Traconi, or Gilead: Which Nation Lampridius calleth Kedarens, & Pliny Cedraans. Of Massathe Massani, and of Hadar or Chadar, the Athrita, who bordered the Navatheans in the fame happy Arabia.

Thema begat the Themaneans, among the Arabian Mountaines, where also the Citie of Thema is feated.

Of Jetur the Itureans, or Chamathens : of whom Tohu was King in Davids time.

Of Nathri the Nubeian Arabians, inhabiting Syria Zoba: over whom AdadeZer commanded while David ruled Ifrael.

Cadma, the last and twelfth of Ismaels sons, was the Ancestor of the Cadmoneans : who were afterward called Afta, because they worshipped the Fire with the Babylonians. Tunius.

The Amalekites gave their Kings the name of Agag, as the Egyptians the name of Pharaphrotheirs, and the ancient Syrians Adad to theirs, and the Arabian Nabatheans Antas as Names of Honour-of all times they flourished most, and yet were vanquished.

The Amalekites were the first that fought with Moses, after he past the Red Sea: when

Afterward they joyned with the Canaanites, and beatethe Ifraelites neere Cadesbarne, After the government of Othoniel, they joyned them with the Moabites : after Barat with the Madianites: and invaded Ifrael. God commanded that as foone as Ifrael had reft, they should roote out the name of the Amalekites; which Saul executed in part, when he wasted them from the border of Egypt, to the border of Caldaa: from Havilah to Shur.

In Davids time they tooke Siklag in Simeon; but David followed them, and furprifed them, recovering his prisoners and spoiles. And yet, after David became King, they a-25am. S. 12 gaine vexed him, but to their owne loffe.

In Exthias time as many of them as joyned to Edumes were wasted and displanted by E. the children of Simeon.

Of the inflauration of Civility in Europe about these times, and of Prometheus and Atlas. Here lived at this time, and in the same age together with Moses, many men exceeding famous, as well in bodily strength, as in all forts of learning. And as the World was but even now enriched with the written Law of the living God, so did Art and Civility (bred and sostered farre off in the East, and in Egypt) begin at this time to discover a passage into Europe, and into those parts of Greece, heighbouring Asia and Judga. For if Pelasgus besides his bodily strength, was chosen King of Arcadia, because he taught thole people to erect them simple Cottages, to deend them from raine and storme: and learned them withall to make a kinde of Meale, and pread of Acornes, who before lived for the most part, by Herbes and Rootes: we hay thereby judge how poore and wretched those times were, and how falfly those aming, but with all other kindes of knowledge. both Eusebius and S. Againe, it is written of him, that he had the art for ouse this fire, as thereby he gave life to the Images of Wood, Stone, and Clay: meaning that before his birth and being, those people among whom he lived, had no. thing else worthy of men, but externall forme and figure. By that fiction of Promethem, it being bound on the top of the Hill Caucafus, his entrailes the while devoured by an Eagle, was meant the inward care and reftleffe defire he had to investigate the Natures, Motions, and Influences of Heavenly bodies; for so it is said: I deo altissimum ascendisse Caucasum, ut sereno calo quam longi sime astra, signorum obitus & ortus spectaret; That he ascended Caucasus, to the end that he might in a cleere skye discerne a far off the settings and risings of the Starres: though Diedorus Siculus expounds it otherwise, and others diversly.

Of this Mans knowledge Æscylus gives this testimonie.

There lived also at once with Moses, that famous Atlas, brother to Prometheus, both being the sonnes of Japetus, of whom though it be faid, that they were bornebelor Moses dayes, and therefore are by others esteemed of a more ancient date: yet theadvan rage of their long lives gave them a part of other ages among men, which came into the Worldlong after them. Besides these sonnes of Japetus, Aesculus findes two other, to wit, Oceanus and Hesperus, who being famous in the West, gave name to the Evenings and fo to the evening Starre. Also besides this Atlas of Lybia, or Mauritania, there were others which bare the same name: but of the Lybian, and the brother of Promelous it was that those Mountaines which crosse Africa, to the South of Marocco, Sus, and Hu, with the Sea adjoyning, tooke name, which memory Plate in Critias bestowes on Miles

Nd in this age of the World, and while Moses yet lived, Deucalion reigned in Thessale, Crotopus then ruling the Argives. This Dencalion was the sonne of Pro-com. Alex-Ametheus, faith Herodotus, Apollonius, Hesiodus, and Strabo. Hesiodus gave him stromat. Pundorafor mother; the rest Clymene: Homer in the fifteenth of his Odysses, makes Strabotib. 9. Descalion the sonne of Minos: but he must needs have meant some other Descalion. for else either Ulysses was mistaken, or Homer, who put the tale into his mouth. For While after his returne from Troy, fained himselfe to be the brother of Idomeneus, who was some to this later Deucalion, the some of Mines : but this Mines lived but one age before Troy was taken: (for Idomeneus served in that warre) and this Dencation the some of Promitteus, who lived at once with Moses, was long before. In the first Dencalions time happened that great inundation in Theffalie: by which in effect every foule, in those parts, perished, but Deucation, Pyrrha his wife, and some few others. It is affirmed that at thetime of this floud in The false, those people exceeded in all kinde of wickednesse and villany and as the impiety of men is the forcible attractive of Gods vengeance, so did all that Nation for their foule sinnes perish by waters: as in the time of Noah, the corruption and cruelty of all man kinde drew on them that generall destruction by the floud univerfall. Onely Deucation, and Pyrrha his wife, whom God spared, were both of them esteemed to be lovers of Vertue, of Justice and of Religion. Of whom evid:

Nonillo melior quifquam, nec amantior aqui. Vir fuit : aut illa reverentior ulla dearum.

No man was better, nor more just than he: Norany woman godlier than shee.

It is also affirmed that Promethens fore-told his sonne Deucation of this over-flowing. and advised him to provide for his safety : who hereupon prepared himselfea kinde of Vessell, which Lucian in his Dialogue of Timon calles Cibetium; and others Larnax. And because to these circumstances, they afterward adde the sending out of the Dove, to distover the waters fall & decrease, I should verily thinke that Story had bin but an imitation of Noahs floud devised by the Greekes, did not the times for much differ, and Saint Magustine with others of the Fathers and reverent Writers approve this Story of Deneaion, Among other his children Deucalion had these two of note, Hellen, of whom Greece had first the name of Hellas, & Melanthe, on whom Neptune is said to have begot Delphors. which gave name to Delphos, fo renowned among the Heathen for the Oracle of Apollo Augusta Civil therein founded.

And that which was no leffe strange and marvailous than this stoud, was that great exempline burning and conflagration which about this time also happened under Phaeton; not onely hEthiopia, but in Istria, a Region in Italy, and about Cuma, and the Mountaines of Vefuof both which the Greeker, after their manner, have invented many ftrange fables.

6. VI. Of Hermes Trismegistus.

Ut of all other which this age brought forth among the Heathen, Mercurius was the most famous, and renowned the same which was also called Trismegistus, or Ter Maximus; and of the Greekes, Hermes.

Many there were of this name; and how to diffinguish, and set them in their own times, both S. Augustine and Lastantius finde it difficult. For that Mercury which was esteemed the God of Theeves, the God of Wrestlers, of Merchants, and Sea-men, and the God to of Eloquence (though all by one name confounded) was not the same with that Mercury,

Cicero, Clemens Alexandrinus, Arnobius, and certaine of the Greekes reckon five Mer. curies. Of which, two were famous in Egypt, and there worshipped; one, the some of Nilus, whosename the Egyptians feared to utter, as the Jewes did their Tetragrammaton; the other that Mercury, which flew Argus in Greece, and flying into Egypt, is faid to have delivered literature to the Egyptians, and to have given them Lawes. But Diodorus affirmeth, that Orpheus, and others after him, brought learning and letters out of Egypinto Greece : which Plate also confirmeth, faying; That letters were not found out by that Mercury which flew Argus, but by that ancient Mercury, otherwise Thevet; whom Phila Byblins writeth Taautus; the Egyptians Thoyth; the Alexandrians Thot; and the Greeks (as before) Hermes. And to this Taautus, Sanconiatho, who lived about the war of Troy, gives the invention of letters. But S. Augustine making two Mercuries which were both Egyptians, calles neither of them the fonne of Nilus, nor acknowledgeth either of them to have flaine Argus. For he findes this Mercury the flayer of Argus, to be the grand-child of that Atlas, which lived while Mofes was yet young. And yet L. Vives upon S. Augustine seemes to understand them to be the same with those, whom Cicero, Alexandrinus, and the rest have remembred. But that conjecture of theirs, that any Gracian Mercun brought letters into Egypt, hath no ground. For it is manifest, (if there be any truthin prophaine antiquitie) that all the knowledge which the Greekes had, was transported out of Egypt or Phanicia, and not out of Greece, nor by any Gracian into Egypt. Forthey all confess, that Cadmus brought letters first into Boeotia, either out of Egypt, or out of Phoenicia: it being true, that between Mercurius, that lived at once with Mofes & Caami, there were these descents cast; Crotopus King of the Argives, with whom Moses lived, and in whose time about his tenth yeare Moses died; after Crosopus, Sthenelus, who reigned eleven yeares; after him Danaus fifty yeares; after him Linceus : in whose time, and the ter him in the time of Minos King of Crete, this Cadmus arrived in Boeotia. And therefore it cannot be true that any Mercurius about Moses his time, flying out of Greece for the flaughter of Argus, brought literature out of Greece into Egypt. Neither did either of those two Mercuries of Egypt, whom Saint Augustine remembreth, the one the grand a father, the other the Nephew or grand-child, come out of Greece. Eupolemus and Artapt nus note, that Moses found out Letters, and taught the use of them to the Jewes; of whom the Phoenicians their neighbors received them3& the Greekes of the Phoenicians by Cadmus. But this invention was also ascribed to Moses, for the reason before remembred, that is, because the Jewes & the Phoenicians had them first from him. For every Nationgave unto those men the honour of first Inventors, from whom they received the profit. Fisinus makes that Mercurie, upon part of whose workes he Commenteth, to have been foure descents after Moses, which he hath out of Virgil, who calls Atlas, that lived with Mofes, the maternall grand father of the first famous Mercury, whom others, as Dioderus, call the Counfailer and Instructer of that renowned Iss, wife of Ofris. But Finns Fich in Prefat giveth no reason for his opinion herein. But that the elder Mercury instructed Iss, Die dorus Siculus affirmeth, and that fuch an infeription was found on a pillar erected on the Tombe of Iss. Lod Vives upon the fixe and twentieth Chapter of the eight Booked Saint Augustine de Civitate Dei, conceiveth, that this Mercury, whose workes are extant was not the first which was entituled Ter maximus, but his Nephew or grand-child, choniaten, an ancient Phoenician, who lived thorrly after Mofes, hath other fancies ofthis Mercury; affirming that he was the Scribe of Saturne, & called by the Phoenicians Time

But by those who have collected the confidence of the c grounds of the Egyptian Philosophie and Divinitie, he is found more ancient than Moles: because the Inventor of the Egyptian Wisedome, wherein it is said, that Moses was ex-

It is true, that although this Mercurie or Hermes doth in his Divinitie differ in many particulars from the Scriptures, especially in the approving of Images, which Moses of all things most detested: yet who soever shall reade him with an even judgement, will rather resolve, that these workes which are now extant, were by the Greekes and Egyptian To Priests corrupted, and those fooleries inserted, than that ever they were by the hand of Hermes written, or by his heart and spirit devised For there is no man of understanding, and mafter of his owne wits, that hath affirmed in one and the fame Tract, those things which are directly contrary in doctrine, and in nature: For out of doubt (Mofes exceptted) there was never any man of those elder times that hath att ributed more, and in a filemore reverend and divine, unto Almighty God, than he hathdone. And therefore ifthose his two Treatises, now among us; the one converted by Apuleius, the other by that learned Ficinus, had beene found in all things like themselves: I thinke it had not Majing binnerillous to have thought with Eupolemus, that this Hermes was Mofes himselfe; and that the Engine Theology hereafter written, was divised by the first, & more ancient Merourie, which others have thought to have bin Joseph, the son of Jacob: whom, after the exmilion of Pharaohs dreames, they called Saphanetphane, which is as much to fay, as abfconditorum repertor; A finder out of hidden things. But these are over-venturous opinions. Forwhat this man was, it is known to God. Envie and aged time hath partly defaced, and parly worne out the certaine knowledge of him : of whom, who foever he were, Lattan- L. r.e. foliaj timiwriteth in this fort: His scripst libros, & quidem multos, ad cognitionem divinarum rirum pertinentes, in quibus Majestatem summi ac singularis Dei asserit, iisdemque nominibus appellat, quibus nos, Deum & Patrem . He bath written many bookes belonging to or expressing the knowledge of divine things, in which he affirmeth the Majesty of the most High & one God, calling him by the same names of God & Father, which we do. The same Father also o feareth not to number him among the Sybils and Prophets. And so contrary are these his acknowledgements to those Idolatrous fictions of the Egyptians and Gracians, as for my felfe I am perswaded, that whatsoever is found in him contrary theseunto, was by corruption inserted. For thus much himselfe confesseth: Deus omnium Dominus, & Pater, fond vita, potentia & lux. & mens, & spiritus; & omnia in ipso, & sub ipso sunt Verbum enimen ejus effe prodiens, perfectifsimum existens, & generator & opifen, &c. God (faith he) the Lord and Father of all things, the fountaine, and life, and power, and light, and minde, and spirit: and all things are in him, and under him. For his Word out of himselfe Proceeding, most perfect, and generative, and operative, falling upon fruitfull nature, made it also fruitfull and producing. And he was therefore (faith Suydas) called Ter maximus, quiade Trinitate loquutus est, in Trinitate unum esse Deum asserens; Because he stake of the Trinity, affirming that there is one God in Trinity. His ruinam (faith Ficinus) pravidit prisea Religionis, hic ortum nova fidei, hic adventum Christi, hic futurum judicium, re- In Presi Mete surrectionem saculi, beatorum gloriam, supplicia peccatorum; This Mercurie foresam the trismeg. ruine of the old or superstitions Religion, and the birth of the new faith, and of the comming of Christ, the future judgement, the resurrection, the glory of the Blessed, and the torment of affliction of the wicked or damned.

Tothis I will only adde his two last speeches reported by Calcidius the Platonist, & by Volseran out of Suydas. Hattenus, fili, pulsus à patria, vixi peregrinus & exul, nunc incolumis repeto: cumq; post paulum à vobis corporeis vinculis absolutus discessero, videtote ne me quase mortuum lugeatis: Nam ad illam optimam beatamq; Civitatem regredior, ad quam universi aves mortis conditione venturi sunt. And when I shall after a few dayes (or in a short time) by being loosed from these bonds of stesh and bloud, depart from you see that you do not bewaile me us arman dead, for I doe but resurne to that best and blessed Citie, 20 which all her CisiZens (by the condition of death) shall repaire. Therein is the only God, the most high and chiefe Prince; who filleth or feedeth his CitiZens with sweetnesse more than marveilous : in regard whereof, this being, which others call a life, is rather to be accounted a death than a life. The other, and that which feemeth to be his last, is thus converted by o. thers, agrecing in sense, but not in words, with Suydas: O calum magni Dei sapiens opus. tég; O vox patris quamille primam emisit, quando universum constituit mundum, adjuro per unigenitum ejus verbum, & Spiritum cuncta comprehendentem, miseremini met: I adjurethee O heaven, thou wife worke of the great God, and thee O voyce of the Father, which he first uttered, when he framed the whole World, by his onely begotten Word, and Spirit, comprehending all things. Have mercy upon me.

of Jannes and Jambres, and some other that lived about those times.

Here were also in this age both Esculapius, which after his death became the 10 God of Physicians, being the brother of Mercurius, as Vives thinks in his Commentary upon Jugustine, de Civitate Dei lib. 8. and also those two notorious Sorcerers, James and Jambres, who in that impious art excelled all that ever had been heard of to this day : and yet Moses himselfe doth not charge them with any familiarity with Divels, or ill Spirits: words indeed that seldome came out of his mouth; how-ever by the Septuagint they are called Sophifta, or Venefici & Incantatores; Sophifts Poysoners and Inchanters: by Hierome, Sapientes & malesici; Wise men, and evill doers: and so by Varablus, who also useth the word Magi. The Greeke it selfe seemes at attribute fomewhat of what they did to naturall Magicke: calling them paguants, workers by drugs, The Genevian, Sorcerers and Inchanters: Junius, Sapientes, praftigiatores & Magi. Magicians and Wise men here by him are taken in one sense: and Prestigiators are such as dazel menseyes, and make them seeme to see what they see not: as false colours, and false shapes. But as some vertues and some vices are so nicely distinguished, and so resembling each other, as they are often confounded; and the one taken for the other: (Religion and Superstition having one face and countenance) so did the workers and workings of Moles, and of Pharao's Sorcerers appeare in outward shew, and to the beholders of common capacities, to be one and the fame art and gift of knowledge. For the Divell changeth himselfe into an Angell of light : and imitateth in all he can the waies and workings of the most High. And yet on the contrary every worke which surmounteth the wifedomeof most men, is not to be condemned, as performed by the helpe or ministery of ill a Spirits. For the properties and powers which God hath given to naturall things, are fuch, as where he also bestoweth the knowledge to understand their hidden and best verues, many things by them are brought to passe, which seeme altogether impossible, andabove nature or art: which two speculations of workes of nature, and of miracle, the Cabilists distinguished by these names; Opus de Beresth, & opus de mercana : the one they call Sapientiam natura; The Wisdome of nature: the other Sapiensiam divinitatio; The Wisdome of divinity: the one Jacob practifed in breeding the pied Lambes, in Mefopotamia; the other Moses exercs ied in his miracles wrought in Egypt, having received from God the knowledge of the one in the highest perfection, to wit, the knowledge of nature : of the other fo farre as it pleased God to proportion him, both which he used to his glory that gave them : affirming to himselfe nothing at all either in the least or most. Also Saint digufine noteth, that from the time that Mofes left Egypt, to the death of Joshua, divers other famous men lived in the World, who after their deaths for their eminent vertues and inventions, were numbred among the Gods: as Dionysius, otherwise Liber Pater, who taught the Gracians the use of the Vine in Attica: at which time also there were instituted Musicall playes to Apollo Delphicus: thereby to regaine his favour, who brought barrenneffe and scarcity upon that part of Greece, because they resisted not the attempts of Dinaus, who spoiled his Temple and set it on fire: so did Erithonius institute the like games to Minerva: wherein the Victor was rewarded with a prefent of Oyle, in memory of her that first prest it out of the Olive.

Inthis age also Xanthus ravished Europa, and begat on her Radamanthus, Sarpedon and Minos, which three are also given to Jupiter by other Historians. To these Saint Augu-Lib de civilis Aine addeth Hercules; the same to whom the twelve labours are afferibed, native of Ty-Deicap, 124 rinthia a City of Peloponnefus: (or as others fay, only nurfed and brought up there) who rame into Italy, and destroyed many Monsters there; being neither that Heroules, which Euspins furnameth Delphin, famous in Phanicia; nor that Hercules, according to Philo-Philoship, Philoship, Phi fratus, which came to Gades, whom he calleth an Egyptian: Manifestum fit, non Thebanum Herculem, sed Agyptium ad Gades pervenisse, & ibi finem statuisse terra (faith Philofrains; It is manifest that it was the Egyptian Hercules, and not the Theban, which travailed as farre as the freights of Gades, and there determined the bounds of the earth. Inthis timealfo while Moses wandered in the Desarts, Dardanus built Dardania.

But who foever they were, or how worthy foever they were that lived in the dayes and age of Mofes, there was never any man, that was no more than man, by whomir plealed God to worke greater things; whom hee favoured more to whom (according to the appearing of an infinite God) hee so often appeared; never any man more familiar and conversant with Angels; never any more learned both in Divine and Humane knowledge: never a greater Prophet in Ifrael. Hee was the first that received and delivered the Law of God entire; the first that left to posterity by letters, the truth and power of one infinite God; his creating out of nothing the World Universall, and all the creatures therein: that taught the detestation of Idolatry, and the punishment, vengeance, and eradication, which followed.

Syracides calleth Mojes the beloved of God and men, whose remembrance is blessed. He made him (faith the fame Author) like to the glorious Saints, and magnified him by the syracas, 1215 fure of his enemies, made him glorious in the fight of Kings, shewed him his glory, caused him to heare his voyce, Cantified him with fait bfulneffe and meekeneffe, and chofe him out of all.

Heeis remembred among prophane Authors; as by Clearchus the Peripatetick; by Megastines, and Numenius the Pythagorian. The long lives which the Patriarchs enjoyed before the floud, remembred by Moses, Estieus, Hieronymus Egiptius, Hecataus, Elanicus, Acufilans, Ephorus, and Alexander the Historian, confirme. The universal floud which Godrevealed unto Muses, Berosus, Nicolaus Damascenus, and others have testified. The building of the Tower of Babel, and confusion of tongues, Abydenus, Estiens, and Sybilla haveapproved. Berofus also honoureth Abraham. Hecataus wrot a Booke of him. Da. mascenus before cited, speaketh of Abrahams passage from Damascus into Canaan, agreeing with the Bookes of Moses. Eupelemon writeth the very same of Abraham, which Mofirdid. For beginning with the building of Babel, and the overthrow thereof by divine Power, hee faith that Abraham, borne in the tenth generation, in the City called Camerina, or Urien, excelled all men in wisedome: and by whom the Astrologie of the Caldaans Was invented. Is justitia pietateq; sua (faith Eusebius out of the same Author) sic Deo gratus fuit, ut divino pracepto in Phæniciam venerit, ibiq, habitaverit; For his justice and piety hewas fo pleasing unto God as by his commandement he came into Phænicia, and dwelt there. Likewise Diodorus Siculus, in his second Booke and fift Chapter, speaketh reverently of Moses: There are many other among prophane Authors, which do confirme the Bookes of Mosts, as Eusebius hath gathered in the ninth of his Preparation to the Gospell, Chapter the third and fourth, to whom I referre the Reader. Lastly, I cannot but for some things mircommend this notable testimony of Strabo, who writeth of Moses in these words Moses enim affirmavit, docebatq; Aegyptios non rette sentire, qui bestiarum & pecorumima-Sines Deo tribuerunt itema; Afros & Gracos qui Dits hominum figuram affinxerunt : id Strabol. vero solum esse Deum, qued nos & terram & mare continet, quod calum & mundum, & reruna omniam naturam appellamus : cujus profecto imaginem, nemo sana mentis, alicujus earum rerum, qua penes nos sunt similem audeat effingere. Proinde (omni simulachrorum effictione rea Padiata) dignum ei Templum ac Delubrum constituendum, ac sine aliqua figura colendum : Moles affirmed and taught that the Egyptians thought amisse, which artributed unto God the Images of beasts and cattell: Also that the Affricans and Greekes greatly erred in giving unto their Gods the shapes of men: whereas that onely is God indeed, which containeth both the Earth and Sea, which we call Heaven; the World, and the nature of all things, whole image, doubtlesse, no wise man will dare to fashion out unto the likenesse of those things, which are among ft us : That therefore (all devising of Idols cast aside) aworthy Temple and place of prayer was to be erected unto him, and he to be worshipped without any figure at all therein. Now concerning the Egyptian wisedome, for which the Martyr Stephen commended

Moles, faving, That Moles was learned in all the wisedome of the Egyptians, and was might in his works and words , the fame is corrected (how truly I know not) by Diodorus, Diogenes, Laertius, Iamblicus, Philo Judaus, and Eusebius Casariensis, and divided into source parts, vi7. Mathematicall, Naturall, Divine, and Morall.

In the Mathematicall part, which is distinguish't into Geometrie, Astronomie, Arithme. tick, and Musick, the ancient Egyptians exceed all others. For Geometry which is by in. terpretation measuring of grounds, was usefull unto them : because it consisting of infallible principles, directed them certainly in bounding out their proper Lands, and Ter. ritories, when their fields and limits, by the inundations of Nilus, were yearely overflowne and confounded, so as no man could know what in right belonged unto him.

For the fecond part, to wit, Astronomie, the fite of the Country being a levell and fnactous Plaine, free and cleere from the clouds, yeelded them delight with ease, in observing and contemplating the rifings, fallings, and motions of the Starres.

Arithmeticke alfo, which is the knowledge of numbers, they studied because without it, in Geometry and Astronomy, nothing can be demonstrated or concluded. But of Musicke they made no other account, nor defired farther knowledge, than seemed to them sufficient to serve and magnifie their Gods, their Kings, and good Men.

The Naturall part of this Wisedome, which handleth the principles, causes, elements. & operations of naturall things, differs little from Peripatericall Philosophie, teaching, that Materia prima is the beginning of all things; that of it all mixt bodies and living creatures have their being; that Heaven is round like a Globe; that all Starres have a certaine fovent heate, and temperate influences, whereby all things grow and are produced; that raines proceed and be from mutations in the ayre; that the Planets have their proper

The Divine part of this wisedome, which is called Theologie, teacheth and beleeven that the world had a beginning, and shall perish; that men had their first orignall in Egype; partly by meanes of the temperatenesse of that Country, where neither Winter with cold, nor Summer with heate are offensive; and partly through the fertility, that Wilns giveth inthose places: That the soule is immortall, and hath transmigration from body to body; That God is one, the Father and Prince of all Gods; and that from this God, other gods are, as the Sunne and Moone, whom they worshipped by the names of Ofiris and Isis, and erected to them Temples, Statues, and divers Images, because the true fimilitudes of the Gods is not known; that many of the Gods have beene in the estate of mortall men, and after death, for their vertues, and benefits bestowed on many kinde, have bin Deified; that those beasts, whose Images and formes the Kings did carrie in their Armes, when they obtained victory, were adored for Gods: because der those Ensignes they prevailed over their enemies. Moreover the Egyptian Divins had a peculiar kinde of writing, mysticall and secret, wherein the highest points of their Religion and worship of God, which was to be concealed from the vulgar fort, were ob-

Clemens distributeth the whole summe of this later Egyptian learning into three several forts, viz. Epiftolar, which is used in writing common Epistles; Sacerdotall, which is peculiar to their Priests; and Sacred, which Sacred containeth Scripture of two kindes: the one proper, which it expressed by letters Alphabeticall in obscure and figure rative words; as for example, where it is written: The Ibis by the Hornet participateth the beauty of the Hawke; which is read thus: The Moone doth by the Sunne borro part of the light of God: because Light is an Image of Divine beauty; the other symbols call, or by fignatures, which is threefold, viz. Imitative, Tropicall, and Ænygmaticall Imitative, which defigneth things by characters, like to the things fignified, as by a Circle the Sun; and by the Hornes of the Moone, the Moone it selfe: Tropicall or transferent, which applies the divers formes and figures of naturall bodies or creatures, to fignified dignities, fortunes, conditions, vertues, vices, affections, and actions of their Gods, and men. So with the Egyptian Divines, the Image of an Hawke fignifieth God, the figure of the Hornet significant the Sunne, the picture of the Bird 16 is fignishen the Moone by the forme of a Man, Prudence and Skilfulneffe: by a Lion, Fortitude: by a Horse Libertie: by a Crocodile, Impudency: by a Fish, Hatred is to be understood. Ænigmaticall is a composition or mixture of Images or Similitudes: in which sense, the monstrous Image of a Lions body having a Mans head, was graven on their Temples and Altars, to fignifie, that to men all divine things are Anigmaticall and obscure. So the Image of the Sunne set on the head of a Crocodile, (which liveth as well in the Waters, as on Land) expressent that the Sun nourisheth Meteors in the Aire, aswell from the Waters, as from the Farth. So a Scepter, at the top whereof is made an Eye, and an Eare, fignifieth God. Hearing, Seeing, and governing all things. The Scythians are thought to have bin delighted with this kinde of writing. For Pherecides Syrius reporteth, That when Darius fending letters, threatned Idanthura, King of the Scythians, with ruine and destruction of his Kingdome, unlesse he would acknowledge subjection: Idanthura returned to hima Mouse, a Frog, as Bird, a Darr, and a Plough-share which orontopagas, Tribune of the Souldiers, interpreted to fignific, that by the moule, their dwellings: by the Frog. their waters : by the Bird, their ayre: by the Dart, their weapons: by the Plough their landes, were fignified to be ready to be delivered to Darius, as their Soveraigne Lord. But Nyphodres made another construction, viz that the King meant, That except Darius withhis men did haften away, as a Bird through the Ayre, or creepe into holes as a moule, or runne into the waters which they had passed as a Frog, they should not escape moule, or runne into the waters water is with little difference reported by Herodotus.

The fourth and last part, which is Morall and Politique, doth containe especially the Lawes, which (according to Laertius) Mercurius Trismegistus, or Ter Maximus devised: who in his Bookes or Dialogues of Pimander and Afelepius, hath written fo many things of God, worthy of admiration; aswell (faith Sixtus Senensis) of the Trinity, and of the comming of Christ, as of the last and scarefull day of Judgement : that (as faith the same Author, the opinion being also ancient) he is not onely to be accounted a Philosopher, but a Prophet of things to come.

lamblicus in his Bookes of Mysteries of the Egyptians, taking two very ancient Hiflorians for his Authors, to wit, Seleucus and Menatus, affirmeth that this Mercury was not onely the Inventor of the Egyptian Philosophy, but of all other learning, called the Wildome of the Egyptians before remembred: and that he wrote of that fubject 36525. Bookes, or Pages. Of which there were numbred, of Fiery Spirits, one hundred Books; of Aereall Spirits as many, and of Spirits Celestiall a thousand; which because they were out of the Egyptians language converted by certaine learned Philosophers into natural I Greeke, they feemed to have bin first written in that Tongue. Clemens Alexandrinus Clem. Swomles writeth, that among the Bookes of Hermes, to wit, of the Wifedome of the Egyptians, there were extant in his time 36. Of Phylicke fixe Bookes; of the orders of Priefts ten; and of Astrology foure.

§. VIII.

A Briefe of the History of Tosua; and of the space between him and Othonicl; and of the rea mainders of the Canaanites; with a note of some Contemporaries to Josua: and of the breach of Faith.

Free the death of Moles, and in the one and fortieth years of the Egreffion, in the first moneth called Nifan, or March, Josua, the son of Nun, of the Tribe of Ephraim, hit moneth cauca response to the spirit of wisedome, tooke on him the government of Israel and the poly God giving him comfort, and encouraging him to passe the River of Jordan, and to polleffe, and divide among the Ifraelites the Land promifed.

The beginning of Josua's rule, Saint Augustine dates with the raigne of Amyntus, the Lib. 18 de cit eighteenth King in Affria, with Coras the fixteenth King in Sicyonia, when Dariaus go-vit Deno. 12

verned the Argives; and Ericthonius, Athens.

Jofus imitating in all things his Predeceffor, fent over Jordan certaine discoverers to Joseph view the feate and strength of Jeries, the next City unto him on the other side of the River, which he was to passe over: Which discoverers being saved, and sent back by Rahab, a woman of ill fame, because she kept a Taverne or Virling-house, made Josus know that the inhabitants of ferice, and those of the Country about it, hearing of the approach Joleans fof.1.12.

of Ifrael, had lost courage. Whereupon the day after the returne of the Spies, which was the fixth day of the one and fortieth yeercafter the Egression, Josua removed from Sittim Jofa.r. in the plaines of Moab, and drew down his Army to the bankes of the River Jordan; and gave them commandement to put themselves in order to follow the Ark of God, when the Jof.3.1. Levites tooke it up, and moved towards the River; giving them withall this forcible encouragement, That they should thereby affure themselves of his favour and presence Jol3.3. who is Lord of all the world, when the River of Jordan should be cut off and divided. Jol.3-13 and the waters comming from above should stand still in a heape, whereby those below and the waters comming from above medical might passe over into the land of Canaan with towards the Dead Sea wanting supply, they might passe over into the land of Canaan with dry feet.

He also commanded Reuben, Gad, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse, to prepare themfelves (according to their Covenant made with Moses) to march in the head of the rest. and as we call it in this age, to lead in the Vantguard, which through all the Defarts of Arabia, from the Mount Sinai to this place, those of the Tribe of Juda had performed. For these Tribes being already provided of their habitations, and Countrie and Cities of the Amorites, by the helpe of the rest, conquered for them: it agreed with justice and equalitie, that Reuben, Gad, and the halfe of Manasse should also affist their brethren inthe ob-

On the banks of Jordan they rested themselves from the fixth day to the ninth; and on the tenthday of the first moneth Nijan, or March, they past over to the other side, taking 20 with them twelve stones from the drie ground in the middest of the River: which, for a memory of that miracle by God wrought, they fet upat Gilgal, on the East fide of the Citie of Jerico, where they encamped the first night. At which place Josus gave commandement, that all born in the last fortieth yeere in the Defarts should be circumcifed, which ceremonie to that day had beene omitted. Of the neglect whereof S. Augustine givethfor cause, The peoples contempt of their superiours. Thomas excuseth it in this fort; That the Ifraelites knew not the certaine time of their removing from one place to another: D4mascen, That it was not needfull by circumcifion to distinguish them from other Nations, at fuch time as they lived by themselves, and a-part from all Nations.

On the fourteenth day of the same Moneth, the children of Israel celebrated the Paffeover now the third time; first, at their leaving Egypt; secondly, at Mount Sinai; & now at Gilgal. After which, being defirous to tafte of the fruits of the Country, and having, s it-were, furfeted on Man, they parched of the Corne of the land, being not yet fully ripe,

And as Mofes began to distribute those Regions beyond Jordan, to wit, the Lands of the Amorites which og of Basan, and Sehon held, so did Josua performe the rest; and after a view and partition made of the Territories, he gave to each Tribe his portion by low But this partition and distribution was not done at once, but at three severall times; first, by Moses to Gad, Reuben, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse, of the Lands over Jordan; fecondly, by Tolua, to the Tribe of Juda, Ephraim, and the other halfe Tribe of Manafe, 10 about the fift yeere of his government; proved in the 14.0f Josus v. 10. and a third divifion was made to the other feven Tribes, at Shilo, where Jofus feated the Tabernacle of the Congregation.

The victories of Jofua against the Kings of the Canaanites, are so particularly setdown in his own bookes, as I shall not need to lengthen this part by their repitition. In whole Storie I chiefly note these particulars. First, how in the beginning of the warre, those little Kings or Reguli of the Canaanites, had not fo much understanding, as to unite themselves together against the Israelites; but according to the custome of those estates, from whose Governours God hath taken away all wisedome and foresight, they left those of their owne Nation, which were next the invaders, to themselves, and to their owne defences; hoping that the fire kindled somewhat farre off, might againe have been quenthed, ere it could spread it selse so farre as their owne Territories and Cities. But after fuch time as Jerico and Ai were entred, and the Kings, People, and Cities confumed; five of those 31. Kings (all which at length perished in that warre) joyned themselves to (the reft looking on to the fuccesse) namely, the King of the Jebusites, in Jebus, or Hient falem, the Kings of Hebron, Jarmoth, Lachis, & Eglon, address themselves for refistance whose Armie being by Josus surprised and broken, themselves despairing to escape by flight, and hopeleffe of mercy by fubmiffion, creeping into a Cave under ground, were flight, and topological thence by Joseph drawne forthand hanged. In the prosecution of which victory he also joseph tooke Makkedath, and Libnah, and Lachis. To the reliefe whereof Horam King of Gezar hastened, and perished. After which Josus possest himselfe of Eglon, Hebron, and Debre, Joseph

In the end, and when the South Countries were possest, the Cities thereof conquered, and their Kings and People made dust: the rest of the Canaanites, guided by the overlate counfailes of necessitie, united themselves, to make one grosse strength & body of an Armie: which Jabin, King of Hazor, practifed & gathered together, by Josua discovered as the same rested neere the Lake of Merom, he used such diligence, as he came on them unawares; and obtaining absolute victory over them, he prosecuted the same to the utmolt effect. And, besides the slaughter of the desendants, he entred their Cities, of which heburnt Hazor only, referving the rest for Israel to inhabite and enjoy.

Secondly, I note, that Jofus shewed himselfe a skilfull man of Warre, for that in those ancient times he used the stratagem of an ambush in taking of Ai; and in that he broke the Armies of the first five Kings of the Amorites, which attempted Gibeon by surprise. For hemarched all night from his campe at Gilgal, and feron them earely the next day; when Josson 93 heoverthrew Jabin and his confederates. After which, making the best profit of his victory, he assaulted the great Citie of Hazor.

Thirdly, the miracles which God wrought during this warre, were exceeding admirable; as the stay of the River Fordan at the Springs, so as the Armie of Ifrael past it with adrie foote; the fall of Jerico by the found of the Hornes; the showers of Haile-stones, Josa, v. 13. which fell upon the Amorites in their flight from Gibeon, whereby more of them perished Capato, ware thanby the fword of Ifrael : againe, the arrest of the Sunne in the firmament, whereby the dy was fo much the more lightened, as the Ifraelites had time to execute all those which fled after the overthrow: a wonder of wonders, and a worke only proper to the

Fourthly, out of the passage betweene Josus and the Gibeonites, the Doctrine of keeping Faithis fo plainely and excellently taught, as it taketh away allevation, it admitteth no pintrusion, nor leaveth open any hole or out-let at all to that cunning persidiousnes, and horrible deceit of this latter age, called Equivocation. For, notwithstanding that these Gibenites were a people of the Hevites, expresly and by name, by the commandement of Jose 75 Godtobe rooted out, and notwithstanding that they were liars, and deceivers, and counterfeits, and that they did over-reach, and, as it were, deride Fostua, and the Princes of Ifrail, by faining to be sent as Embassadours from a farre Country, in which traveile their clothes were worne, their bread mouldie, which they avowed to have bin warme for newnesse when they first set out; their barrels and bottels of wine broken; their shoes patcht; and their facks rent and ragged: Yet Josua having sworne unto them by Josus fem the the Lord God of Ifrael, he durft not, though urged by the multitude of the people, to 5.00 the 13.00. o lay violent hands on them; but he spared both their Lives, and the Cities of their in-

Now if ever man had warrant to breake Faith, and to retract his promise made, Josua had it. For first, the commandement which he received from God to roote out this Nation among the rest, preceded by farre the peace which he had granted them. Secondly, hemight justly have put these men to the sword, and have fackt their Cities, if there be any evafion from a promise made, whereof the living God is called to witnesse. For it was not to the Gibeonites he gave peace, because he knew them to be a people hared of God. He told them, that if they were of the Hevites, it was not in his power to make a Joseph league with them. But it was to a strange people that he gave faith, & to a Nation which came from farre, who hearing of the wonders which the God of Israel had done in Egypt and over Jordan, fought for peace and protection from his people. Thirdly, the Josephia. accord, which I frael made with these crasty Canaanites, was without warrant. For it is written in the same place. That the Ifraelites accepted their tale, that is, believed what they had faid, and counsailed not with the mouth of the Lord. Fourthly, these men who were knowne Idolaters, and served those Puppets of the Heathen, men of an Apish Refive of those 31. Kings (all which at length perished in that warre) joyned the ligion, as all Worshippers of Images are, could not challenge the witnesse of the true. God, in whom they beleeved not. I fay therefore, that if ever man might have served himselfe by any evasion or distinction, Josea might justly have done it. For he needed not inthis case the helpe of Aquivocation or Mentall Reservation. For what he sware, he fware in good Faith; but he fware nothing, nor made any promife at all to the Gibeonites. And yet, to the end that the faithleffe subtiltie of man should borrow nothing in the future from his example, who knowing well, that the promises he made in the name of God, were made to the living God, and not to the dying Man, he held them firme, and inviolable, notwithstanding that they, to whom he had sworne it, were worshippers

For it is not, as faithlesse mentakeit; that he which sweareth to a Man, to a Societie, of the Devill. to a State, or to a King, and sweareth by the name of the living Lord, and in his presence, That this promise (if it be broken) is broken to a man, to a Societie, to a State or to a lo Prince; but the promise in the name of God made, is broken to God. It is God that we therein neglect: we therein professe that we feare him not, and that we set him at naught, and defie him. If he that without Reservation of honour giveth a lie in the presence of the King, or of his Superiour, doth in point of Honour give the lie to the King himselfe, or to his Superiour; how much moredoth he breake Faith with God, that giveth Faithin the presence of God, promiseth in his name, and makes him a witnesse of the Covenant

Out of doubt, it is a fearefull thing for a Son to breake the Promise, Will, or Deed of made 🕏 the Father; for a State, or Kingdome, to breake those Contracts which have bin made in former times, and confirmed by publike fairh. For though it were 400. Yeares after to Josus, that Saul, even out of devotion, flaughtered some of those people descended of the Gibeonites: yet God, who forgat not what the Predecessors and Fore-fathers of Saul and the Ifraelises had fworne in his name, afflicted the whole Nation with a confin ming famine; and could not be appeafed, till feven of Sauls formes were delivered to the

And certainely, if it be permitted by the helpe of a ridiculous distinction, or by a Godmocking equivocation, to sweare one thing by the name of the living God, and to reserve in filence a contrary intent: the life o fman, the estates of men, the faith of Subjects to, Kings, of Servants to their Masters, of Vassals to their Lords, of Wives to their Huk bands, and of Children to their Parents, and of all trialls of right, will not only bemade uncertaine, but all the chaines whereby free men are tied in the world, be torne afunder. It is by oath (when Kings and Armies cannot passe) that we enter into the Cities of our enemies, and into their Armies: it is by oath that warres take end, which weapons carnot end. And what is it or ought it to be that makes an oath thus powerfull, butthis; That he that sweareth by the name of God, doth assure others that his words are true, s the Lord of all the World is true whom he calleth for a witnesse, and in whose present he that taketh the oath hath promised ? I am not ignorant of their poore evasions, which play with the severity of Gods commandements in this kinde: But this indeed is the best answer, That he breakes no faith, that hath none to breake. For who soever hath faith and the feare of God, dares not doe it.

The Christians in the Holy Land when they were at the greatest, and had brought the Caliph of Egypt to pay them tribute, did not onely lose it againe, but were soone after beaten out of the Holy Land it felfe: by reason (faith William of Tyre, a reverend Bishop which wrote that Storie) that Almerick the fiftieth King after Godfrey brake faith with the Caliph Elhadech, and his Vicegerent. The Soldan Sanar, who being fuddenly invaded by Almerick, drew in the Turke Sgracon to their aide : whose Nephew Seladine, after he had made Egypt his owne, beat the Christians out of the Holy Land; neither would the wooden Crosse (the very Crosse, say they, that Christ died on) give them victory over Seladine, when they brought it into the field as their last refuge, seeing they had for fworne themselves in his name, that was crucified thereon. And if it be a direction from the holy Ghost, That he that speaketh lies, shall be destroyed, and that the mouth which util. reth them, flaieth the foule: how much more perillous is it (if any perill be greater thanto destroy the soule) to sweare a lie . It was Eugenius the Pope, that perswaded, or rather commanded the King of Hungarie after his great victory over Amurath the Turke, and when the faid King had compelled him to peace, the most advantagious that ever wa made for the Christians, to breake his Faith, & to provoke the Turke to renew the warre And though the faid King was farre stronger in the field than ever; yet he lost the bas taile with 30000. Christians, and his owne life. But I will stay my hand: For this fin volume will not hold the repetition of Gods judgements upon faith-breakers; be it aounft Infidels, Turks, or Christians of divers Religions. Lamentable it is, that the taking of outles now-a-dayes, is rather made a matter of custome than of consciences

Ir is also very remarkeable, That it pleased God to leave so many Cities of the Canaanites unconquered by Ifrael, to fcourge and afflict them, by fore-feeing their Idolatrie. &, as it is faid in the scriptures, To be Thornes in their eyes to prove them, and to teach them to young. makeWarre. For these Cities hereaster named did not onely remaine in the Canaanites Judga & possessionall the time of Josua; but soone after his death the Children of Dan were bea- Judgs.vae tenout of the plaine Countries, and enfore't to inhabite the Mountaines, and places of hardest accesse. And those of Juda were not able to be Masters of their owne Vallies: hecause, as it is written in the Judges, The Canaanites had Charlots of Iron. And those Judge 1934. principall Cities which stood on the Sea-fide, adjoyning unto Juda, were still held by the Juda. v.19. remainder of the Anakims, or Philiftims: as Azzah, Gath, Afdod; out of one of which John vite. Cities came Goliath, remembred in Samuel.

Neither did the children of Manasse over Jordan expell the Geshurites, nor the Maachathites: which inhabited the North parts of Bafan, afterward Traconitis.

Nor the Nepthalims possesses themselves of Bethshemish, nor of Bethanah; but they infore those Canaanites to pay them tribute. Neither did Asher expell the Zidonians, nor Jossa, viza thore of Acho, or Acon, Athlab, Achzib, Heblah, Aphike, & Rehob, nor inforce them to Jud 1.931. tribute.

No more could Zabulon enjoy Kitron, and Nahalol, but received tribute from them. John 16. V. Lo. Allothe Canaanites dwelt in Gezer among the Ephraims: & among the children of Ma. ruffion the West of Jordan, the Ganaanites held Bethshean, Taacnach, Dor, Ibleam, and Jud.2.v.27, Megaddo; yea, Hierusalem it selse did the Jebusites defend above soure hundred yeares. eventill Davids time.

Now Tofua lived one hundred and ten yeares, eighteene of which he governed Ifrael, and then changed this life for a better. The time of his rule is not expressed in the Scriptures, whichcauseth divers to conjecture diversly of the continuance. Fosephus gives him five & twentie veares : Seder Ollam Rabbi the Authors of the Hebrew Chronologie eight and twentie; and Massius fixe and twentie: Maimonius cited by Massius, foureteene: Joannes Luidu, leventeene: Cajetanus ten: Eufebius giveth him feven & twentie: and fo doth S. Augustine: Melantthon, two and thirtie: Codoman, five and twentie. But whereas there palled 480. veares from the delivery of Ifraelout of Egypt, unto the building of the Temple, it is necessary that we allow to 70 fina only eighteene of them; as finding the rest suppliedotherwise, which to me seemes the most likely, & as I thinke, a well approved opinion.

The same necessity of retaining precisely 48 o. yeares from the departure out of Egypt unto the building of the Temple, convinceth of errour, fuch as have inferted yeares betweene Josua and Othoniel, of whom Eusebius findes eight yeares, to which Arius Mon- Euseb Prop. tonus adhereth; and for which he giveth his reason in his foure and twentieth and last Evang. Chapters upon Josua: Bunting reckons it nine yeares: Bucholzer and Reusner but one; Codomantwentie, and Nicephorus no leffe than three and thirtie: whereas following the fure direction of these 480. yeares, there can be no voide yeares found betweene Folia and Othoniel, unlesse they be taken out of those eighteene ascribed unto folia by the account already specified. The pray ses and acts of Josua are briefly written in the fixe and fortieth Chapter of Ecclesiasticus, where among many other things it is said of him, Who was there before him like to him, for he fought the battels of the Lord?

That he wrote the booke called by this name, it was the opinion of Arius Montanus, because it is said in the last Chapter, v. 26. And Josus wrote these words in the booke of the Law of God: which feemeth rather to have bin meant by the covenant which Folus made with Ifrael in Sichem, where they all promifed to ferve & obey the Lord which promife Jossa caused to be written in the booke of the Law: and of this opinion were Cajetan and Abulensis: Theodoret doth likewise conceive that the booke of fosua was collected out of an ancient Volume, intituled Liber Justorum, remembred by Josus himself; and others, that twas the worke of Samuel: for whereas Montanus groundeth his opinion upon these 1.10.133 words of the 26. verie, And Josua wrote these words, &c. this place hath nothing in it to Prove it : for when the people had answered fosus; The Lord our God will we ferve, and his s. lat. v. 14 v. 16 Togice will we obey, it followeth that Fosus made a covenant with the people, and wrote the lane in the booke of the Law of God.

There lived at once with Jofus, Ericthonius in Attica, who taught that Nation to yoke beafts together, thereby to till the ground with more ease & speed: And about the same time the fiftie Daughters of Danaus (as it is faid) flew the fiftie Sons of Agyptus, all but Lynceus, who succeeded Danaus, if the tale be true. There lived also with Jossa, Phanix,& Cadmus, and neere the end of Josua's life, Jupiter is faid to have ravished Europa the daughter of Phanix, (afterward married to Afterius King of Creta) & begat on her Minos, Rada. manthus, & Sarpedon. But S. Augustine reports this ravishment to be committed by X411. thus, & yet they are more commonly taken for the Sons of Jupiter. But it may be doubted whether Minos was father to Dencalion, and Dencalion to Idomeneus, who was an old man at the warre of Troy, and Sarpedon was in person a young or strong man at the same st Trojan warre. And so doth Neftor reckon up in the Councell of the Greekes, Thefeus and Perithous for men of Antiquitie, and of Ages past: Minos being yet more ancient than any of these.But hereof else-where.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Tribes of Israel, that were planted in the borders of Phanicia, with sundrie Stories depending upon those places.

The Proæme to the description of the whole Land of Canaan; with an Exposition of the name of Syria.

HE story of the Judges ought to follow that of Josus, after whom the Common-wealth of the Jewes was governed by Kings, of which so many of them as ruled the tenne Tribes, shall be remembred when we come the description of Samaria: but because the Land of Cunaan, and the borders thereof, were the Stages and Theaters, whereon the greatest part of the Story past, with that which followeth, hath bin acted, Ithinke it very pertinent (for the better understanding of both) to make a Geographical description of those Regions: that allthings therein performed by the places knowne, may the better be under Rood, and conceived. To which purpose (besides the addition of the Neighbour Countries) I have bestowed on every Tribe his proper portion: and doe shew what Cities and Places of strength were by the Jewes obtained: and what numbers it planfed God to leave unconquered; by whom he might correct and scourge them, when ungratefull for his many graces, they at fundry times forgat or neglected the Lord of all power, and adored those deafe and dead Idols of the Heathen. Divina bonitas (saith Augustine) ideo maxime irascitur in hoc seculo, ne irascatur in futuro: O misericorditer temporalem adhibet severitatem, ne aternam juste inferat ultionem; The Divine goodnesse is especially therefore angry in this world, that it may not be angry in the world to come, and doth mercifully use temporall severity, that it may not justly bring upon us eternall vengeance.

To the Cities herein described, I have added a short Story of the beginnings and ends of divers Kingdomes and Common-weales: and to helpe my felfe herein, I have perifed divers of the best Authors upon this subject : among whom, because I finde so great disgreement in many particulars, I have rather in fuch cases adventured to follow mine owne reason, than to borrow any one of their old patternes.

And because Canaan, with Palestina of the Philistims, and the Lands of og and Schon Kings of Basan, and the Arabian Amorites, were but small Provinces of Syria: it shall be necessarie, first to divide and bound the generall, and so to descend to this particular, now called the holy Land.

imbraced all those Regions from the Euxine Sea, to the Red Sea and therefore were the lead Sea to the Mediterran, But in Deuteronomie it seemeth to be far more large: For Cappadocians, which look into Pontus, called Leucofyrians or white Syrians. But taking horter, and from the coast of Cilicia; which is the North border, unto Idumæa towards the South, Tigris towards the Sunne rifing, and the Mediterran Sea Westward: it then containethbe fides Babylonia, Chaldæa, Arabia the Defart, & Arabia Petræa, that Region also which the Greekes call Mesopotamia, the Hebrewes Syria, of the two Rivers, to wit. Tigris and Euplirates, for fo Aran Nahairajim is expounded: also Padan Aram : than is Jugum syria, because the two Rivers goe along in it as it were in a voke.

Edeffa, fometime Rages, now Rage, was the Metropolis of this Region of Syria. In Sv- Aurogalian ria taken largely, there were many finall Provinces, as Coelofyria, which the Latines call Syria Cava, because it lay in that fruitfull Valley betweene the Mountaines of Lybanus and Antylibanus, in which the famous Cities of Antioch, Laodicea, Apamea, with many others, were feated. Then Damascena, or Syria Lybanica, taking name of the Citie Damascus, and the Mountaines of Lybanus, the Regall seate of the Adades, the first Kings I Kara of Syria Adjoyning to it was the Province of Sophene, or Syria Soba, Choba, or Zobal: overwhich Adade Zer commanded in Salomons time. Then Phanicia and the people Sy-lim Dio 1,127 raphomicies: & lastly Syria Palæstina bordering Egypt: of which Ptolomie maketh Tildradioa part: and to that Province which Moses calleth Seir and Edom, Pomponius Prolationalist Melagiveth the name of Syria Judæa.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan, and of the promises touching this Land-

Dut that Land which was anciently Canaan, taketh a part of Phanicia, and street Beheth from behinde Lybanus to the great Defarts betweene Idumaa and Egypt of bounded by the Mid-land Sea on the West, & the Mountaines of Hermon, Galaad and Arnon towards the East: the same Hils which Strabo calleth Traconi or Traconita, Strables and Piolomic Hippus. The name of Canaan it had from Canaan the fonne of Cham, & lingua appellata fuit Canaan: The language was also called Canaan, saith Montanus: and after Hebres of the Hebrewes: who tooke name from Heber, the sonne of Sale, according to cattle see Saint Augustine: But Arias Montanus not so well allowing of this derivation, makes in common name to all those of Noahs Sonnes, which past over Euphrates towards the West Sea. For the word Heber, faith he, is as much as transfens or transmittens, of going or Ming over. And because the children of Abraham had for a long time no certain abiding: therefore, as he thinkes, they were by the Egyptians called Hebrai, as it were passengers, which is also the opinion of C. Sigonius, and of Eusebius long before them both. It had Euseb. Prop. allothename of Tudaa from Tuda; and then afterwards intituled the holy Land, because Evang Line 32 thereinour Saviour Christ was borne and buried. Now this part of Syria was againe divided into foure; namely, into Edom, (otherwise Sier, or Edumaa) Galilee, Samaria, and Judea. Galilee is double, the superior called Gentium, and the inferiour: and that Matthe? Galilee and Judaa are diftinguissicd, it is plaine in the Evangelists, though both of them Lukea. belong to Phanicia.

Now befides these Provinces of Phanicia, and Palastina (both which the River of Fordan boundeth; faving that Phanicia stretchetha little more Easterly towards Damasthat part also to the East of Fordan, and within the Mountaines of Hermon, Gilead, & Arnon, otherwise Traconi, fell to the possession of halfe Manasse, Gad, and Reuben, and therefore are accounted a part of Canaan also: as well because anciently possess by the Amorites; as for that they were conquered and enjoyed by the Ifraelites; which Eastermost Parts are againe divided into Basan or Batanea, into Gilead, Moab, Midian, Ammon, and the territories of the Machati, Gessuri, Argobe, Hus. They are knowne to the later Cosmographers by the name of Arabia in generall: and by the names of Traconitis, Pieria, Batanea, &c. of which I will speake in their proper places.

But where Moles describeth the Land of Canaan in the tenth of Genesis, he maketh no mention of the later Provinces, which fell to Manasse, Gad, and Reuben, for these be his Words. Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon, as thou commest to Gerar untill Mah (which is Gaza) and this was the length of the Countrey North and South: then followethin the Text: And as thou goeft unto Sodome and Gomorah, and Admah, and Syria, now Soria, according to the largest description, and as it was anciently taken thoism, even unto Lasha: by which words Moses setteth downe the breadth, to wit, from is therein written . All the places whereon the foale of your feet shall tread, shall be yours . Dett. 11.48

gour coast shall be from the wildernesse, and from Libanon, and from the River Perah, unto the uttermost Sea. Now for the length of the Countrie North and South, this description agreeth with the former : only Libanon is put for Zidon: and the Wildernesse for Gerar & AZZah, which make no difference: but for the breadth and extent East and West, if Pe. rah be taken for Euphrates: then the Land promised stretchethit selfe both over Arabia Refraa, and the Defart, as far as the border of Babylon: which the Ifraelites never posses. nor at any time did so much as invade or attempt. And therefore Vadianus doth conceive that by the River Perah, was meant Jordan, and not Euphrates : taking light from this place of Tolua: Behold. I have divided unto you by lot thefe Nations, that remaine to be an inheritance according to your Tribes: from fordan with all the Nations that I have destroyed even. unto the great Sea Westward.

And though it be true that David greatly enlarged the Territorie of the Holy Land ver as Vadianus well noteth, if Perab in the former place be taken for Euphrates, then was ir pur per gentes in amicitiam receptas. For David did not at any time enter fo farre to the Fast as Asseria, or Babylonia. Neither doth the not possessing of all these Countries give advantage to those that would make any irreligious cavill, as touching the promise of God to the Ifraelites unperformed: For when both their Kings, Magistrates, and People, tell from his worship and service, it pleased him not only to inclose them within that Territorie, which was for fo many people exceeding narrow; but therein and elsewhere to subject them unto those Idolatrous Nations, whose false and foolish gods themselves, also served and obeyed. And fure the promise by which the Hebrewes claimed the inheritance of Canaan, and the lasting injoying thereof, to wit, as long as the heavens were a. bove the earth, was tied to those conditions, both in the Verses preceding, and subsequent which the Israelites never performed. And therefore they could not hope for other than all mankinde could or can expect; who knew that all forts of comforts from the merci full goodnesse of God looked for, as well in this life as after it, are no longer to beatter ded, than while we persevere in his love, service, and obedience. So in the eight Verself the eleventh of Deuteronomy, the keeping of Gods Commandements was a condition joyned to the prosperity of Israel. For therein it is written , Therefore shall yee keepealthe Commandements which I command you this day: that ye may be strong, and go in, and possifi the Land, whither ye goe to possesse it. Also that you may prolong your dayes in the Landwhile the Lord (ware unto your Fathers &c.

The like condition was also annexed to the enjoying of the Land conquered, and the possession thereof so long as the heavens were above the earth. For if yee keepe diligently, faith he, all these commandements, which I command you to doe, that is to love the Lordyer God, &c, then will the Lord cast out all these Nations before you, and yee shall possesse great Nations of mightier than you. And here, though it bernanifest, that by reason of the breachos Gods Commandements, and their falling away from the worthip of his all-powerfull Ma jestie, to the Idelatry of the Heathen, the conditionall promises of God were absolutely void, as depending upon obedience unperformed vet I cannot millike that exposition of Melantthon: For, faith he, O stendit promissionem pracipuam non esse de hoc Politico regno; ht sheweth that his chiefe promise is not of a civill Kingdome. To which agrees that answer which S. Hierome made to a certain Heretique in his Epistle ad Dardanum, who accused S. Hierome that he overthrew the reputation of the Jewes Story, & brought the truth thereof in question, by drawing it altogether into an Allegorie, & adillam duntaxat viventium terram que in calis est; (that is)Only to that Land of the living which is in Heaven. 91ml amtota Judaorum Regio adeo angusta set ambitu ut vix longitudinem habeat 160 milliani um latitudinem verò 40.6 in his etiam regiones loca urbes & oppida (unt plurima, nunquam à Judeis occupata sed tantum divina pollicitatione promissa; Because the whole Country the Jewes is so narrow in compasse, that it scarce hath 160.miles in length, and 40. mil in breadth, and in these are Countries, places, Cities, & many Townes, which the Jewes never possest, but were onely granted by divine promise. In like manner the same Father speaket upon Esay, touching the bleffings promifed unto Hierusalem: where he hath these word De quo discimus Hierusalem nequaquam in Palastina Regione petendam, quatotius Provin cia deterrima est: & saxosis montibus asperatur, & penuriam patitur sitis itaut calestibu utatur pluviis, & raritatem fontium cifternarum extructione foletur: fedin Dei manibus, 16 quam dicitur, festinaverunt structores tui; From whence, saith he, we learne, that Hierusalems not to be fought in that region of Palestina, which is the worst of the whole Province, Grass with craggie Mountaines, and suffereth the penurie of thirst: so as it preserveth raine water. and suppliet the scarcitie of Well's by building of Cisternes; best this Hierusalem is in Gods hands, to which it is faid, Thy builders have hastened: fo far S. Hierome; where also to prevent mistaking, he thus expoundeth himselfe. Neg; hoc dico in suggillationem terra Judaa. at hereticus Sycophanta mentitur: aut quo auferam bistoria veritatem, qua fundamentum est intelligentia spiritualis: fed ut decutiam supercilium Judeorum, qui Synagoge angustias Latitudini Ecclesia praferunt. Si enim occidentem tantum sequantur literam, & non spiritum vivisicantem, ostendant terram promissionis latte & melle manantem; Neither (faith hee) Cay I this to disgrace the land of Judaa (as the heretical Sycophant doth belie me) or totake awas the truth of the Historie, which is the foundation of piritual under standing : but to beate downethepride of the Jewes, which enlarge the straits of the Synagogue farther than the breadth of the Church: for if they follow onely the killing letter, and not the quickening first, let them show the Land of promise, flowing with milke and honey.

By this it may also be gathered, how soever it be unlikely (feeing the West-bound in the place, Deut. 11.24. had his truth in the literall fense, that Euphrates or Perath, which as made the East-bound, should be taken onely in a spiritual sense) yet neverthelesse that Hieroms opinion inclineth to this, as if this Perath were not to be understood for Euphratu, and that the promise it selfe was never so large: much lesse the plantation and conquestof Ifrael. And now for a more particular description of this Holy Land, because Alber News talim, and Zabulon, held the Northermost part, and were feated in Phanicia, I will begin with these three, taking Alber for the first: of which Tribe yet before I speake, I must admonish the Reader touching the names of places in this, and the other Tribes to be mentioned, that he remember that many names by reason of the divers fancies of Tranflaois, are diverfly expressed, so that to the unskilfull they may seeme divers, when they areone and the fame: the reason of this diversitie (as by those learned in the Hebrew I and taught)is, partly because the ancient Editions of the Hebrew want vowels, the old Translators imagined other vowels than now the Hebrew Editions have; and partly becausethe Ancient expressed or omitted divers consonants, otherwise than the latter doe thinke fit.

THE TRIBE OF ASHER

The bounds of the Tribe of Asher.

The Asherites descended of Asher the Sonne of Jacob by Zelpha, the handmaid of Lea, were increased while they abode in Egypt, to the number of 41500 and odde persons, all men above twenty yeares of age, and able to beare armes, at the time when they were mustered by Moses at Mount Sinai: all which number perishing in the Desarts, there remained of their issues, besides women and children, 5 3400. bodies fit for the warres: which past the River of Arnon, into the Plaines of Moab, and after the Conquest of Canaan, had for their portion that part of Phenicia, from Zidon and the fields of Libanus, unto Ptolomais Acon alongst the Seacoast: containing thirtie English miles, or thereabout: and from the Mid-land sea to the East border some twelve miles: though Antoninus makes it somewhat larger. This dutating part of Canaan was very fruitfull, abounding in Wine, Oyle, and Wheate, befides the Ballamum, with other pleasant and profitable commodities: according to that Prophecie, Affer pinguis panis: Concerning Affer, his bread shall be fat: And he shall give plealares for a King.

Zidon is seated on the very wash of the Phoenician Sea, which is a part of the Mediter. ran or Mid-land Sea. It hath to the North the Citie of Berythus, and the River Leonisand to the South Sarepta, or Sarphat, which standeth betweene it and Tyre: the distance Paleft Seigf. 19. Strabol. 16 faith Seiglerus: but Vadianus makes it two hundred furlongs, and fo doth Weissinburie in his description of the holy Land, and both from Strabo: which two hundred furlows make five & twentie miles. This difference of distance as well between these two known Cities, as all the rest, make it over-difficult to devise any new scale to the Mappe and description of the holy Land.

What Kings it had till Agenors time there is no memorie : the flory which Zeno the Philosopher, who was a Zidonian, wrote thereof, being by time confumed and lost. It feemeth to be more ancient than Tyre; which was also built by the Zidonians. For as Strabo noteth, Homer speaking of Zidon, neglecteth the memorie of Tyre, because it was but a member of Zidon; and a City subject to the Kings thereof: though it be true thain after-times it contended with Zidon for Primacie, and became farre more renowned opulent, and ftrong: From Zidon had Salomon and Zorobabel their principall workening * It feemes that both in Timber and Stone, for the building of the Temple. They were in Religion Idolaters (as the rest of the Canaanites) worshippers of Bull other necessary and Aftareth. which Idols though common to the other of the issue of Canaan (as Pinelli gathers out of 1.8am.31.10.and Judg.10.6.) yet especially and peculiarly were account ted the Gods of the Zidonians: as appeares I Kings 11.5. in the ftory of Salomons Idolatrie: where Aftaroth is called the God of the Zidonians : and 1. Reg. 16.33. in the flory of Achab, the chiefe worshipper of Baal, where it is said that he marrying feldel the Daughter of the King of the Zidonians, worshipped their Baal. Divers Baals and divers Afteroths in their Idolatries they acknowledged: as it appeares by the plurall names of Ba tohavebecne a alim & Aftaroth, 1 Sam. 12.10. & elsewhere: for even the name Aftaroth, as I am informed theep for Deut. by a skilfull Hebritian, is plurall : the fingular being Aftoreth: whence Judg. 2. 13.th Septuagint reade enargeurau rais asagraus: They worthipped the Aftarties. The occasion ofth their multiplying of their Baals, & Aftoreths, may be diverfly understood: either in resp of the diversitie of the formes of the Images, or of the worship in divers places, or of the firme Augustins stories depending upon them: which (as fables use to be) were doubtlesse in divers Citts divers. Augustine quest. 19. in Judg. thinkes Baal and Astarte to be Jupiter and Juno. the Garthaginians (which were Tyrians) call Juno by fuch a name as Aftarte. Tullie, 3. de Nat. Deorum, making divers Goddesses of the name of Venus, expounds the found to be Astarie: whom he makes to be borne of Tyrus and Syria, and to have bed the Wife of Adonis : as alfo Macrob. 2. Saturn. cap. 21, faics that Adonis was with g veneration commonly worshipped of the Assyrians: and Hierome upon Ezek. 8.44. nores that Thairmou (whom there the Idolatrous women are noted to bewaile) is the name of Adonis among the Syrians. So that it may feeme that in the worship of Alarte or Venus. they did bewaile her Husband Adonis: as also the Gracians did in their songs of Adonis: Mourne for Adonis the faire, dead is Adonis the faire. Howbeit others in that place of E- exalero ward Zekiel not without good probability, expound the mourning for Thammuz, to be the Adams. mourning for Ofiris in the facrifice of Is: whose losse of her Husband Ofiris, was as famous in the Egyptian Idolatrie, as with the Grecians, Venus loffe of Adonis. And to this agreeththat which Plutarch hath, de Iside & Ofiride, that Ofiris with the Egyptians is called o Ammu?: which word may feeme to be the fame with Ezekiels Thammu?. But howfoever these Zidonians were thus anciently fostered with the Milke of Idolatry : yet they were more apt to receive the Doctrine of the Gospell of Christ after his Ascension, than the Tewes: who had bintaught by Moses & the Prophets so many yeares, whereof our Saviour in Matthew and Luke: Woe beto thee CoraZin, &c. for if the great workes which were done in Matt. visto thee had beene done in Tyrus and Zidon, they had repented long agone, &c. but I fay unto you. it hall be easier for Tyrus and Zidon, at the day of Judgement, than for you.

It received a Christian Bishop with the first: who was afterward of the Diocesse of Twe. But in the yeare of our Redemption 636 it fell into the hands of the Saracens, and communed in their possession till Baldwinus the first, then King of Hierusalem: in the yeare Tyr, IZ-Relli, III by the helpe of the Danes and Norwaies, who came with a Fleet to visite the holy Sacrit. Land, and tooke Port at Joppa, it was againe recovered, the commandement thereof being Viriacia. 27) givento Eustace Gremer, a Noble man of that Countrey. And againe in the yeare 1250. it was reedified and strengthened by Lodowicke the French King: while he spent source general the Warre of the holy Land. Laftly, in the yeare 1289 it was reconquered by Niger Polleting

Of Sarepta with a briefe History of Tyre in the same Coast.

Arepta, or after the Hebrew, Sarphath, is the next City Southward from Zidon, betweene it and the River called Naar, or Fons hortorum Libani (of which more hereafter) standing in the way towards Tyre, a City very famous for the excellent wine growing neere it: of which Sidonius:

> Vina mihi non sunt Gazetica, Chia, Falerna, 2 maq: Sareptano palmite mi fa bibas.

I have no wine of Gaza, nor Falerna wine Nor any for the drinking of Sarepta's vines

This City had also a Bishop, of the Diocesse of Tyre: after it came to the Saracens and Turkes, as the rest : and is now called Saphet, faith Postellus.

Notfarre from Sarepta was fituate that fometime famous City of Tyre, whose flectes of shippes commanded, and gave the law over all the Mediterran Sea, and the borders thereof: during which time of greatnesseand power, the Tyrians erected Utica, Leptis, & Carthage in Africa, of which Virgil. Urbs antiqua fuit, Tyris tenuere Coloni, Carthago. And Virgil. U.S. Caribage was therefore called Punica quasi Phænicum, a Colonie of the Phænicians. For strength and for the commodity of the harbour, and the better to receive Trade from all places, it was in this new erection founded in an Iland, 700. paces from the continent; and therefore Ezekiel placeth it in the middest of the Sea, as some reade, or asothers, in the inner-most part of the Sea, whence he called it situate at the entry of the Sea, as also the same Prophet calleth it the Mart of the people for many Iles: and Esay, a Mart of the Nations: and fo Proud, Wealthy, and Magnificent was this City, as the Prophet Efay calleth the Merchants thereof Princes, and their Chapmen the Nobles of the World.

It excelled both in learning, and in manu-facture: especially in the making and dying 19 of Purple, and Scarlet-cloth: which, faith Julius Pollers, was first found out by Herceles Dogge, who passing along the Sea-coast, and eating of the Fish Conchilis or Purpura, the haire of his lippes became of that colour. It worshipped the Idols that Zidon did: faving that Hercules became their Patron in after-times. For Alexander Macedon, when the Tyrians presented him with a Crowne of gold, and other gifts, desiring to remain his friends and allies, answered them, that he had vowed a facrifice to Hercules, the Defender of their City, and the Ancester of the Macedonians Kings: and must therefore enter it. Whereuponthey fenthim word, that Hercules his Temple was in the Mountaine of old Tyre: where he might performe that ceremony . But this availed not: For Alexander was not fo superstitious, as ambitious; he defired to enter the Towne, which being denied, he as one whom no perill could feare, nor labour weary, gathered together as many ships as he could, and brought from Libanus fo great a number of Cedars, and fo many weighty stones from the old City of Tyre adjoyning, as notwithstanding that his materials were often washt away with the strength of the Sea and the Tydes, yet he never rested, till he had made a foote passage from the Continent to the Iland: and having once approached their Walls, he over-topt them with Turrets of wood, and other frames: from whence (having filled the body of force with the violent moving spirit of resolution) he became Lord thereof, putting all to the Sword that refifted; after which, he caused 2000. more to be hung up in a ranke all alongst the Sea-shore: which execution upon cold blood he performed (as some Authours affirme) upon the issues of those slaves which had somer to ly flaine all their Masters, taking their Wives, Children, Riches and power of Governe-Josephant Ju- ment to themselves. This victory of Alexander over the Tyrians, Josephus remembreth: and how Sanaballat revolted from Darius, and came to Alexander with 8000, Souldiers: who was the last Satrapa or Provinciall Governour, which Darius seated in Samaria: the fame who having married his Daughter to Manasse, brother to Paddas the high Priest of Hierusalem, obtained of Alexander that a Temple might be built on the Mountaine G4. riZim over Samaria: that the forces of the Jewes being divided, Alexander might the better hold them in obedience. The honour of which Priesthood he bestowed on his some in law Manasse, whom the Jewes oppugned, for that he had married out of their Tribes, and with a Gentile: but while Alexander befieged Gaza, Sanaballat, whom Guil. called Sanabula, died. Long before this defolation of Tyre by the cruelty of Alexander, it was attempted by Salmanaffer the Affrian King: when the growing pride of the Affrians, after that they had conquered the ten Tribes, with the rest of Syria, became envious of the beauty riches, and power of that City. He befieged it both on the Land-fide, and with threefort shippes of Warre held the Port to the end that neither any victuals nor any supply of men might enter it : but the Tyrians with twelve faile scattered that fleet, and took 500 prisoners of the Asyrians: notwithstanding, the Asyrian continued his resolution, and lay before it by his Lievtenants five yeares, but with ill fucceffe. And this fiege Menander E_ Er cont. AD. 13 before it by Josephus, made report of in his Chronicles, as he found the Story among de Bell Sacre the Annalls of the Tyrians (which the faid Menander converted into Greeke) adding, that 13.4. Joseph the Annual Tyrius called Helifans, was then King of Tyre, having governed the fame Antibo grapa fixe and twenty yeares. Soon after this repulse of Salmana far, and about 200, yeares beforethe victory of Alexander, Nabuchodonofor, at fuch time as he destroyed Hierusalems with the Temple, came before this City: who indeed gave to Alexander the example of that despairefull worke, of joyning it to the Continent. For Nabuchodonofor had for merly done it: though by the diligence of the Cirizens, and the strength of the Sea. the

Against Nabuchodonofor, for many yeares, the Tyrians defended themselves: for so Ezeron & long did those Babylonians continue before it, As every head was made bald, & every [hout- Itaia] &c dermade bare; faith Ezekiel, who with the Prophet Efay had manifeftly foretold the defruction of this proud place. In the end and after thirteene yeares fiege or more the Tyrians despoiled of all their hopes, and remembring over-late the predictions and threatnings of Gods Prophets, having prepared a convenient number of shippes, abandoned their City, transporting with themselves the ablest of all that remained, and with their wives, children, and portable riches, fay led thence into Cyprus, Carthage, and other Maritimate Cities of their Tributaries, or Confederates: fo as the Babylonians finding nothing therein, either to fatisfie fo many labours and perils for any person upon whom to avenge themselves for the losse of so many bodies in that Warre: It pleased God in recompence thereof (who strengthened this resolution, as in a worke of his owne) to make Nabucho- Exik, 29,150 dowler victorious over the Experians: and gave him that Kingdome and the spoile thereof sit were, in wages for his Army. Whereupon Saint Hierome noteth, that Godleaverh not the good deeds of the Heathen unrewarded. who though they cannot hope by any laudable worldly action, to attaine unto that eternall happineffe referved for his Servants and Saints: yet fuch is the boundleffe goodneffe of Godas he often repayeth them with many worldly gifts and temporall bleffings.

Now of this enterprise of Nabuchodonofors against Tyre, prophane Historians have Tolepaniera onot bin filent. For both Diocles, and Philostratus (as fosephus citeth them) the one in his cit.

fecond Booke, the other in his Phanician Histories, remember it.

After these two great Vastations by the Kings of Babylon and Macedon, this Citie of Tyre, repaired and recovered it felfe againe: & continued in great glory about 300. years. evento the comming of our Saviour Christ: and after him flourished in the Christian Faith neere 600 yeares: the Archbilhop whereof gave place to none but to the Patriarke of Hierufalem onely, who within his owne Diocesse had foureteene great Cities, with their Bi-Thopsand fuffragans: namely Caipha, otherwise Porphiria, Acon, or Ptolomais, Sarepta, Zi-Guilty, bel. don, Casarea Philippi, Berytus, Byblus, Botrys, Tripolis, Orthosia, Archis, Aradus, Antaradus sac. (or Tortofa) and Maraelea. But in the yeere 636 it was with the rest of that beautifull Region of Phanicia and Palestina, subjected to the cruell and faithlesse Saracen: under the burthen and yoke of whose tyranny it suffered, with the other Palestine Cities, 488. yeares.

Inthe yeare 1112 it was attempted by Baldwine King of Hierufalem; but in vaine : yet Guil Tritts in the yeare 1124. by Guaremonde, Patriarke of Hierusalem, Vicegerent to Baldwine Bettlarite the fecond, with the affiftance of the Venetians, and their fleete of Gallies, it was againe recovered, and subjected to the Kings of Hierusalem, and so it remained 165. yeares.

Finally, in the yeare 1189. Saladine having first taken Hierufalem, removed his whole Army, and fate downe before Tyre: drawing his fleete of shippes and Gallies from Alexandria into the Port, this City as then onely remaining in the Christian power.

The Citizens finding themselves reduced into great famine, and many other miseles, they at once with certaine rafters of timber, fiered, burnt, and brake the Saracens leete, and fally edout refolvedly upon his Army, flew fo great numbers of them, and followed their victory with fuch fury as that the Saracens for laking their Trenches and Tents, removed in great disorder and dishonour. Two yeares after which victory the ody of that famous Fredericke Barbaroffa (who by the lamentable accident of following the Christians enemies over a River unfoordable, perished by the weight of his armour therein) was brought and interred in the Cathedrall Church of Tyre, neere unto that glolous Sepulchre of origen, garnished and graven with guilt pillars of Marble, 940. yeares

For the beauty and strength of this City, this Alexander made it his regall seate; two parts of the same being invironed by the Sea, and the port for safety and capacity not inferiour to any other in all that Tract. This Citie is distant from Hierusalem some some and thirty miles: foure miles to the North from the Mountaine Carmel, and as much to the South from Castrum Lansberti: from Tyre, Antonius maketh it two and thirty Italian miles. In the middest of the City there was a Tower of great strength, sometime the Temple of Bel-Zebub: and therefore called the Castle of Flies, on the top whereof there was maintained a perpetual light, like unto that called Pharus in Egypt: to give comfort in the night to those shippes, which came neere and sought that part. It had in it a Bilhops Gry bell fact. feate, of the Diocesse of Tyre, after in became Christian: but in the yeare 636. (a stail yeare to the Christians in those parts) it was forced and taken by Haomarus, the Saraca, factitite of the first, by the helpe of the Gallis of a.cap.z. & alibi. Genoa: to whom a third of the revenew was given in recompence. Againe, in the year of our Lord God, one thousand one hundred fourescore & seven, Saladine King of Egypt and Syria, became Lord thereof. In the years of Christ, one thousand one hundred ninety and one, by Richard King of England, and Philip King of France, it was repossed and redelivered to the Christians. Lastly, in the yeare 1291 it was by the fury of the Saracens befieged with an Army of 150000 entred, fackt, and utterly demolished though in some fort afterward reedified, and it is now Turkish.

Of the place & memory of his death. See Chap.g.S.I.

Tive miles from Ptolomais towards the East, is the Castle of Saint George stated in which he was borne: the Valley adjoyning bearing the fame name. And though for s the credit of Saint Georges killing the Dragon, I leave every man to his own beliefe yet I cannot but think, that if the Kings of England had not fome probable record of that his memorable act, among many others: it was strange that the Order full of Honour, which Edward the third founded, and which his Successours royally have continued should have borne his name, seeing the World had not that scarcity of Saints in those dayes, as that the English were driven to make such an erection upon a fable, or personal ned. The place is described by Adrichemius in his description of Assertio have beene in the fieldes of Libanus, betweene the River Adonis, and Zidon: his owne words and thefe:

these: Hoc loco qui ab incolis Cappadocia appellatur, non longe à Beryto, memorant inclytum thete: Militem D. Georgium, Regis filiam ab immanissimo Dracone asservasse : eamq; Christi Destia parenti restituisse. In cujus rei memoriam Ecclesia postmodum suit adissicata : macrain of position by the Inhabitants is called Cappadocia, not far from Berytus, men fay that the famous Knight of Christ, Saint George, did resource the Kings Daughter from a huge Dras ane James to having killed the beaft, delivered the Virgin to her Parent In memory of which deed gon: & having killed the beaft, delivered the Virgin to her Parent In memory of which deed a Churchwas after built there: Thus farre Adrichomius. His Authours he citeth Lodowicus Roman, Patric. Navigationum 1.1.6.3 and Bridenbach Itin. 5. The Valley under this Castle fometime called Affer, was afterward called the Valley of Saint George. If this authority soffice not, we may rather make the Story allegoricall, figuring the victory of Christ, than except of George the Arrian Bishop, mentioned by Am. Marcellinus.

Of Acziba, Sandalium, and others.

D Etweene Ptolomais & Tyre alongst the Seacoast, was the strong City of Acziba, or Achazib, which S. Hierome called Achziph, and Josephus Ecdippos, Plinie Ecdippa, Done of those which defended it selfe against the Asserites. Belforrest findes Acziba and Sandalium, or the Castle of Alexander to be one, but I know not whence he had ir. The twelve fearchers of the Land which Mofes fent from Cadesbarne, travailed as far Hieraride Local 10th North as Roob, or Rechob, in the Tribe of Affer, which Rechob, as also Berothæ, Fol Bell Fud, which by Ezekiel cap.47. verfe 16. is placed in these North borders, belonged in Davids 1.1.c.11. time to the King Hadarhezer, as it may be gathered out of the second of Samuel the 8. Plin 15 6.19 chap and 8. verse, and cap. 10. verse 6. and it defended it selfe against the Assertes, as Zidon Tyre, Achziph, Ptolomais, Alab, Helbah, and Aphek did.

This Aphek it was, whose wall falling downe, slew seven and twenty thousand of Benbudges Souldiers, after that a hundred thousand had bin flaughtered by the Israelites, undertheconduct of Ahab. Here Junius findes that the Philistims encamped a little before the harraile at Gilboa, though in his note upon the first of Samuel, the g, and I he takes Applekthere mentioned (at which battaile the Arke was taken) to have bin in Juda. Where others convert it, Percutiens Syros in Aphek.

The next place along it the coast is Sandalium, first called Schandalium of Schander. which we call Alexander, for Alexander Macedon built it when he befreged Tyre : and fer it mapoint of Land which extendeth it selfe into the Sea, betweene Acziba and Tyre: which Castle Baldwine the first rebuilt and fortified; in the yeare of Christ 1157. when he undertooke the recovery of Tyre.

Not much above a mile from this Castle, there ariseth that most plentifull Spring of water, which Salemon remembreth, called the Well of living Waters: from whence not canada only all the fields and plaines about Tyre are made fruitful by large pipes hence drawn: but the same Spring, which hathnot above a bow-shot of ground to travaile till it recover the Sea, driveth fixe great Milles in that short passage, saith Brochard.

Withinthe Land, and to the East of Acziba, and Sandalium, standeth Hosa: and beyond Tollies it, under the Mountaines of Tyre, the City of Achfaph, or Axab, or after Saine Hierome, Acifap, a City of great strength, whose King amongst the rest was slaine by Josua, at the waters of Merom.

†. V I I. of Thoron Gifcala, and some other places.

Arther into the Land towards Jordan, was seated the Castle of Thoron, which Hugo de Santto Abdemare built on the Easter-most Hils of Tyre, in the yeare 1107. thereby to restraine the excutsions of the Saracens, while they held Tyre against the Christians: the place adjoyning being very fruitful, & exceeding pleafant. From this Castle the Lords of Thoron, famous in the Story of the Warres for the recovery of the Holy Land, derive their names, and take their Nobility. It had in it a curious Chappell, dedicated to the bleffed Virgin, in which Humfrey of Thoron, Constable to Baldwine the 3. King of Hierualem, lyeth buried: There were five Castles besides this within the Teritory of Asser: Continuationis

Towards the South from Roob they place Gabala (which Herod furnamed the Afcalonite rebuilt) making it of the Territory of Chabol, Quod Syrorum lingua dispicere significat (faith Weishenburg) fo called, because Hiram of Tyre was ill pleased with those twenty Cities, seated hereabout, which Salomon presented unto him in recompence of those provisions sent him for the building of the Temple. Others think this Chabol (or Cabul)con. 1 taining a circuit of those twenty Cities given to Hiram, to have beene without the compasse of the holy Land, though bordering Asher on the North side : as it is said, 1 Mg.g. 11. That they were in Regione limitis: that is, in limite Regionis, in the border of the comtrey: for it was not lawfull, fay they, to give to strangers any part of the possessions allotted to the Israelites howsoever, that after Hiram had refused them, they were people by the Ifraelites, it appeares, 2 Chron. 8.14. And it seemes they were conquered by David from the Syri Rechobea, whose City Roob, or Rechob, was in these parts.

Almost of equal distance from the Castle of Thoron, they place the Cities of Giscala, and Gadara: of which Gadara is rather to be placed over Jordan: Gifcala was madela mous by John the fon of Levi, who from a meane estate gathering together foure hundred Theeves, greatly troubled all the upper Galilee, at fuch time as the Romans attempted the conquest of Judæa: by whose practice Josephus, who then commanded in the upper Galilee, was greatly indangered: whereof himselfe hath written at large, in hissend Booke of those Warres. This John berraying in all he could the City of Giscala (where he was native) to the Roman State: and finding a refistance in the City, gave opportunity, during the contention, to the Tyrians and Gadarims, to surprize it: who at the same me fore't it, and burnt it to the ground: but being by Josephus authority rebuilt, it was afterward rendred to Titus by composition. They finde also the Cities of Cana Major, and Cades, or Cadessa) of the first was that syro-phanician, whose Daughter Christdell vered of the evill Spirit. Neere the other, they fay, it was that Jonathas Machabans over threw the Army of Demetrius.

There are besides these forenamed Cities within the Tribe of Assert divers others: ason the South border, and neere the Sea, Mefall or Misheall: within the Land Befara, Bethdagon, & Bethemec, standing on the South border betweene Asher and Zabulon:on the North fide joyning to Syro-phœnicia, is the City of Hethalon, or Chethlon, theumoft of the holy Land that way : under which towards the Sea is Chali, and then Enoch supposed to be built by Cain, & named of his son Enoch, but without probability, as I have formerly proved. There are others also besides these, as Ammon or Chammon, of which Jos. 19.28. where also we reade of Nehiel, Rama, Alamelec, & Beton: the Cities of Al cath, or Chelcath, Habdon, and Rechob, and Misheal, which we have already mentioned were by the Afferites given to the Levites. Of others held by the Canaanites, mention is made, Judges 1.30. to which out of Josua we may adde Ebron, Amhad, and others, @ which no ftory dependeth; and therefore I will not pefter the description with them.

He Rivers to the North of Affer, are Adonis, afterward Canis, to which Ziegler joyneth Lycus; Ptolomy, Leontis: both which fall into the Sea neere Berytus: which River of Leontis, Montanus drawes neere unto Zidon: finding his head not with Afre Tab. 43 standing, where Prolomy doth, between Zidon and Tyre. It hath also a River called fons bortorum Libani, which Adrichome out of Brochard intituleth Eleutherus: for which he alfo circth Plinie, and the first of Machabees the 11. Chapter; but neither of those authorities prove Eleutherus to be in Affer: for this River falleth into the Sea at the Ile of Aradus: Plinil.g. not far from Balanca, witnesse Ptolomie: & therfore Pinetus calleth it Valania, & Postellus Asa. Tab 4. Post Orthosian Velana; which River boundeth Phanicia on the North-fide: to which Strabo also agreeth: & Eleuberum but this principall River of Affer, Arias Montanus calleth Gabatus. Christianus Chrot Out of Theword ofthe mouth and Papers of Peter Laicstan (which Laicstan in this our age both viewed Nachallsambiand described the Holy Land) calleth the maine River Fons hortorum Libani: and one of guous, either for and described the Hory Land cancell the maine Niver 1 on North-fide, Naar, and another from the River but this South-west, Chabul: of the City adjoyning of the same name : for Eleutherus it cannot be. word Ghe is al. South-weit, Chaont: Of the City adjoyining of the father hand lot which I finde in no way a valley, as There is also another River described by Adrichome, named Jepthael, which I finde in no in Ghimon and other Author, and for which he citeth the nineteenth of Josua, but the word d Ghe, which Gellemanim. other Author, and for which he citem the infected that for a Valley and for a Valley the Joseph lib. 20 is added there to Jepthael, is not taken for a River, but for a Valley and for a Valley the Bell. Jud. 2030 Valyar, the Geneva, and Arias Montanus turne it. There is also found in Affer, the River of L. 5.6.19. In Belas, remembred by Josephus and Tacitus, which is also called Pagidas, faith * Plinie: Josua, c. 19.00. Belastemembred by Josephus and I actus, which is and caned I agrain, later I tomics softiscalled out of the fands of this River are made the best Glasse, which sometimes the Zidonians siebos, of which practifed: and now the Venetians at Murana. Arias Montanus makes Belus to be a branch name many unof Chidumin, which it cannot be: for Belus is knowner of flow from out the Lake Cende-ther streame via.sall Cosmographers, both Ancient and Moderne, and the later Travailers into those Fol. 13.3. which parts, with effe. It is true that the River of Chison taketh water from Chedumim, but not in running by that fathion which Montanus hath described it: neither doth it find the Sea at Ptolomais fallethinto the Acon, according to Montanus: but farther to the South betweene Caiphas and Sicaminum, Lake Sinbonis, witnesse Ziegler, Adrichomius, and Schrot.

Besides these Rivers there are divers famous Springs and Fountaines, as that of living promised land waters adjoyning to Tyre: and a Maserephot, or after Saint Hierome, Maserephotmain, they place whose Well filled by the floud of the Sea adjoyning (they fay) the Inhabitants by feeth-Rhimocolura, for ing the water make falt thereof, as at Nantwitch.

The Mountaines which bound Affer on the North, are those of Anti-libanus, which eborinthat with Libanus bound Cælofyria: two great ledges of Hills, which from the Sea of Phæni-place of Jolius cit and Syria, extend themselves farre into the Land East-ward, four hundred stadia or whether this furlongs, according to Strabo: for that length he giveth to the Valley of Calofyria, which Siebor, Jos. 3.3 turlongs, according to Strabo: for that length ne giveth to the valley of Strabo: for that length ne gives them 1500 furlongs in length from the West be a Riverora those Mountaines inclose: but Plinie gives them 1500 furlongs in length from the West City, trappears (wherethey begin at Theipsophon, or Dei facies, neere Tripolis to the Mountaines of Arabia that this name beyond Damafeus: where Anti-libanus turneth towards the South. Thefe ledges where is found both they beginto part Traconitis and Basan, from the Desart Arabia, are called Hermon: which bound of the Moses also nameth Sion, the Phanicians Syrion, and the Amorites Sanir, neither is this any holy Land, 701 one Mountaine apart, but a continuation of Hills: which running farther foutherly, is in South bound. the Scriptures called Galaad or Gilead: the same being still a part of Libanus, as the Pro- Joing: the Scriptures called Galaad or Gileaa: the lame being that this Galaad is the highest a Seethe maraphet Hieremy proveth: Galaad tu mihi caput Libani: noting that this Galaad is the highest ginall Note a. of those Hills of Libauns. Strabo knowes them by the name of Traconita: and Ptolomie bove in the seby Hippus. Arias Montanus calleth these Mountaines bordering After, Libanus, for Anti- cond, ection of libanus, contrary to all other Cosmographers, but he giveth no reason of his opinion.

They take the name of Libanus from their white tops, because according to Tacitus, Phil.5.c.20. the highest of them are covered with Snow all the Summer: the Hebrew word Libanos Strab.l.ro. (faith Weiffenburg) fignifieth whitenesse. Others call them by that name of the Fran-Pro. Affe. Tab. 4. kincence which those Trees yeeld: because nedvores is also the Greeke word for that Sucton. Nig. pig. 503.

Niger out of Aphrodifeus affirmeth, that on Libanus there falleth a kinde of hony dew, which is by the Sunne congealed into hard Sugar, which the Inhabitants call Sacchar, from Whence came the Latine word Saccarum.

6.II.II. THE TRIBE OF NEPHTALIM.

of the bounds of Nephtalim and of Heliopolis and Abila.

Henext Portion of the Land of Canaan bordering Alber, was the upper Galilus the greatest part whereoffell to the lot of Nephtalim, the sonne of Jacob by Billa. the hand-made of Rachel: who while they abode in Egypt, were increased to the number of 5 3400 persons, able men to beare armes, numbred at Mount Sinai: all which leaving their bodies in the Defarts, there entred the Holy Lord of their fonnes 45400. besides Infants, Women, and Children, under twenty yeares of age. The Land of Nephu. lim tooke beginning on the North part, from the Fountaines of Jordan, and the Hills of Libanus adjoyning as farre South as the Sea of Galilee, bounded on the West by Afin. and on the East and South-east by Fordan.

On the North-fide of Libanus, and adjoyning to this Territory of Nephralim, did the Amorites (or Emorites) also inhabite, in which Tract and under Libanus, was the Cityof Heliopolis: which the heighth of the Mountaines adjoyning fludowed from the Sunne, the better part of the day. Postellus calls it Balbec; Niger, Marbech; and Leonclavim, Beallebeca.

Of this name of Heliopolis, there are two great Cities in Egypt: the first called on, by the Hebrewes, and the Chaldean Paraphrast; otherwise Bethsemes, or after the Latines, Solin oppidum or Domus Solie : The City of the Sunne : into which, faith Ulpian, Severus the M. man Emperour fent a Colonie: the other Gestelius nameth Dealmarach: and of this name Stephanus also findeth a Citie in Thrace, and Glycas in Phrygia.

There is also in the same Valley adjoyning to Nephtalim, Chalcis, and Abila. Chalci, of whom the Region towards Palmyrena hath the name of Chalcidica, over which Hord Agrippa, and Bernice the Queene commanded.

Abila also gave name to the Region adjoyning, of which Lysanius the sonne of the rod the elder, became Tetrarch or Governour : whereof Ptolomie gave it the addition of Jornan, and (as Lyfanii, and called it Abila Lyfanii. Volateran names it Aphila, of which he notes that out Diogenes, a famous Sophister, was native, who by Volateran is intituled Aphilem, not Abileus. After that this City of Abila or Aphila, had received the Christian Faith, Prisille nus became the Bishop thereof: slaine afterward by our Brittish Maximus at Trever. For distinction of this Citie (if it be not the same, as it may be thought to be the same)it is to be remembred, that in the Tribe of a Manaffe, joyning upon the bounds of the Tribe of Nephtalim, there is another City of the same name, saving that it is written with an (E) for an(I) and called Abela, remembred in the 20. Chapter of the second of Samuel. The same Josephus calls Abelmachea, and Hierome Bethmacha. In the place of Samuel for distinction fake, it is written Abel Beth-Mahaca, (for belike it was the Towne of Mahaca, the wife of Macir, the some of Manaffe, the Father of Gilead) in the Chronicles it is called, Abel-Majim, This City 70ab befieged, because Sebathe sonne of Bichri, who rebelled against David, fled thereinto for fuccour: but a certaine wife woman of the Citie perswading the people to cast Seba his head over the wall, Joab retired his Army. The same Citie was afterward taken by the King of Damascus, Benadad: and after a while by Teglatphe.

and so doubtlesse *Abel-Missiam, Gen. 50. 11. and yet Junius in his notes upon Num. 33. And Abel and Society and Abel Signing and Society 49. thinkes that Abel-Sittim was so called, rather by reason of the plaine ground there 1 Samo 18. (rowit in the Land of Moab,) and so perhaps Abel-Meholah in the Tribe of Ephraim: Judg 7.24& the Towne of Elisha the Prophet: also Abel-Vincarum of the Ammonites, whither Index 1.25 Tephts purfued them.

†. II. Of Hazor.

-Nthe Tribe of Nephtalim, was that famous City of Jabin, in 70 sua's time called Afor (orafter the Chaldwan Paraphraft, Hafzor) by Josephus, Asora; by Junius* Chatzot: Oftwo other which Laicstan names Hesron; the Regall City, and Metropolis of Canaan: seated in Cities of this the West part of Nephtalim, towards Asher. In this City was that great Rendevous and name in Juda, affembly of those foure and twenty Kings against 30 such who being all overthrown, slain, of a fourth in and scattered, this their powerfull City was by Joses taken and burnt to dust. But in pro- Benjamin, lee ceffe of time the fame being rebuilt by the Canaanites, a fecond King Jabin, 137. yeares that which fold afferthe death of this first fabin, invaded the Ifraelites: and being ordained of God to place: of a fife punishtheir Idolatry, he prevailed against them, and held them in a miserable servitude in this Tribe of twenty yeares: till Debora the Prophetesse overthrew Sisera, Fabins Leivtenant, and his Hen-chasses, we Army, neere the Mountain Tabor. This City Salomon reftored at fuch time as he also re-reade, 16:19:27 edified Gezar, burnt by Pharao of Egypt, with a Megiddo, Bethoron, and other Cities; but wherero we may about 260. Yeares after, it fell into the hands of Teglatphalafar, King of the Affyrians. It is Henan, in the now, faith Adrichomius, called Antiopia: it was one of the principall Cities of Decapolis. uttermoft North Eart of Threis another Citie of this name in the Territory of Benjamin, feated on the confines Manaffe, over of Assalon, called the new Hazor, b faith Hierome.

Here was also on the border, and within the Territory of Nephtalim, that renowned City of Lais, or Lajisch, as Junius writes it, or Leschen; which City the Judg. 18.27 children of Dan (being straitned in their Territory under Juda) invaded & maste- John 9-47. red; and gave it the name of their own parent Dan: and by that name it is written in Gene-Is the foureteenth, at which place Abraham furprized Chedorlaomer and his confederates. & followed his victory as farre as Sobab, formerly remembred in the division of Syria, 0therwise called Sophena. And after the possession of the Danites, it had the joynt name of Leschem-Dan. Weissenburg writes it Lacis, the Geneva Laish, Josephus, Dana; Benjamin, Balina; Breidenbach, Belena: but the now Inhabitants know it by the name of Judg 18; Belina tothis day: witneffe Neubrigensis, Tyrius, Volaterranus, Brochard the Monke, and Po-Mellus: who also taketh this City to be the same, which in Matth. 15. vers. 39. in the Vulgar is called Maradan for which the Greeke Text hath Magdala in that place, and in S. Marke, Chap. 8.101 peaking of the fame ftory, Dalmanutha. At fuch time as the children of Dan obtained this Place, it seemeth that it was either a free City, of the alliance & confederacy of the Zidonior elfe subject unto the Kings thereof; for it is written in the eighteenth of Judges, Verse 28, And there was none to helpe, because Lais was farre from Zidon: & they had no businesse with "ther men; for it was above thirty English miles from the Mediterran Sea, & from Ziden. Plin.1.5 c. 15; In after-times when these Regions became subject to the state of Rome, it had the name of Paneas, from a Fountaine adjoyning so called: and therefore Ptolomie calls it Cafarea Heg Liass, Pania. Hegesippus calls it Parnium, saith Weissenburg: but he had read it in a corrupt copy: or in Hegesippus set out by Badius, it is written Paneum without an (R): and at such ime as Philip the some of the elder Hered, brother to Hered, Tetrarch of Galilee, became Governour of Traconitie, Cometime Bafan; this City was by him amplified add forrified; Col another adboth to give memory to his owne name, and to flatter Tiberius Cafar, he called it farm called The word Abel may be expounded, either to fignific bewailing, or a plaine ground; Cafarea Philippi: and fo it became the Metropolis, and head City of Traconists, and one Consequently and therefore no marvell that many Townes (with some addition for distinction sale) the first Ciries of Decapelis. nothing remained with that Emperour, but the memory of his impiety: fo in Saint Hieromes time the Citizens remembred their former Paneas, and forecalled it, with the Territory adjoyning by the ancient name. Of this City was that woman whom Christ healed of a bloudy iffue, by touching the hemme of his Garment with a constant Faith: who afterward, as she was a woman of great wealth and ability, being mindfull of Gods good. nesse, and no lesse gratefull for the same, as Eusebius and Nicephorus report, caused two Statues to be cult in pure Copper: the one representing Christ, as neere as it could be moulded : the other made like her felfe, kneeling at his feet, and holding up her hands towards him. These shee mounted upon two great Bases or Pedestals of the same Mettall, which she placed by a Fountaine neere her owne house: both which (faith Enfebius) remained in their first perfection, even to his owne time : which himselfe had seene, who lived in the Reigne of Constantine the Great. But in the yeare after Christ 363. that Monfter Julian Apostata, caused that worthy Monument to be cast downe, and defaced : setting up the like of his owne in the same place: which Image of his was with fire from Heaven brokening fitters: the head, body, and other parts fundered and fcattered, to the great admiration of the people at that time living. The truth of this accident is also confirmed by Sociomenus Salaminius, in his fift booke and twentieth Chapter.

This City built by the Danises, was neerethe joyning together of those two Rivers, which arising from the springs of for and Dan, the two a apparent Fountaines of Jordan in a foyle exceeding fruitfull, and pleasant: for, as it is written, Judges 18. it is a place " which doth want nothing that is in the World. In the fields belonging to this Citie it was that Saint Peter acknowledged Christ to be the Sonne of God: whereupon it was answer red, Tues Petrus, o fuper hanc Petram, oc. After this City received the Christian faith, it was honoured with a Bishops seate : and it ranne the same fortune with the rest, for it was after taken and retaken by the Saracens, and Christians: under Fulch the fourth King of Hierusalem, and after the death of Godfrey of Bullion, the King of Damascus wreftedin whence for and from the Christians; and shortly after by them againe it was recovered. Lastly, now itte

t.IIII. Of Capernaum, and the Cities of Decapolis.

Mong the remarkable Cities within this Tribe. Capbernaum is not the leafile often remembred by the Evangelists. This City had the honour of Christs prefence three yeares: who for that time was a Citizen thereof, in which he fint preached and taught the doctrine of our falvation: according to that notable Prophecyal Esay 9. The people that walked in darknesse, have seene a great light : they that dweltin it Land of the shadow of death up on them bath the light shined.

Caphernaum was feated on Fordan, even where it entrethinto the Sea of Galilee, inan excellent & rich foyle : of whose destruction Christ himselfe prophecied in these words, so And thou Caphernaum which art lifted up unto heaven, shalt be brought downe to Hell, Gt. which shewed the pride and greatnesse of that City: for it was one of the principall Cities of Decapolis, and the Metropolis of Galilee. And although there were some markes of this Cities magnificence in Saint Hieromes time, as himselfe confesseth; it being then a reasonable Burge or Towne: yet those that have fince, and long since seene it, 45 #10chard, Breidenbech, & Saliniac affirme, that it then consisted but of fix poore Fisher-mens houses.

The Region of ten principall Cities called Decapolitana or Decapolia, is in this descip tion often mentioned, and in Saint Matthew, Marke and Luke also remembred; but I find no agreement among the Cosmographers, what proper limits it had : and so Plinie himselfe confesseth; for Marins Niger, speaking from others, bounds it on the North by the mountaine Cafius in Cafiotis: and endeth it to the South at Egypt and Arabia; by which description it imbraceth Phanicia, a part of Calofiria, all Palastina, and Judea.

This River Ortelius takes to be the River Jabos: which boundeth Gad and Manasse over Jordan. but he mistaketh it; for Hieromain falleth into the Sea of Galilee, betweene Hippos and Gerafa, whereas Jabos entreth the same Sea betweene Ephron and Phannel. For the ninth Gelafa, which Hypidion Or-Josephus takes to be Gerasa: and Gerasa is found in Calosiria by Josephus, Hezesippus, and telim takes them for two Stephanus: but by Ptolomie (whom I rather follow) in Phanicia. The tenth and last, Plinie Cities. nameth Canatha, and so doth Suetonius and Stephanus, which Volaterran calls Gamala, but Higesippus rightly Camala, a City in the Region of Basan over Jordan, so called, because those two Hills on which it is seated, have the shape of a Camell. But the collection of these ten Cities, whereof this Region tooke name, is better gathered out of Brechard, Breidenbach, and Saligniae, which make them to be these; Cafarea Philippi, and Afor, beforeremembred, Cedes, Nephtalim, Sephet, CoraZin, Capharnaum, Bethfaida, Jotapata, Tiberias, and Scythopolis, or Bethsan. For all other Authours disagree herein, and give no reason for their opinion. One place of the Evangelist Saint Matthew makes it manifest, that this Region called Decapolitana, was all that Tract betweene Zidon, and the Sea of Galilee. For thus it is written: And he departed againe from the coasts of Tyrus and Lidon, and came unto the Sea of Galilee, through the middest of the coasts of Decapolis: fo that it was bounded by Damascus and Libanus on the North: by the Phanician Sea, betweene Zidon and Prolomais on the West: by the Hills of Gelbo and Bethsan on the South: and by

THE TRIBE OF ZABULON.

F Zabulon or Zebulon, another of the fonnes of Jacob by Leasthere were multered at Mount Sinat, 57400 able men, befides women, children, and aged unable m fons : all which dying in the Defarts, there entred the Holy Land of their illes 65000 fit to beare armes: who inhabited that part of Canaan, from Alber to the River Chifon Southward, and from the Sea of Galilee to the Mediterran, East and West.

The Cities within this Tribe which border Afher are Sicaminum on the Sea shore; of which Joseph. Ant. 13.6. 19. Debbaset, of * which Jos. 19. 11. Jekonam or Jokneham (whole King was a flaine by Josua, and the Citie was given to the Levites:) and Gaba, aftercalled the Citie of Horsemen, of a Regiment there garrisond by Herod. Then the City which beareth the name of Zabulon, or the Citie of men, exceeding ancient and magnificen, b burnt to the ground by Ceftius, Lievtenant of the Romane Armie. Adrichomius makes it the birth-Citie of c Elon Judge of Ifrael, because he is called Zabulonita: not marking Caninius reades that in the same place, he is said to be buried at Ajalon.

To the East of this City of Labulon is Cateth, of which Jof. 19.15. on the border of Alba: and beyond it the lefferd Cana of Galike, where Christ converted Water into Wine: the native Citie of Nathaniel, and as it is thought, of Simon Zelotes. Beyond it beginthe Mountaines of Zabulon : and then the Citie of Cethron (in Zeigler, Ghiltron) which defended it selse against Zabulon. Then Bersabe, which standeth in the partition of the upper e The Hebrers Hammethorn, (for which the and nether Galilee, fortified by Josephus against the Romanes. Beyond it towards the East they imagine Amthar or Amathar: then Remmon of the Levises. The last of the Cities on the North border of Zabulon is Bethsaida, one of the ten Cities of Decapolis, situate on the Galilean Sea, and watered by the springs of Capharnaum, the native Citie of the Apostles, Peter, Andrew, and Philip. Herein Christ did many miracles, but these people being no lesse incredulous than the Capharnaims, and Alongst the West border of Galilee, towards the South from Bethfaida, was the strong Castle of Magdalum, the habitation of Marie Magdalen, not long fince standing.

And beyond it the strong and high seated Citie of Josephia, fortified by Josephia in the Roman Warre: but in the end after a long fiege surprised by Vespasian, who slaughteredmany thousand of the Citizens, and held 1200 prisoners, whereof Fosephus the Histor rian was one.

The last and greatest of the Cities on that * Sea, and the Lake of Genezzareth within The names of Zabulon, was that of Tiberias, from whence afterward the Galilan Sea also changed the chiefe Cities feared name, and was called the Sea of the Citie Tiberias, so named in the honour of Tiberius Ce-about this Sea. far; it was one of the ten Cities, and the Metropolis of the Region Decapolitan, & the grea- or lake, thorous test and last of the lower Galilee. From hence our Saviour called Matthew from the toll which Jordan runneth, were or custome house, to be an Apostle; and neere unto it raised the daughter of fairus from capernaum, death: it was built (as Josephus reports) by Herod the Tetrarch, the brother of Philip, in Taberias, Be h. the beginning of the raigne of Tiberius Cafar, in the most fruitfull part of Galilee; but in a Tarichea, and ground full of Sepulchers: Quum juxta noftras leges (faith he) ad feptem dies impurus ba-they adde cinheatur, qui in talibus locis habitet; Whereas by our law be should be seven dayes held as un-foreimesgave cleane, who inhabited in such a place . by which words, and by the whole place of Josephus name to the o it appeares, that this Tiberias is not (as fome have thought) the fame as the old Cinnereth, Countrie. which was feated, not in Zabulon, but in Nephtaline.

To the South-west of this Sephoris or Diocasarea was that blessed place of Nazareth the Citie of Mary the Mother of Christ; in which he himselfe was conceived: it standeth betweene Mount Tabor, and the Mediterran Sea. In this Citie he abode chiefly foure and twenty yeares, and was therefore called a NaTarite, as the Christians afterward were for many yeares. There is a second Torrent or Brooke that riseth in the Hills of Bethulia, and falleth into the Sea of Galilee by Magdalum: and the third is a branch of a river rifing out of the Fountaines of Capharnaum, which falleth also into the same Sea, and neere Magdalum; which Torrent they call Dotham, from the name of the Citie, from which it paf-Map in Ortelius. feth Eastward to Bethfaida, and so joyning with Jordanis parans which runneth from the Julies of Johnhard which Johnareck oneth in the bounds of Zahulan; it endeth in the Sal Valley of Jephthael, which Jofus reckoneth in the bounds of Zabulon: it endeth in the Sea of Galilee.

This Citie was first taken by Cassius, and 3000 Jewes carried thence captive; and afterward with great difficultie by Vefpasian, whom tred it by the Sea side, having first beaten the Jewes in a sea-fight upon the Lake or Seasi Galilee: he put to the fword all forts of people, and of all ages; faving that his furiebeng quenched with the Rivers of bloud running through every freet, he referved the remain der for flaves and bond-men-

6.VII. THE HALFE OF THE TRIBE OF MANASSE.

Of the bounds of this balfe Tribe: and of Scythopolis, Salem, Ther sa, and others.

Henext Tribe which joyneth it felfe to Isachar towards the South, is the halfe of Manasse, on the West fide of Fordan. Manasses was the first begotten of Foseph, the eleventh fon of Jacob. His mother was an Egyptian, the daughter of Putiphar, Priest and Prince of Heliopolis: which Manasses, with his brother Ephraim, the grandchildren of faceb, were by adoption numbred amongst the sonnes of faceb, and made up the number of the twelve Patriarkes.

Of Manasse there were increased in Egypt, as they were numbred at Mount Sinai, 32200 ablemen: all which being confumed in the Defarts, there entred of their iffues, ²⁷⁰⁰ bearing armes. The Territory which fell on this one halfe of Manasse, was bounledby Jordan on the East, and Dora upon the Mediterran Sea on the West, Fefrael on he North, and Machmata is the South border.

The first and principall Citie which stood in this Territorie was Berbsan, sometime If, faith Plinie, built by Liber Pater, in honour of his Nurse there buried, of the same plinte, sait ame, which Solinus confirmes. Afterward when the Soythians invaded Asia the lesse, and piere't into the South, to the uttermost of Calofyria, they built this Citie a-new, and very ragnificent: and it had thereupon the name of Scythopelia, or the Citie of Scythians given

Nation and kindred, by whose hands when they had obtained victory, they themselves fet on the Jewes which ferved them, and flew them all. Stephanus makes it the utmost towards the South of Coelofyria : and Strabo joynes it to Galilee. It is feated between Jordan and the Hills of Gilboe, in aulone ad montes acrabitena, faith Zeigler. But I finde it in the East part of the Valley of Jesrael neere Jordan : after that, Jordan strengtheneth it selfe againe into a River, leaving the Sea or Lake Genezareth Notwithstanding Montanus describes it farre to the West, and towards the Mediterran Sea, neere Endor, contrarieto Stella, Laicstan, Adrichome, and all other the best Authors. This Citie was the greatestof all those of Decapolis: but the children of Manasse could not expell the Inhabitants thereof: and therefore called it Sane, an enemie, or Beth-san, the house of an enemie.

Over the walls of this Bethsan the Philistims hung the body of Saul, and his sonnes flaine at Gilboe. It had, while the Christian religion flourished in those parts, an Archbishop, who had nine other Bishops of his Diocesse, numbered by Tyrius, in his 14. Booke and 12. Chapter: but the same was afterward translated to Nazareth. The later travailers in those parts affirme, that there is daily taken out among the rubble and the ruines of that Citie, goodly pillars and other pieces of excellent Marble, which witnesse the stately buildings, and magnificence which it had in elder times, but it is now a poore and desolate

From Bethfan keeping the way by Jordan, they finde an ancient Citie called Salem, which Citie the ancient Rabbines, faith Hierome, do not finde to be the fame with Hieri-, falem: there being in the time of Hierome and fince, a towne of that name, neere Scythopolis before remembred, which if the place of Scripture, Gen. 13-18. doe not confirme, where the Vulgar readeth transsivita; in Salem urbem Sichemorum (for which others reade venit incolumis ad Civitatem Sechemum, making the word Shalem not to be a proper name, but an adjective) yet the place John 3.13. where it is faid, that John was baptizing in Enon neere Salem, may fomewhat strengthen this opinion, and yet it is not unlikely that this Salem of which S. John speaketh, is but contracted of Shahalim, of which in the Tribe of Benjamin, 1 Sam. 9.4. This word Junius maketh to be the plurall of Shuhal: of which we reade, I Sam. 13.17. for as for that which is added out of Canticles 6.12. of Shulammitis, as if it had bin as much as a Woman of this Salem, neere Ænon, it hath no probability.

Fof.1.13.6.21.

* This Aner Fanius upon * Chron 6.70 makes to bet fame with which fof.21. 25. Hierome mames it from braham, Gen. 14.13.Jolaa * King. 14.

Not farre from thence where they place Salem, they find Bezech the City of Adonite zec, 3 ofephus calls it Bala: here it was that Saul affembled the strength of Ifrael and Juda to the number of 330000. when he meant to relieve Jabesh Gilead, against Naash the Ammonite: who would give them no other conditions of peace, than to suffer their right eyes to be thrust out. Neere Bezech is the City of Bethbera or rather Beth-bas, of which Judg.7.24. in the storie of Gideon: and then Ephra or Hophra, wherein Gideon it habited: in the border whereof stood an Altar consecrated to Baal, which he pulled downe and defaced; and neere it that stone, on which Abimelech the Bastard slew his 704 brothers; a Heathenish cruelty, practised by the Turke to this day: and not farre hence, betweene the Village of Asophon and Jordan, Ptolomeus Lathurus overthrew Alexando King of the Jewes, and flaughtered, as Josephus numbereth them, 3000. but according to Timagenes 50000. after which victory, as Ptolomie past by the Villages of the Jewes, he flew all their women, and caused the young children to be sod in great Caldrons, that the rest of the Jewes might thereby thinke that the Egyptians were growne to be meneaters and strike them with the greater terror.

Towards the West and on the border of Hachar, they place the Cities of * Antr of the Levites, and Abel-Mehola, which Junius, Judg. 7.22. placeth in Ephraim: it was the ha bitation of Helisaus the Prophet, numbred among those places, 1 Reg. 4-12. which were given in charge to Baana by Salomon, to whose charge also Tahanac belonged, a place of great strength, which at the first refisted Josus, though their King was afterward hanged and their Citie given to the Levites.

In the body of this Territory of Manasse, but somewhat neerer Jordan than to Mediterran Sea, were three great Cities, to wit, Therfa, whose King was one of those th 30fua flew: which the Kings of Ifrael used for their Regall seate, till such time as Saman was built From hence the wife of Jeroboam went to Achia to enquire of her fons health who knowing her, though the were disguised, told her of her sonnes death.

The second was Thebes neere Samaria, of which name there are both in Egypt, Greece, of great fame: in the affault of the Tower of this Towne, whereinto the Citizens retired, the Baftard Abimelec was wounded by a waighty stone, throwne by a Woman over the Wall, who despairing of his recovery, commanded his Page to flay him ourright, because it should not be said that he perished by the stroke of a Woman. But others Judg 9 ver 3 702 fet this Citie in Ephraim neere Sichem or Neapolis.

The third is Acrabata, of which the Territory adjoyning is called Acrabatena, (one of the ten Toparchies or Governments in Judea) for which Hierome, I Macc. 5. reades Ara-Hier. Mac. 1. bathena: but in the Greeke it is Acrabatine: Isidore calls it Agrabat. This Citie had one of c.s. the largest Territories of all Palastine belonging to the Governour thereof. Fosephus remembreth it often, as in his fecond Booke of the Jewes Wars, 6.11.25.28. & elsewhere.

The difference betweene a Tetrarchie and a Toparchie, was, that the first was taken for a Province, & the other for a City with some leffer Territory adjoyning; and a Tetrarch is the fame with Prases in Latine, and President in English, being commonly the fourth nart of a Kingdome; and thereof fo called. Plinie nameth feventeene Tetrarchies in Syria: Plin.15. partora Kingdom, and fo hath the Kingdome of Ireland to this day, Lengter, ul-Eugh.in Chron; fer, Connath, and Mounster.

To the South-west of Acrabata they place the Cities of Balaam or Bilham, & Get bremmon of the Levites: but Junius out of for. 21.25. and 1 Chron. 6.70. gathers that thefe two are but one and that Jibleham, Jof. 16.11 is another name of the same Citie.

Then is Jezael a Regall. Citie, set at the foot of the Mountaines of Gilboe, towards the South-west: herein 3ez abel, by a false accusation, caused Naboth to be stoned, to the end the might possessed his Vineyard adjoyning to the Citie, which Naboth refused to fell, because it was his inheritance from his Father.

Joran also was cast unburied into the same field: for which his Mother Jezabel mur-2 King.cap. 33

Toward the Sea from Jezael is the Citic which they call Gaber: in whose ascent as Ahaziah King of Juda fled from Jehu, when he had flaine Joram, he was wounded with the Thor of an arrow, of which wound he died at Maggeddo adjoyning. The Scripture calls 2 King 9 27; this Citie of Gaber, Gur.

Then Adadremmon, neere unto which the good King Folias was flaine by Necho, King of Egypt, in a War unadvisedly undertaken. For Necho marched towards Assyria against the King thereof, by the commandement of God; whom folias thought to relift in his passage. It was afterward called Maximianopolis.

Aneighbour City to Adadremmon was Maggeddo, often remembred in the Scriptures; Jud. 1. 673 whose King was slaine among the rest by Josua: yet they defended their Citie for a long Joi 12-179 time against Manasse. The River which passeth by the Towne, may perhaps be the same which Ptolomie calleth Chorfeus: & not that of which we have spoken in Zabulon. For becaule this name is not found in the Scriptures, many of those that have described the holy Land, delineate no fuch River. Moore only fets it down in his Geographie of the twelve tribes:butthe River which passeth by Maggeddo, he understandeth to be but a branch, falling thereinto. Laicstan & Schrot make a great confluence of waters in this place, agreeable to this Scripture in the fifth of Judges: Then fought the Kings of Canaan in Tanaac by the waters of Maggeddo. Butthese Authors, and with them Stella, give it no other name than the Torrent fo called.

But seeing that ancient Cosmographers stretch out the bounds of Phanicia, even to Sebaste or Samaria; and Strabo farre beyond it on the Sea-coast: And Fosephus calls Casaria Strab-less. Palastina a Citie of Phanicia, yea Laurentius Corvinus extendeth Phanicia as far as Geza: Nigero feeing also Ptolomie fers down Chorfens for the partition of Phanicia & Judaa, this River running East and West parallel with Samaria: it is very probable that this Torrent called Maggeddo, after the name of the Citie, which it watereth, is the same which Pto. omie in his fourth Table of Asia, calleth Chorseus. The later travailers of the holy Land call Maggeddo Subimbre at this day.

Of Cafaria Palastine, and some other Townes. Rom Maggeddo toward the West, and neere the Mediterran Sea, was that glorious Citie of Cafaria Palastina: first, the Tower of Straton: the same which Plinie calls Apollonia 5

Apollonia: though Ptolomy fets Apollonia elsewhere, & toward Egypt, betweene this City and Joppe to which Veffagan gave the name of Flavia Colonia. It was by Herod re-built, who therein laboured to exceed all the workes in that part of the world. For besides the edifices, which he reared within the Walls, of cut and polisht marbles, the Theater and Amphitheater, from whence he might looke over the Seas farre away, with the high and stately Towers & Gates: he forced a Harborow of great capacitie, being informer times but an open Bay: and the winde blowing from the Sea, the Merchants haunting that Port, had no other hope, but in the strength of their Cables and Anchors. This worke he performed with such charge and labour, as the like of that hath not bin found in any King. dome, nor in any age: which, because the Materials were fetcht from far, and the waight of the stones was fuch as it exceedeth beliefe, I have added Julephus owne words of this Josephis. c. 13. worke, which are these: Hanc locorum incommoditatem correcturus, circulum portus circumduxit,quantum putaret magua classi recipienda sufficere: & in viginti ulnarum profun. dum, pragrandia saxa demisit : quorum pleraq; pedum quinquaginta longitudinis slatitudinis verò octodesim, altitudine novem-pedali: fuerunt quadam etiam majora, minora alia; 70 mendthis inconvenience of place (faith Josephus) he compast in a Bay wherein a great steel might well ride : and let downe great stones twentie fadome deepe: whereof some were fifty foote long, eighteen foot broad, and nine foote thicke: some bigger, and some lesser. To this he added an arme or cawfie of two hundred footlong, to breake the waves: the rest he streng. thened with a stone wall, with divers stately Towers thereon builded: of which the most magnificent he called Drusus, after thename of Drusus the sonne in law of Cusar. in whose honour he intituled the Citie it selfe, Cafaria of Palastine: all which he perfor. med in twelve yeares time. It was the first of the Easterne Cities that received a Bishop:

In this Citie was Cornelius the Centurion baptized by Saint Peter: and herein dwelt Philip the Apostle: S. Paul was herein two yeares prisoner, under the Prifident Fælix, unto the time and government of Porcius Festus: by whom making his ap peale, he was fent to Cafar. Here, when Herod Agrippa was passing on to celebrate the Quinquennalia, taking delight to be called a god by his flatterers, he was stricken with

To the North of Cafaria standeth Dera, or Naphoth Dor, as some reade, Jos. 1.2. soal led (faith Adrichomius) because it joyneth to the Sea, whose King was slaine by John But Junius for in Naphoth Dor, reades in tractibus Dor : and fo the Vulgar, in regionism Dor, although 1 Reg. 4.11. for the like speech in the Hebrew it readeth omnis Nephali Dor: The Septuagint in the place of Josus call it Nephith-Dor, and in the other of the Kings, Nepha-Dor: but the true name by other places (as fof. 12.23. Jug. 1.27.) may feeme to be Dor. It was a strong and powerfull Citic, and the fourth in account of thole twelve Principalities or Sitarchies, which Salomon erected. Junius upon Macchab. 15.11. placeth this betweene the Hill Carmel, and the mouth of the River Cherfeus: for fo fome name the River Chorfeus, of which we have spoken already.

Into this Citie, for the firength thereof, Tryphon fled from Antiochus the fonof Demi-Macc.1.13.15. trius, where he was by the same Antiochus besieged with 12000 foot-men, and 8000. Horse: the same perfidious villaine that received 200 talents for the ransome of Fundham Macchabaus (whom he had taken by treacherie) and then flew him : and after him flew his owne Master, usurping for a while the kingdome of Syria. It had also a Bishops search of the Diocesse of Casaria.

From Cafaria towards the South, they place the Cities of Capharnaum, Gabe, and Gal-Gul.Tyr.deBell. gal: for besides that Capharnaum famous in the Evangelists, they finde in these parts need the West Sea, another of the same name. Of Gabe Hierome inlocis Hebraicis. The famous Galgal or Gilgal, was in Benjamin : but this Gilgal, they fay, it was whose King was shim

Then Antipatris, so called of Herod, in honour of his Father : but in the time of the Mac.17. ver.31. Macchabees it was called Caphar falama: in the fields whereof fudas Macchabaus over threw a part of the Armie of Nicanor, Lievtenant to Demetrius : an armie drawn into f deaby a traiterous Jew, called Alcimus: who contended for the Priest-hood, first under Bacchides, and then under Nicanor. To this was S. Paul carried prisoner from Hierufalm conduda conducted by 470. Souldiers, to defend him from the furie of the Jewes. In after-times the Armie of Godfrey of Bulion attempted it in vaine: yet was it taken by Baldwine. It was honoured in those dayes with a Bishops seare, but it is now a poore Village called Astur. faith Brochard. Neere unto this Citie the Prophet Jonas was three daies preserved in the body of a Whale.

Into the Land, from Antipatris and Cafaria, standeth Narbata, whereof the Territory taketh name: which Ceftius the Romane wasted with fire and sword, because the Jewes which dwelt at Cafaria fled thence, and carried with them the Bookes of Moles, Neere unto it is the Mountaine of Abdia, the Steward of King Achab: wherein he hid an hundred To Prophets, and fed them; after which he himselfe is faid to have obtained from God the Spirit of Propheficalfo.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Kingdome of Phænicia.

The bounds and chiefe Civies, and Founders, and Name of this Kingdome: and of the invention of Letters ascribed to them.

Ecause these five Tribes, of Asser, Nephtalim, Zabulon, Islachar, and the halfe of Manasse, possessing the South part of Anti-libanus I have therefore gathered a briefe of those Kings which have governed therein: at least so many of them as time (which devoureth all things) bath left to posteritie: and that the rest have perished, it is not strange; seeing so many volumes of excellent learning in so long a race and revolution, and in so many changes of Estates and Conquest of Heathen Princes, have bin torne, cast away, or otherwise confumed.

The limits of this Kingdome, as touching the South parts, are very uncertaine: but all Cosmocraphers doe in effect agree, that it takes beginning from the North, where that part of syria, which is called Caffotis, ends: most of them bounding it by orthosia, to the North of Tripolis. Prolomie makes it a little larger, as reaching from the River Eleu-Prolatab. Age. therus, that falls into the Sea at the Hand of Aradus, somewhat to the North of Orthofia, and firetching from thence along it the coast of the Mediterran sea, as farre as the River of Chorfens; which feemes to be that which the Jewes call the Torrent or River of Mageddo. Plinie extends it farther, and comprehends Joppe within it: Corvinus and Budans, Plintibs, c. 161 Joppe and Gaza. Phanicia apud priscos appellata (faith Budaus) que nunc Palestina Syria dicitur; It was called Phanicia of old (faith he) which now is called Palastina of Syria.

Strabo comprehends in this Countrey of Phænicia, all the Sea fide of Judaa, and Palefina, even unto Pelusium, the first Port of Egypt. On the contrary Diodorus Siculus Bude de Aslas. foldeth it up in Calofyria, which he boundethnot. But for my felfe I take amiddle course, and like best of Ptolomies description, who was seldome deceived in his own Art. It had in it these famous Maritimate Cities (besides all those of the Ilands) to wit, Aradus, Orthofia, Tripolis, Botrys, Byblus, Berytus, Sidon, Tyre, Ptolomais (Or Acon) Dora, and Cafaria Paleftina: and by reason of the many Ports and goodly Sea-townes, it anciently commanded the Trades of the Eafterne world: and they were absolute Kings of the Mediterran Sea.

The ancient Regall Seate of those Princes was Zidon, built by Zidon the first sonne of Canaan: and the people then fubject to that people were called Zidonians: the fame state continuing even unto Josua's time. For till then it is probable that there was but one King of all that Region; afterward called Phanicia: which Procopius also confirmeth in his lecond Booke of Vandall Warres. But in processe of time the Citie of Tyre adjoyning became the more magnificent: yet according to the Prophet, it was but a daughter of Zidon, E/ay233 and by them first built and peopled.

But after the death of Moses, and while Josua yet governed Israel, Agenor an Egyptian of Thebes, or a Phoenician bred in Egypt, came thence with his sonnes Cadmus, Phanix, Cyrus, and Cilix, (say Cedrems and Curtius) and built and possess the Cities of Tyre and Cyrus, and Cilix, (say Cedrems and Curtius) and built and possess the Cities of Tyre and Cilix, (say Cedrems and Curtius) and built and possess the Cities of Tyre and Cyrus, and cilix, (so called after the name of his Zidon: to wit, the new Tyrus, and brought into Phanicia (so called after the name of his second sonne) the use of letters: which also Cadmus in his pursuite after his sister Europa, taught the Gracians. For Taurus King of Crete, when he surprised Tyre, had stollen her thence: of which the Poets devised the fable of Jupiters transformation into a Bull, by whom that stealth was also supposed to be made. Pomponius Sabinus makes Belus the fift King of Phanicia, and findes Cadmus his successor, whom he calleth his grand-childe: King of Phanicia, and findes Cadmus his fuccessor, and not Neptune: because the successor Dido held that name alwayes in reverence, making it a part of their own, as Aldrubal, Hannibal: whose memorie Virgil also toucheth in these Verses.

The Queene anon commands the waighty bowle (Waightie with precious stones and massie gold) To slow with wine. This Belus us'd of old, And all of Belus Line.

Whether this Belus, were Father or Grand-father to Agenor, the matter is not great. But it feemes to me by comparing of times, that Belus was Ancestor to these Phoenicians, and preceded Agenor. For were Belus, or Jupiter Belus, the sonne of Neptune by Lybia the daughter of Epaphus, or were he the Sonne of Thelegonus, according to Eusebius; yet it is agreed that Gecrops then ruled in Attica: and in the end of Gerops time, saith S. Augustine, Moses lest Egypt: Agenors successor living at once with Josus. Now that Agenor returned about the same time into the Territory of Zidon, I cannot doubt: neither Best I denie, but that he gave that Region the name of Phanicia, in honour of his Sonne. But in stead of the building of Tyre and Zidon, it is probable that he repaired and sortified both: and therefore was called a founder, as Semiramis and Nebuchodonos or were of Babuson.

For beit true that Agenor was of the same Nation, and brought up in Egypt: where learnt the use of letters (Egypt flourishing in all kinde of learning in Moses time) or wet he by Nation an Egyptian, yet it is very likely that either he came to save his owne. Territory; or otherwise to defend the coast of Canaan, from the Israelites: who were by Moses led out of Egypt, to the great loss and dishonour of that Nation: and by some Canadam, by reason of the loss which they received by the hand of God, in the Red Sca, and by the ten plagues cast on them before that, and by the flaughter of so many of the Male children at the same time, could not hinder the Hebrews from invading Canaan by Land: which also they knew had so many powerfull Nations to defend it: the Desarts inter-jacent, and the strong Edomites, Moabites, Amorites & Ammonites their borderers: yet Egypt having such Vessels, or Ships, or Gallies, as were then in use: didnotinall probability neglect to Garrison the Sea coast, or a shift Agenor with such forces, as they had to spare; and which they might performe with the greater facilitie, in that the Philistims which held the shores of Canaan, next adjoyning unto them, were their Friends and Consederates.

Now as it appeareth by the course of the storie, those Cities of Phanicia, which Ignor was said to have built (that is, to have fortisted and defended against Josua, and against the Tribes after him, as Zidon, Sor, or Tyre, by Josua called the strong Citie, Accho, after ward Ptolomais, Aczib and Dor) were all that Phanicia had in those dayes.

That the Kings of Phanicia were mighty, especially by Sea, it appeares, first by their defence against Israel: secondly by this, that David & Salomon could not master them, but were glad of their alliance: thirdly, that one of their Cities, though they were then but Regult, defended it selfe 13. yeeres against a King of Kings, Nabuchodonosor: and that Alexander the great (who being made victorious by the providence of God, seemed unresistable) spent more time in the recovery of Tyre, than in the conquest of all the Cities in Assault.

Other opinions there are, as that of Berofus out of Josephus, who conceives that Tyre was founded by Tyrus the fon of Japhet. And for the Region it felfe, though Calisthenes derive it ab arbore dattylorum; and the Greekes from the word Phonos, of slaughter, because the Phonoicians slew all that came on their coasts; yet for my selfe I take it that Phanix the son of Agenor gave it that name. But that either Agenor in Phanicia, or Cadmus his son in Greece, were the Inventors of Letters, it is ridiculous: and therefore the dispute unnecessary.

The Ethiopians affirme that Allas, Orion, Orpheus, Linus, Hercules, Prometheus, Cadmus, and others, had from them the first light of all those Arts, Sciences and civill Policies, which they afterward profest, and taught others: and that Pythagorus himselse was instructed by the Lybians: to wit, from the South and superiour Egyptians: from whom those which inhabited neerer the out-let of Nilus, as they say, borrowed their Divinitie & Philosophie: and from them the Greekes, then barbarous, received Civilitie. Again, the Phoenicians challenge this invention of Letters and of Learning: acknowledging nothing from the Egyptians at all; neither do they allow that Agenor and his sonnes were Affirms; whence Lucan,

Lucan.l. 5 3.

Phanicians first (if fame may credit have)
In rude Characters dar'd our words to grave.

And that Cadmus was the fon of Agenor, and was a Phoenician, and not an Egyptian it appeareth by that aufwer made by Zeno; when he in a kinde of reproach was called a stranger and not a Phoenician:

Si patria est Phanix, quid tum? nam Cadmus & ipse Phanix; cui debet Gracia docta libros:

Athen. 1. Dir

If a Phanician borne I am, what then? Cadmus was fo: to whom Greece owes The Bookes of learned men.

Out of doubt the Phoenicians were very ancient: and from the Records and Chroni- Josephanical cles of Tyre, Josephan the Historian confirmes a great part of his Antiquities. The Thra- Appearm, cians againe subscribe to none of these reports: but affirme constantly, that the great Zamolus shourished among them: when Atlas lived in Mauritania: Nilus and Vulcan in Egypi: and Ochus in Phamicia. Yea, some of the French do not blush to maintaine, that the ancient Gaules taught the Greekes the use of Letters, and other Sciences. And do not weknow that our Bardes and Druides are as ancient as those Gaules, and that they sent their somes hither to be by them instructed in all kinde of learning?

Lastly, whereas others bestow this invention on Moses, the same hath no probabilitie at all, for he lived at such time as Learning and Arts flourished most, both in Egypt, and Asserting and he himselse was brought up in all the learning of the Egyptians, from his infancie.

Buttrue it is, that letters were invented by those excellent Spirits of the first age, and before the generall floud: either by Seth or Enos, or by whom else God knowes; from whom all wisedome and understanding hath proceeded. And as the same infinite God is present with all his Creatures, so hath he given the same invention to divers Nations: whereof the one hath not had commerce with the other; as well in this as in many other knowledges: for even in Mexico, when it was first discovered, there was found written Bookes after the manner of those Hieroglyphieles, anciently used by the Egyptians, and other Nations: and so had those Americans a kinde of Heraldrie; and their Princes differing in Armes and Scutchions, like unto those used by the Kings and Nobilitie of other Nations, Jura naturalia communia & generalia, &c. Natural Lawes are common and suiscons Stretall.

of the Kings of Tyre.

Ut what soever remaineth of the story and Kings of Phænicia (the bookes of Zeno, Sachoniatho, Mnaseas, and others of that Nation, being no where found) The fame is to be gathered out of the Scriptures, Josephus, and Theophilus Antio-

Agenor lived at once with Josua, to whom succeeded Phanix, of whom that part of Canaan, and so farre towards the North as Aradus, tooke the name of Phoenicia: what King succeeded Phanix it doth not appeare: but at such time as the Gracians befreged to Troy, Phasis governed Phoenicia.

In Hieremies time, and while Jehojakim ruled in Juda, the Tyrians had a King apart: for Hieremie speaketh of the Kings of Zidon, of Tyre, of Edom, &c. as of severall Kings.

In Xerxes time, and when he prepared that incredible Armie wherewith he invaded Greece, Tetramness us ruled that part of Phoenicia, about Tyre, and Zidon: who commanded, as some writers affirme, Xerxes fleete, or rather, as I suppose, those 300. Gallies, which himfelfe brought to his aide: for at this time it feemeth, that the Phoenicians were Tilbutaries to the Persian: for being broken into Reguli, and pettie Kings in Hieremies time, they were subjected by NabuchodonoZor; of whose conquests in the Chapter before remembred, Hieremie prophecied.

Tennes, though not immediately, succeeded Tetramnestus, remembred by D. Siculus in his 14. Booke.

Strato, his successor, and King of Zidon, Alexander Macedon threw out, because of his dependancie upon Darius, & that his Predecessors had served the East Empire against the Grecians. But divers Kings, of whom there is no memorie, came betweene Tennes and Strato. For there were confumed 130. yeares and somewhat more betweene Xerxes and Alexander Macedon. And this man was by Alexander esteemed the more unworthy of restitution, because (faith Curtius) he rather submitted himselfe by the instigntion of his, Subjects (who forefaw their utter ruine by refiftance) than that he had any disposition thereunto, or bare any good affection towards the Macedonians.

Athen. 1.12.6.13.

Of this Strate, Athenaus out of Theopempus reporteth, that he was a man of ill living and most voluptuous; also that he appointed certaine games and prizes for Women-dan cers, and fingers, whom he to this end chiefly invited, and affembled : that having behelf the most beautifull and lively among them, he might recover them for his owne use and delights. Of the strange accident about the death of one Strate King of these coasts, & Hierome and others make mention: who having heard that the Persians were neere him with an Armie too waighty for his strength, and finding that he was to hope for line grace, because of his falling away from that Empire, and his adhering to the Egyptians, in determining to kill himselfe, but fainting in the execution, his wife being present, wrested the fword out of his hand and flew him which done, shee also therewith pierced har p owne body, and died.

After Alexander was possest of Zidon, and the other Strate driven thence, He gave the Kingdome to Hephastion, to dispose of: who having received great entertainment of one of the Citizens, in whose house he lodged, offered to recompense him therewith; and willingly offered to establish him therein: but this Citizen no lesse vertuous than rich, desired Hephastion that this Honour might be conferred on some one of the bloud and race of their ancient Kings: and presented unto him Balonymus, whom Curtius calls Abdolominus, Justine, Abdolomius, and Plutarch, Alynomus : who at the very houre that he was called to this regall Estate, was with his own hands working in his Garden, setting hearbs and rootes, for his reliefe and sustenance: though otherwise a wise man and excee-s

These were the ancient Kings of Zidon: whose estate being afterward changed into Popular or Aristocraticall: and by times and turnes fubjected to the Emperours of the East: there remaineth no farther memorie of them, than that which is formerly delivered in the Tribe of Affer. The Kings of Tyre, who they were before Samuels time, it doth not appeare: 3060phs the Hiftorian, as is faid, had many things wherewith he garnished his Antiquitie from the Tyrian Chronicles: and out of Tosephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus, there may be gathered a descent of some twenty Kings of the Tyrians; but these Authors, though they both pretend to write out of Menander Ephesius, do in no fort agree in the times of their raignes, nor in other particulars.

Abibalus is the first King of the Tyrians, that Josephus & Theophilus remember, whom Theophilus calls Abemalus: the fame perchance that the fonne of Sirach mentioneth in Capado his fourtie and fixth Chapter, speaking of the Princes of the Tyrians.

To this Abibalus, Suron succeeded, if he be not one and the same with Abibalus. David Prop. Evang. I. (faith Eusebius out of Eupolemus) constrained this Suron to pay him Tribute, of whom Prep.

allo David complaineth, Pfal. 8 2. Hiram succeeded Suron, whom Josephus calls Irom, and Theophilus sometime Hieronimus, sometimes Hieromus, but Tatian and Zonaras, Chiram. He entred into a league with David, and fent him Cedars, with Masons and Carpenters, to performe his buildings in Hierusalem, after he had beaten thence the Jebusites. The same was he that so greatly asfifted Salomon: whom he not only furnished with Cedars, and other Materials towards the raifing of the Temple, and with great fummes of money, but also he joyned with him in his enterprize of the East India, and of Ophir: and furnished Salomon with Mariners and Pilots: the Tyrians being of all Nations the most excellent Navigators: and lent him 120. talents of gold. Of this Hiram, there is not only mention in divers places of 2 Sam 5.8c. Scripture, but in Tofephies in his Antiquities the 7. & 8. chap. 2. & 3. in Theophilus his third 2 Sames. to booke, in Tatianus his Oration against the Greekes : and in Zonaras, Tome the first. This i Chron.14. Prince seemed to be very mighty and magnificent, he despised the 20. Townes which $4.2 Chron. 2.89. lumon offered him: he defended himselfe against that victorious King David: and gave his daughter in marriage to Salomon, called the Zidonian: for whose fake he was contentedto worship Astaroth, the Idoll of the Phoenicians. Hiram lived 53. yeares.

Baleastartus whom Theoph. Antiochemus calleth Bazorus, succeeded Hiram, King of Theoph. T. Tyre and Zidon, and reigned 7. yeares, according to fofephus.

Abdastartus the eldest fon of Baleastartus, governed 9. yeares, and lived but 20. yeares. according to Fosephus: but after Theophilus he reigned 12. yeares, and lived 54. who being flaincby the foure sonnes of his owne Nurse, the eldest of them held the kingdome 12.

Aftartus brother to Abdastartus recovered the Kingdome from this Usurper, and reigafter Theophilus, a third brother, followed Aftarius, and ruled Josephises. 9. yeares, and lived in all 54.

Phelles the fourth fon of Baleastartus, and brother to the three former Kings, slew Asta-Thomps.

rimus, and reigned 8 moneths, and lived 50 yeares.

Ithobalus (or Juthobalus, in Theophilus) fon to the third brother Aftari mus, who was the chiefe Priest of the Goddesse Astarta, which was a dignity next unto the King, revenged the death of his father, and flaughtered his Unckle Phelles: and reigned 32. yeares; the Foliables. o fame which in the first of Kings, chap. 16. is called Ethbaal, whose daughter Jezabel, Achab married.

Bade for or Bazer the fon of Ithobalus or Ethbaal, brother to Jezahel, succeeded his a King 16.31. Father, and reigned 6. yeares, and lived in all 45.

Mettimus succeeded Bade Zor, and reigned but 9. yeares (faith Fosephus) he had two fosephos fons, Pygmalion and Barca, and two daughters, Elifa and Anna.

Pygmalion reigned after Mettimus his Father 40-yeares, and lived 56. In the seventh yeare of whose reigne, Elisa sailed into Africa, and built Carthage, 143. yeares and 8. moneths after the Temple of Salomon: which by our accompt was 289. yeares after Troy was taken, and 143. before Rome: and therefore that fiction by Virgil of Eneas and Dido must be farre out of square. For Pygmalion covetous of Sicheus his riches, who had married his fifter Elifa, flew him trayteroufly as he accompanied him in hunting : or if we beleeve Justine and Virgil, at the Altar: whereupon Elifa fearing to be despoiled of her Justila. husbands treasure, fled by Sea into Africa, as aforesaid: whom when Pygmalion prepared to purfue, he was by his mothers teares, and by threats from the oracle arrested. Barca accompanied his fifter, and affifted her, in the crection of Carthage: and from him fprane that noble Family of the Barca in Africa, of which race descended many famous Captaines, and the great Hanniball. Servius interprets this name of Dido by Virago, because of erman-like acts: others from Pedidia, a furname of Salomon.

Eluleus succeeded Pygmalion, and reigned 36. yeares: the same that overthrew the fleet of Salmana flar, in the Port of Tyre: notwith standing which he continued his siege before it on the Land fide five yeares, but in vaine.

After Eluleus, Ethobales governed the Tyrians, who vaunted himselfe to be as wise as Daniel : and that he knew all fecrets (faith Ezekiel) of whom the Prophet writethat large in his 28. Chapter : out of whom it was gathered, that this Prince dyed, or was flaine in that long siege of Nabuchodonosor: who surrounded and attempted Tyre 13.

Baal followed Ethobales, and reigned 10. yeares a tributary, perchance, to Nabuchodonofor . for after his death, it was governed by divers Judges, succeeding each other: First. 10 by Ecnibalus, then by Chelbis, Abarus the Priest, Mittonus, and Gerastus, who heldit among them some 7. yeares, and odde months: after whom Balatorus commanded therein as a King for one yeare : after him Merbalus fent from Babylon,4. yeares : after him Iron fent thence also, 20. yeares. In the 17. of whose raigne Cyrus began to governe Persia.

Of Bozius his conceit, that the Edumaans inhabiting along the Red Sea, were the Progenitors of the Tyrians, and that the Tyrians from them received and brought into Phanisis the knowledge of the true God.

F the great mutations of this Kingdome and State of the Tyrians, mixed with discourse of divers other Nations, there is one Bozius that hath written a Trick at large, intituled de ruinis Gentium. And although the great and many alteratons found in this and other Cities, yea, in all things under heaven, have proceeded from his ordinance who onely is unchangeable, and the fame for ever; yet whereas the fam Bozius, inforcing heere-hence, that the prosperity and ruine of the Tyrians were fruits of their embracing or forfaking the true Religion; to prove this his affertion, supposed the Tyrians to have bin Edumæans, descended from Elau, Jacobs brother: first, it can hardly be believed that Tyre, when it flourished most in her ancient glory, was in any forttruly devout and religious. But to this end (befides the proofe which the Scripturs give of Hirams good affection when Salomon built the Temple) he brings many conjectu rall arguments; whereof the strongest is their petigree and descent: it being likely in his opinion, that the posterity of Esan received from him by Tradition the Religion of Abraham and Isaac. That the Tyrians were Edumæans, he endevours to shew, partly by weake reasons, painefully strained from some affinity of names, which are arguments of more delight than waight : partly by authority. For Strabo, Herodotus, Pliny, and others witnesse, that the Tyrians came from the red Sea, in which there were three Ilands, called Tyrus, Aradus, and Sidon: which very names (as he thinketh) were afterwards given w the Cities of Phanicia. Confidering therefore that all the coast of the Red Sea, was (in his opinion) under the Edumæans: as Elab and Efiongaber; or under the Amalekites, who descended of Amales the Nephew of Esau, whose chiefe City was Madian, so called of Madian the son of Abraham by Cethura, whose posterity did people it: the conse quence appeares good (as he takes it) that the Tyrians originally were Edomites diffe ring little or nothing in Religion from the children of Ifrael. Hereunto he addes, that Cadmus and his Companions brought not into Greece the worship of Astartis, the Idoll of the Sidonians. That the Parents of Thales and Pherecydes being Phænicians, themfelves differed much in their Philosophy from the Idolatrous customes of the Greekes, That in Teman, a Towne of the Edumæans, was an University, wherein as may appeare by Eliphas the Temanite, who disputed with Job, Religion was fincerely taught.

Such is the discourse of Bezins, who labouring to proove one Paradoxe by another, deserves in both very little credit. For neither doth it follow, that if the Tyrians were Edumæans, they were then of the true Religion, or well affected to God and his people: neither is it true that they were Edumæans at all. In what Religion Esas brought up h children, it is no where found written; but that himselfe was a prophane man, and different that himselfe was a prophane man with the prophane man was a prophane was a propha vowed by God, the Scriptures in plaine termes expresse. That his posterity were Idola ters, is directly proved in the 25. Chapter of the second booke of Chronicles. That the Edornites were perpetuallenemies to the house of Ifrael, save only when David & some of his race, Kings of Inda, held them in Subjection, who knowes not : or who is ignorant of Davids unfriendly behaviour amongst them, when first they were subdued : Surely it was not any argument of Kindred or Alliance betweene Tyrus and Mount Seir. that Hiram held fuch good correspondence with David; even then when Joah slew all the males of Edom: neither was it for their devotion to God, and good affection to Is rael, that the Edomites were fo ill intreated. It feemeth that the piety and ancient wifedome of Elipha? the Themanite was then forgotten, and the Edumeans punished, for being fuch as David in his owne dayes found them. Although indeed the Citie of Teman whence Elipha Z came to reason with Job, is not that in Edumas, but another of the same name, lying East from the Sea of Galilee, and adjoyning to Hus, the country of 30b: and to Such the Citie of Bildad the Suhite; as both such Chorographers who best knew those parts, do plainly shew, and the holy Text maketh manifest. For 706 is faid to have exceeded in riches, and Salomon in wisedome, all the people of the East; not the inhabitants of Mount Seir, which lay due South from Palestina. True it is that Elipha the sonne of Elau had a fon called Teman: but that Fathers were wont in those dayes to take name of their fonnes, I no where finde. And Ifmael also had a fon called Thema: of whom it is not unlike, that Theman in the East had the name: for as much as in the 7. Chap. of the booke of Judges, the Midianites, Amalekites, & all they of the East are called Ismaelites. And he that well confiders how great and strong a Nation Amalec was, which durst give battaile to the Host of Ifrael, wherein were 600000. able men, will hardly beleeve that fuch apeople were descended from one of Esau his grand-children. For how powerfull and number lefte must the forces of all Edom have bin: if one Tribe of them, yea, one Family of a Tribe had bin fo great : furely Mount Seir and all the Regions adjoyning could not have held them. But we no where finde that Edom had to do with Amalec, or assisted the Amalekites, when Saul went to roote them out. For Amalec is no where in Scripture named as a Tribe of Edom: but a Nation of it selfe, if distinct from the Isinaelites. The like may be faid of Midian, that the Founder thereof being fon to Abraham by Cethura, doubtleffe was no Edomite. And thus much in generall for all the Seigniory of the Red-sea coast, which Bozius imagines the Edumeans to have held: if the Edomites in after-times held fome places, as Elan and Esiongaber on the Red Sea shore, vet in Moles time, which was long after the building of Tyre, they held them not. For Moles himselfe faith that I frael did compasse all the borders of Edom: within which limits had Midian flood, Moles must needs have known it : because he had so journed long in that Country : and there had left his wife and children, when he went into Egypt.

But conjectural! Arguments, how probable foever, are needleffe in fo manifest a case. For in the 83. P(al. Edom, Amalec, and Tyre, are named as diffinet Nations: yea the Tyrians and Sidonians being one people, as all good Authours shew, and Bozius himselfe confesseth, were Canaanites, as appeares, Gen.c.10.v.15.6 19. appointed by Cod to have bin destroyed, and their Lands given to the children of Affer, 70f. 29. because they were Idolaters, and of the curfed feed of Canaan, not Coufins to Ifrael, nor professors of the same Religion. For though Hiram said, Bleffed bee God that hath fent King David a wifesome: we cannot inferre that he was of Davids Religion. The Turke hath faid as muchof Christian Princes, his confederates. Certaine it is, that the Sidonians then worshipped Astaroth; and drew Salomon also to the same Idolatry.

Whereas Hiram ayded Salomon in building the Temple, he did it for his owne ends, receiving therefore of Salemon great provision of Corne, and Oyle, and the offer of 20. Townes and Villages in Galilee. And if we rightly confider things, it will appeare that Hiramin all points, dealt Merchant-like with Salomon. He allowed him Timber, with which Libanus was, and yet is over-peftered, being otherwise apt to yeeld filkes: as the Undarine filkes which come from thence, and other good commodities. For Corne & Oyle, which he wanted, he gave that which he could well spare to Salomon. Also Gold for Land: wherein Salomon was the wifer; who having got the gold first, gave to Hirane the worst Villages that he had: with which the Tyrian was ill pleased. But it was a neceslary policy which inforced Tyrus to hold league with Ifrael. For David had subdued Moab, Ammon, Edom, the Aramites, and a great part of Arabia, even to Euphrates : thotough which Countries the Tyrians were wont to carry and re-carrie their Wares on Camels, to their fleets on the Red Sea, and backe againe to Tyrus: fothat Salomon being Lord of all the Countries through which they were to passe, could have cut off their

CHAP.9.5.1.

But the Ifraelites were no Sea-men, and therefore glad to share with the Tyrians in their adventures. Yet Salomon, as Lord of the Sea-townes which his Father had taken from the Philistims, might have greatly distressed the Tyrians, & perhaps have brought them even into subjection. Which Hiramknowing, was glad (and no marvaile) that Salomon rather meant as a man of peace to employ his Fathers treasure in magnificent works, than inpurfuing the conquest of all Syria. Therefore he willingly ay ded him, and sent him cunning workmen, to encrease his delight in goodly buildings, imageries, and infirm ments of pleafure.

As these passages betweene Salomen and Hiram, are no strong Arguments of pieticin the Tyrians: fo those other proofes which Bozins frames negatively upon particular examples are very weake. For what the Religion of Cadmus was, Ithinke, no man knowes. It feemes to me, that having more cunning than the Greekes, and being very ambitious, he would faine have purchased divine honours: which his Daughters, Nephwes, and others of his house obtained, but his owne many misfortunes beguiled him of such hopes, if he had any. Thales and Pherecydes are but fingle examples : Every falvage Nation hath some wisedome excelleth the Vulgar, even of civill people. Neither didthe morall wisedome of these men expresse any true knowledge of the true God. Only they made no good mention of the gods of Greece: whom being newly come thither, they knew not. It is no good argument to fay, that Cadmus and Thales being Tyrians, are not knowne to have taught Idolatry, therefore the Tyrians were not Idolaters. But this is 10 of force, That Carthage, urica, Leptis, Cadil, and all Colonies of the Tyrians (of which Ithinke, the Ilands before mentioned in the Red Sea to have beene, for they traded in all Seas) were Idolaters, even from their first beginnings: therforethe Tyrians who planted them, and to whom they had reference, were so likewise.

This their Idolatry from Salomons time on-wards is acknowledged by Bolius, who would have us thinke them to have beene formerly a strange kind of devout Edomites. In which fancie he is so peremptory, that he styleth men of contrary opinion, Impios politicos, as if it were impiety to thinke that God (who even among the Heathen, which have not knowne his name, doth favour Vertue and hate Vice) hath often rewarded morall honesty, with temporall happinesse. Doubtlesse, this doctrine of Bozius would better have agreed with Julian the Apollata, than with Cyril. For if the Allyrians, Greeks, Remanes, and all those Nations of the Gentiles, did then prosper most, when they drew neerest unto the true Religion: what may be said of the soule Idolatry which grewin Rome as fast as Rome it felfe grew: and was enlarged with some new superstition, almost upon every new victory : How few great battailes did the Romanes win, in which they vowed not either a Temple to some new god, or some new honour to one of their old gods ? yea, what one Nation, fave onely that of the Jewes, was subdued by them, whole gods they did not afterward entertaine in their City ? Only the true God, which was the God of the Jewes, they rejected, upbraiding the Jewes with him, as if he were unworthy of the Romane Majesty : shall we hereupon enforce the lewd & foolish conclusion which to Heathen writers used against the Christians in the Primitive Church: That such Idolary had caused the Citie of Rome to flourish, and that the decay of those abominations did also bring with it the decay of the Empire ? It might well be thought fo, if prosperitiewere a figne or effect of true Religion. Such is the blinde zeale of Bozins, who writing against those whom he falfely termes impious, gives strength to such as are impious indeed. But fuch indifcretion is usually found among men of his humour; who having once either foolishly embraced the dreames of others, or vainely fashioned in their owne braines any strange Chimera's of Divinity, condemne all fuch in the pride of their zeale, as Atheists & Infidels, that are not transported with the like intemperate ignorance. Great pitie it is, that fuch mad dogges are oftentimes incouraged by those, who having the command of many i tongues, when they themselves cannot touch a man in open and generous opposition, will wound him fecretly by the malicious vertue of an Hypocrite.

CHAP. IX

Of the Tribe of Ephraim, and of the Kings of the ten Tribes, whose head was Ephraim.

§. I.
Of the memorable places in the Tribe of Ephraim.

Aving now past over Phanicia, we come to the next Territotic adjoyning: which is that of Ephraim: sometimes taken per excellentiam for the whole Pfal 59.78. Kingdome of the ten Tribes. Ephraim was the fecond sonne of Toseph, 108. Paras, whose issues when they left Egypt were in number 45000 all which dying in the Defarts, (Josus excepted) there entred the Holy Land of their childrengrowne to be able men, 32500. who fate downe on the West side of Jordan, beo tweene Manasse, and Benjamin: who bounded Ephraim by the North and South; as Fordan, and the Mediterran Sea, did by the East and West.

The first and chiefe Citie which Ephraim had, was Samaria, the Metropolis of the Kingdome of Ifrael, built by Amris or Homri King thereof, and feated on the toppe of the Mountaine Somron, which overlooketh all the bottome, & as farre as the Sea-coast. It wasafterward called Sebaste, or Augusta, in honour of August. Cafar. This Citie is often remembred in the Scriptures: & magnificent it was in the first building; for as Brochard. observeth, the ruines which yet remaine, and which Breehard found greater than those of Hierusalem, tell those that behold them, what it was when it stood upright : for to this day there are found great store of goodly Marble pillars, with other hewne and carved oftone in great aboundance, among the rubble.

It was beaten to the ground by the fonnes of Hireanus the high Priest: restored and built by the first Herod the sonne of Anipater: who to flatter Casar called it Sebaste. Herein were the Prophets Helisans and Abdias buried: and so was John Baptist. It now hath nothingbut a few Cottages filled with Grecian Monkes.

Neere Samaria towards the South, is the Hill of Bethel, & a towne of that name : on the top of which Mountaine, Jeroboam erected one of his golden Calves, to be worshipped: with which he feduced the Ifraelites.

In fight of this Mountaine of Bethel, was that ancient Citie of Sichem; after the restau-sichar. Joh. 4.5. ration called Neapolis, now Pelofa, and Napolafa: It was destroyed by Simeon and Levi, Maborthan inrevenge of the ravishment of their fifter Dina: and after that by Abimelec evened with Josepharaman, the foyle. Jeroboam raised it up againe : and the Damascens a third time cast it downe.

Under Sichem toward the Sea standeth Pharaton or Pirhathon, on the Mountaine Ama- Judgarias leathe Citie of Abdon Judge of Ifrael. And under it Bethoron of the Levites, built as it is 2 King. 13. faid by Sara, the daughter of Ephraim. Neere to this Citie Judas Macchabaus overthrew Sermand Lyfias, Lievtenants to Antiochus. In Diospolis (faith Wil. of Tyre) was S. George beheaded, and buried : in whose honour and memory Justinian the Emperour caused a faire Church to be built over his Tombe, these be Tyrius his words : Relieta à dextris lecis maritimis Antipatride, & foppe, per laie patentem planitiem Elu:heriam pertranseuntes, Liddam quæ est Diospolis, ubi & egregii Martyris Georgii nique hodie Sepulchrum oftenditur, pervenerum, ejus Ecclesiam quum ad 10 honorem ejuschem Martyris, pius & orthodoxus Princeps Romanorum, Augustus Justinianus multo studio & devotione prompta adificari praceperat, &c. They having left (faithhe) on the right hand, the Sea Townes Antipatris, and Joppe, passing over the great open plaine of Elutheria, came to Lidda, which is Diospolis: where the sumptuous Tombe of the famous Martyr S. George is at this day [hewed; whose Church, when the Godly and Orthodox Prince of the Romanes, High and Mighty Justinian, had commanded to be built, with great earnestnesse and present devotion, Ge. Thus farre Tyrius: by whose testimonie, we may conjecture that this S. George was not that Arrian Bishop of Alexandria; but rather some better Christian: for this of Alexandria was flaine there in an uprore of the people, and his ashes cast into the Sea, as Ammianus Marcellinus reports. And yet also it may be, that to this Georgius was a better Christian, than he is commonly thought: for his words of the Temple of Genius, How long shall this Sepulchre stand? occasioned the uprore of the people against him: as fearing lest he would give attempt to overthrow that beautifull Temple. This also Marcellinus reports; who though he fay that this Georgius was also deadly hated of the Christians, who else might have rescued him : yet he addeth, that his alles, with the ashes of two others, were therefore cast into the Sea, lest if their Reliques had bin gathered up, Churches should be built for them, as for others. But for my part, Inther thinke that it was not Georgius, whose name lives in the right honorable Order of our Knights of the Garter, but rather another, whom Tyrins above cited, witneffether have bin buried at Lidda or Diospolis. The same also is confirmed by Vitrias . S. Hierome affirmes that it was sometime called Tigrida, and while the Christians inhabited the Holy Land, it had a Bishop Suffragan.

Neere to Lidda or Diospolis standeth Ramatha of the Levites, or Aramathia: afterward Rama, and Ramula, the native Citic of fofeph, which buried the body of Christ. Therease Tribeof Ben : many places which beare this name of Rama; one they fet in the Tribe of Judaneer Jamin cap. 12. Samuel lived, and wherein he is buried.

From hence to the North alongst the coast are Helon, or Ajalon of the Levites, of the which I Chron. 6. Apollonia, of which Josephus in his Antiquities, and in the warres of the Jewes . Also Balfalifa (for which Junius, 2. Reg. 4.42 reades planities Shalista) they place hereabout in this Tribe of Ephraim; but Junius upon 1. of the Kings of the ten Tribes from Jeroboam to Achab.

F the first Kings of Israel I omit in this place to speake, and reserve it to the Catologue of the Kings of Juda: of whom hereafter.

Touching the acts of the Kings of the ten Tribes, but briefly, beginning after the division from Juda and Benjamin, now it followers to speake. The first of these Kings Jeroboam the sonne of Nebat, an Ephrathite of Zereda, who being a man offirength and courage, was by Salomon made overfeer of the buildings of the Munition in Hierufalem, for as much as belonged to the charge of the Tribes of Ephraim and Meresser so many of them as wrought in those works. Hierusalem, he encountred the Prophet Ahijah: who made him know that he was by God destinied to bee King of Ifrael, and to command ten of the twelve Tribes. After this, fearing that those things might come to Salomons knowledge, he fled into Egypt to Shiflak, whom Eusebins calleth Osochores, whose Daughter hee married: the Predeceffor of which Shifbak (if not the same) did likewise entertain Adad the Edumaan, when he was carried young into Egypt from the fury of David, and his Captaine Joab; which Adad, the King of Egypt married to his Wives fifter Taphnes; using both him and Jero. boam as instruments to shake the Kingdome of Judaa; that himselfe might the easilier spoile it, as hee did : for in the fift yeere of Reboboam, Sbishak fackt the Citie of Hierusalem, and carried thence all the treasure of David and Salomon, and all the spoiles which to David tooke from AdadeZer of Soba, with the presents of Tohu, King of Hamath, which were of an inestimable value.

This Jeroboam after the death of Salomon became Lord of the ten Tribes : and though he were permitted by God to governe the Ifraelites, and from a meane man exalted to that state: yet preferring the policies of the world before the service and honour of God (as fearing that if the Tribesunder his rule should repaire to Hierusalem to doe their usuall Sacrifices, they might bee drawne from him by degrees) hee erected two golden Calves, one in Dan, and another in Bethel, for the people to worship (an imitation of the Egyptian Apis, faith S. Ambrose, or rather of Aarons Calfe in Horeb:)further he made election of his Priests out of the basest and unlearned people. This King made his chiefe feate and Palace at Sichem: Hee despised the warning of the Judean Prophet, whom Josephus calleth Adon, and Glycas Joel: his hand thereafter withered, and was again restored: but continuing in his Idolatry; and hardened upon occasion that the Prophet returning was flaine by a Lyon, Ahijah makes him know that God purposed to root out his posterity.

Hee was afterward overthrowne by Abia King of Juda, and died after he had governed two and twenty yeeres; whom Nadab his fon fucceeded: who in the fecond yeere # Kin. 11.12. &c. of his raigne, together with all the race of Jerobeam, was flaine, and rooted out by Basha, who raigned in his stead: so Nadab lived King but two yeeres.

Baasha the sonne of Ahijah, the third King after the partition, made war with Asa King ? of Juda: he seated himselfe in Thersa: and fortified Rama against Juda, to restrainether excursions. Hereupon Asa entertained Benhadad of Damascus against him, who invaded Nepthalim, and destroyed many places therein: the mean while Asa carried away thems terials, with which Baasha intended to fortifie Rama; but being an Idolater, he was threat-* Kinas & 16. ned by Jehu the Prophet, that it should befall his race, as it did to Jeroboum : which afterward came to passe: He ruled soure and twenty yeares, and died.

To Baasha succeeded Ela his sonne, who at a scast at his Palace of Thersa, was inhis cups slaine by Zambris, after he had raigned two yeeres: and in him the prophecie of Je hu was fulfilled.

Zambris succeeded Ela, and affurned the name of a King seven dayes; but Ambris inte venge of the Kings murther, fet upon Zambris, or Zimri, and inclosed him in Thus, and enforc't him to burne himselfe.

1 Kin-16. 1 Kin.16.

Ambris or Homri succeeded Ela, and transferred the Regall seat from Ther sa to Samiria: which he bought of Shemer, built, and fortified it. This Ambris was also an Idolater no lesse impious than the rest : and therefore subjected to Tabremmon, King of Syriathe Father of Benhadad according to Eusebins, Nicephorus, and Zonaras: but how this should stand, I doe not well conceive; seeing Benhadad the sonne of Tabremmon was invited by Asa King of Juda, to assaile Baasha King of Israel, the Father of Ela, who forewent Ambris. This Ambris raigned twelve yeeres, fixe in Therfa, and fixe in Samaria, and left, two children, Achab and Athalia.

§. III.

Of Achab and bis Successors, with the captivity of the ten Tribes.

Chab or Ahab succeeded Omri, who not onely up-held the Idolatry of Jeroboam, borrowed of the Egyptians : but hee married Jesabel the Zidonian : and as 30 robeam followed the Religion of his Egyptian Wife: so did Achab of his Irds nian: and erected an Altar and a Grove to Baal in Samaria. He suffered Jezabel to kill the Prophets of the most high God. God sent famine on the land of Israel. Achab met Elias: Flias prevailed in the triall of the facrifice, and killeth the false Prophets; and afterward flyeth for feare of Jezabel.

Benhadad not long after befreged Samaria: and taken by Achab, was by him fet at liberty : for which the Prophet (whom Glycas calleth Michaus) reproveth him:afterward he caused Naboth by a false accusation to be stoned. Then joyning with Josaphat in the warre for the recovery of Ramoth, he was flaine, as Michaes had foretold him.

He had three fons, named in the Scripture, Ocho Zias, Joram, and Joas: besides seventie to other fons by fundry wives and concubines.

OchoZias succeeded his father Achab. The Moabites fell from his obedience: hebrui- Bedgebub was fedhimselfe by a fall: and sent for counsell to Beelzebub the god of Acharon. Eliab the the same with Prophet meeteth the messenger on the way: and missiking that OchoZias sought helpe faith Viginere from that dead Idoll, asked the meffenger, If there were nota God in Ifrael? Ocho Lias upon Levi. fendeth two Captains, and with each fifty fouldiers to bring Eliah unto him, both which *King. with their Attendants were confumed with fire. The third Captaine befought mercy at Eliahs hands, and he spared him, and went with him to the King, avowing it to the King that he must then die; which came to passe in the second yeare of his raigne.

Joram, the brother of OchoZias by Jezabel, succeeded: He allured Josaphat King of Ju-20 de, and the King of Edom to a flift him against the Moabites, who refused to pay him the tribute of 20000. sheepe. The three Kings wanted water, for themselves and their Horfes, in the Defarts. The Prophet Elisha causeth the dirches to flow. The Moabites are Kin to overthrown: their King flyeth to Kirharaseth, and being besieged, according to some Expolitors, burnt his fon on the walls as a Sacrifice, whereat the three Kings, moved with compassion, returned and left Moab, wasting and spoyling that Region. Others, as it seems with better reason, un derstand the Text to speake of the sonne of the King of Edom, whom they suppose in this irruption to have been taken prisoner, by the Moabites, and that the King of Moab shewed him over the walls, threatning, unlesse the fiege were dissolved that he would offer him in facrifice to his gods. Whereupon the King of Edom befought those of Juda and I frael to break off the fiege for the safety of his son: which when the other kings refused to yeeld unto, & that Mosh, according to his former threatning, had burnt the King of Edoms sonne upon the rampire, that all the assailants might discernit, the King of Edom being by this sad spectacle inraged, for sook the partie of the other Kings, for want of whose affistance the siege was broken up.

After this the King of Aram fent to Joram, to heale Naaman the Captaine of his Armie of the Leprofie. The answer of Joran was, Am I God to kill, and to give life, that he doth fend to heale a man from his Leprofie: adding, that the Aramite fought but matter of quarrell against him. Elisha hearing thereof, willed the King to fend Naaman to him; promising that he should know that there was a Prophet in 1/3 o rael: and so Naaman was healed by washing himselfe seven times in Jordan. Elisha refused the gifts of Naaman; but his servant GehaZi accepted a part thereof: from whence the fellers of spirituall gifts are called Gehalites, as the buyers are Simonians of Simon & Kings

Afterward Benhadad King of Aram, or Damastus, having heard that this Prophet did discover to the King of Ifrael whatsoever the Aramite consulted in his secretest counfell, fent a troope of horse to take Elisha: all whom Elisha strooke blinde, and brought them captives into Samaria: Foram then asked leave of the Prophet to flay them, Elisba forbad him to harm them: but caused them to be fed and sent back to their own Prince

The King of Aram notwithstanding these benefits, did againe attempt Samaria, and brought the Citizens to extreme famine. Joram imputeth the cause thereof to the Prophet Elisha. Elisha by prayer caused a noise of Chariots and armour to sound in the ayre, whereby the Aramites affrighted, fled away, and left the fiege. An act of great admiration, as the same is written in the second of Kings. After this, when AZeel = King. obtained the kingdom of Sgria by the death of his Master, Joram entring upon his fronther, took Ramoth Gilead: in which war he received divers wounds, and returned to Jezreel to be cured. But whilest he lay there, Jehu (who commanding the Armie of Joram in Gilead, was anointed king by one of the children of the Prophets fent by Elisha) surprised Hh 2 and flew both him and all that belonged unto him, rooting out the whole posteritie of

. Jehu, who raigned after Jehoram, destroyed not onely the race of his fore-goers, but also their religion; for which he received a promise from God, That his seed should occupie the Throne unto the fourth generation. Yet he upheld the Idolatry of Jeroboam, for which he was plagued with grievous warre, wherein he was beaten by Hazael the Aramite, who spoiled all the Countries to the East of Jordan: in which warre he was flaine, faith Cedrenus: whereof the Scriptures are filent. Jehu raigned 28. years.

Joachaz or Jeboahaz the sonne of Jehu succeeded his father, whom Azael and his son Benhadad often invaded, and in the end subjected, leaving him onely 50 horse, 20 chariots, and 10000. foot; and, as it is written in the Scriptures, he made them like dust bearen into powder. Joachaz raigned 17.years.

After Joachaz Joss his sonne governed Ifrael, who when he repaired to Elisha the Prophet as he lay on his death-bed, the Prophet promised him three victories over the Aramites: and first commanded him to lay his hand on his bow, and Elisha covered the Kings hands with his, and bad him open the window westward (which was toward Da. masons) and then shoot an arrow thence out. Hee againe willed him to beat the ground with his arrowes, who smote it thrice and ceased: The Propher then told him, thathe should have smitten five or six times, and then he should have had so many victoriesover the Aramites as he gave frokes. And foit fucceeded with Joss, who overthrew the 10 Aramites in three battels, and recovered the Cities & Territory from Benhadad the fon of AZael, which his Father Joachaz had loft. He also overthrew Amazia King of Juda, who provoked him to make the warre, whereupon he entred Hierufalem, and fackedit. with the Temple. This Joss reigned fixteene yeeres, and died; inwhose time also the Prophet Elisha exchanged this life for a better.

Jeroboam the third from Jehu, followed Joss his father, an Idolater as his predecelfors; but he recovered all the rest of the lands belonging to I frael, from Hamath which is negre Libanus, to the dead Sea, and reigned one and forty yeeres.

Zacharias the fift and last of the house of Jehn, flainby Shallum his vassall, who raigned in his flead, governed fixe months. Shallam held the Kingdome but one moneth, be- 10

ing flaughtered by Menahem of the Gadites.

Menabem who tooke revenge of Shallum, used great cruelty to those that did not acknowledge him : ripping the bellies of those that were with childe. This Menahembeing invaded by Phul, bought his peace with ten thousand talents of filver, which he exacted by a Tribute of fifty shekels from every man of wealth in Ifrael. Menahem governed twenty veeres.

Pekahiah or Phaceia, or after Zonaras, Phacefia succeeded, and after hee had rulid two yeeres, he was flain by Phaca or Pekah the Commander of his army, who raigned in his place. In this Pekahs time, Phulasfar, or Tiglat-Phylasfar invaded the kingdome of Ifrael, and wan Jion, Abel-Bethmaacah, Janoach, Kedesh, Hazor, and Gilead, with all these Cities of Galiles, carrying them captives into Affyria: he was drawne in by Achaz King of Judaa, against Pekab and Rezin, the last of the Adades. For Achas being wastedby Pekah of Ifrael, and by Rezin of Damaseus, did a third time borrow the Churchriches, and therewith ingaged the Affrian, who first suppressed that Monarchy of Syria and Damascus, and then of Israel: and this inviting of the great Asyrian, was the utter runc of both States, of Ifrael and of Judaa. Pekah raigned 20. years.

Then Holhea or Ofea, who flew Pekah, became the vaffall of Salmanaffar; but hoping to shake off the Affrian yoake, he sought and from So, or Sua, or Sebiene King of Benti which being knowne to the Affyrian, he cast him into prison, besieged Samaria, and mar firedit: carried the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Ninive in Affiria, and into Rages in Mi-16 dia, and into other Easterne Regions, and there dispersed them: and replanted Samaria with divers Nations, and chiefly with the Cutha (inhabiting about Cutha a river in Perfia, or rather in Arabia Deferta) and with the people Catanei bounding upon Syria, and with those of Sepharvajim (a people of Sephar in Mesopotamia upon Euphrates, of whole conquest Senacherib vaunteth) also with those of Ava, which were of the ancient Avins, who inhabited the Land of the Philifims in Abrahams time, dwelling neere unto Gall whom the Caphtorims rooted out: and at this time they were of Arabia the Defart, cal led Havai, willing to returne to their ancient feats. To these he added those of Chamath or Ituraa, the ancient enemies of the Israelites, and sometime the Vassals of the Adads of Damascus, which so often afflicted them. And thus did this Assyrian advise himselfe better than the Romanes did. For after Titus and Vespasian had wasted the Cities of Judæa and Hierusalem, they carried the people away captive: but lest no others in their places, but'a very few simple labourers, besides their owne thin Garrisons, which soone decayed: and thereby they gave that dangerous entrance to the Arabians and Saracens, who never could be driven thence againe to this day.

And this transmigration, plantation, and displantation, happened in the yeare of the world 3292. the fixth yeare of Ezekiah King of Juda: and the ninth of Hose the last 10 King of Ifrael.

Of the memorable places of Dan, Simeon, Juda, Reuben, Gad, and the other halfe of Manasse.

Of Dan, whereof Joppe, Gath, Accaron, Azotus, andother Townes,

Ow following the coast of the Mediterran Sea, that portion of Land affigned to the Tribe of Dan, joyneth to Ephraim, whereof I spake last: of which Family there were numbered at Mount Sinai 62700. last: of which Family there were numbred at Mount Sinai 62700. fighting men, all which leaving their bodies with the rest in the Desarts, there entred the Holy Land of their sons 66400. bearing v.46. arms. The first samous Citie in this tribe on the Sea-coast was Jopannia and the Lo. of Folia: one of the most ancientest of the World, and the most famous of others on that coast, because it was he Port of Hierusalem. From hence Jonas imbarked himselfe when he fled from the truice of God, towards Tharsis in Cilicia. In the time of the Macchabees this City retived many changes: and while Judas Macchabaus governed the Jewes, the Syrians Maccata at were Garrison'd in Joppe, having their fleet in the Port, invited 200 principall Cizens aboord them, and cast them all into the Sea: which Judas revenged by firing their cet, and putting the companies which fought to escape to the sword.

It was twice taken by the Romanes, and by Cestius the Lievtenant utterly burnt and ruined. But in the yeare of Christ, 1250. Lodowicke the French King gave it new Wals and Towers: It is now the Turkes, and called Jaffa. There are certaine Rockes in that Port, whereunto it is reported, that Andromeda was fastned with chains: and from thence delivered from the Sea-monster by Perseus. This Fable (for so I take it) is confirmed by Josephus, Solinus, and Plinie. Marcus Scaurus during his office of Ædileship, shewed the bones of this Monster to the people of Rome. S. Hierome upon Jonas speakes of it indifferently.

The next unto Joppe was Jamnia, where Judas Macchabaus burget the rest of the Synan fleet: the fire and flame whereof was seene at Hierusalem, 240 furlongs off. It hads fometime a Bishops seate, saith Will of Tyre; But there is no signe of it at this time, that fuch a place there was.

After Jamnia is the Citie of Geth or Gath, sometime Anthedon, saith Volatteran. And fo Montanus seemes to understand it. For he sets it next to Egypt, of all the Philisim Cities, and in the place of Anthedon. But Volatteran gives neither reason nor authority for his opinion; for Ptolomie fets Anthedon farre to the South of Joppe: And Geth was the first and not the last (beginning from the North) of all the great Cities of the Philistims: and about fixteene miles from Joppe: where S. Hierome in his time found agreet Village of the same name. It was sometime the Habitation and Seminarie of the Antikims, strong and Gyant-like men, whom Josua could not expell, nor the Danites aftern him, nor any of the Israelites, till Davids time: who slew Goliath, as his Captaines did divers others not much inferiour in strength and stature unto Goliath.

Roboam the sonne of Salomon rebuilt Geth: Ozias the sonne of Amazia destroyed it againe. It was also laid waste by Azael King of Syria. Fulke the fourth King of Hienlilem, built a Castle in the same place out of the old ruines. Whether this Geth was the fame that Will. of Tyre in the Holy warre calls Ibiilin, I much doubt : the error growing by taking Geth for Anthedon.

Not Farre from Geth or Gath standeth Bethsemes, or the house of the Sunne. In the fields adjoyning to this City (as is thought) was the Arke of God brought by avoked two Kine, turned loofe by the Philistims: and the Bethfemites presuming to lookether. in, there were flaine of the Elders 70 and of the people 50000 by the ordinance of God After which flaughter & the great lamentation of the people, it was called the great 'A * Or rather not bel, faith S. Hierome. Benedictus Theologus findes three other Cities of this name; one the Citie it felf . Nephtalim : another in Juda: and another in Isachar. Hierome finds a fifth in Benjamin.

Keeping the Sea-coast, the strong City of Accaron offereth it selfe, somtime one of the five Satrapies, or Governments of the Philiftims. S. Hierome makes it the same with Car faria Palæstinæ. Plinie confounds it with Apollonia: It was one of those that defendant Ark, the change selfe against the Danites and Idumæans. It worshipped Beel-7ebub the god of Homes of being easie fro Flies. To which Idoll it was that AhaZiah King of Israel, sent to enquire of his health which fignifieth whose messengers Eliah meeting by the way, caused them to returne, with a sorrowill assone, to Abel answer to their Master. This City is remembred in many places of Scripture.

Christianus Schrot placeth Azotus next to Geth, and then Accaron or Ekron. Azotus or Afdod was alfo an habitation of the Anakims, whom Josuab failed to destroy, though he once possest their Citie. Herein stood a sumptuous Temple, dedicated to the Idoll Dagon: the same Idoll which fell twice to the ground of it selfe, after the Arke of God was by the Philistims carried into their Temple: and in the second fall, it was Father of Pha- utterly broken and defaced. 6. II. THE TRIBEOF SIMEON.

He Tribe of Simeon takes up the rest of the Sea-coast of Canaan, to the border of Egypt: who being the fecond fon of Jacob by Lea, there were increased of that Family while they abode in Egypt, as they were numbred at Mount Sinai, 5 9300. able men, all which ending their lives in the Defarts, there entred the Land of Promite of their ifflies 22200. bearing armes, who were * in part mixed with Juda, and in part fevered inhabitions from the state of red, inhabiting a small Territory on the Sea-coast, belonging to Eduman, of which the divers places first Citie adjoyning to Dan, was Ascalon.

The Regult or pettic Kings thereof were called Afcalonita: of which Volatteran out of tion of fulls, be Xanthus, in the History of the Lydians, reports, that Tantalus and Ascalus were the sons reckned in this of Hymeneus: and that Ascalus being imployed by Aciamus King of the Lydians, with an 19,0169. 2.Sam. 1.

In Davids time it was one of the most renowned Cities of the Philistims: for henameth Gath and Ascalon onely, when he lamenteth the death of Saul and Jonathan: not speaking of the other three. Tell it not in Gath, nor publish it not in the streets of Ascalon: It is now called Scalone. Gabinius restored it as he did Azotus and Gaza.

Next to Ascalon food Gaza or Gazera, which the Hebrewes call Hazza, the Syrians AZan, of AZonus (as they fay) the sonne of Hercules. Other prophane writers affirme, that it was built by Jupiter. Pomp. Mela gives the building thereof to Cambyfes the Per. fian; because belike he re-builtit, and Gaza in the Persian tongue is as much to sayas Treasure. This Gaza was the first of the five Satrapies of the Philistims, and the South bound of the land of Canaan towards Egypt. But this Citie was farre more ancient than Cambyfes, as it is proved by many Scriptures. It was once taken by Caleb: but the ftrength of the Anakims put him from it. At fuch time as Alexander Macedon invaded the Empire 10 of Persia, it received a Garrison for Darius: in despight whereof it was by the Maceda.

Alexander Janneus King of the Jewes surprized it, and slew five hundred Senatorsin the Temple of Apollo, which fled thither for Sanctuary: but this Gaza was not fet up in the same place againe, to wit, on the foundations which Alexander Macedon had overturned, but somewhat nearer the Sea side: though the other was but two mile off. It was a Towne of great account in the time of the Macchabees, and gave many wounds to the Jewes till it was forst by Simon: of which he made so great account, as that hee purpofed to refide therein himfelfe, and in his absence left John his sonne and Successour to be Governor. In Brochard his time it was still a goodly Citie, and knowne by the name to

At the very out-let of the River of Befor, standeth Majona the Port of Gaza: to which the priviledge of a Citie was given by the great Constantine, and the place called Conflance after the name of the Emperours Sonne. But Julian the Apostata soone aftersavouring the Gazeans, made it subject unto them, and commanded it to bee called Gaza maritima.

Fos 13.4219.21. On the other side of Befor standeth Anthedon, defaced by Alexander Janneus, restord by Herod, and called Agrippias, after the name of Agrippa, the favourite of Augustus.

Then Raphia, where Philopater overthrew the great Antiochus: and beyondit Rhino-Fof. 13. ant. 19. cura, whose Torrent is knowne in the Scriptures by the name of * the Torrent of Egypt, 40 21.14.6.6. * Tomins calls it till the Septuagint converted it Rinocura to difference it, Es. 27.12. giving the name of vallis Egypi, the Citie to the Torrent that watereth it. Plinie calls it Rhinocolura: and Josephus Rhino-the name of the Corura: Epiphanius reports it as a Tradition, that at this place the world was divided freems to. be Sichor. g Sam.30.

Within the Land and upon the River of Befor they place Gerar: which the Scripture in the margent. a placeth between Kadesh & Shur, Gen. 20. 1. That it was neer to the Wildernesse of Burreful. Manich of Thebah, it appeares Gen. 20.31. and therefore no marvell that as elsewhere Beer-sheba, o in Ancorato, Gen. formetime Gerar, be made the South bound of Canaan. It was of old a diffinct Kingdome from the Philistim Satrapies: the Kings by one common name were called Abimeleth; S. Hierome faith that afterward it was called Regio falutaris, the healthy Country: fo that it was no marvel that Abraham and Isaac lived much in those parts. Of King Asa's conquest of the Cities about Gerar, see 2 Chron. 14.14.

More within the Land was Siceleg or Tsiglak, which was burnt by the Amalekitts, when David in his flying from Saul to the Philiftims had left his carriages there, but Da. widfollowed them over the River of Befor, and put them to the flaughter, and recovered the prey.

Next Dabir sometime Cariath-Sepher, the Citie of Letters, the Universitie, as they fay, or Academie of old Palastine. In Saint Hieromes time it seemes it had the name of Daema: Jos. 15.49. it is called urbs Sanna: from the name, as it seemes, of some of the Anakims, as Hebron was called urbs Arbahi. For even hence also were these Giants expelled. It was taken this fly by Othomel, incouraged by Calebs promife of his Daughter John Assessment of his Daughter of his in marriage: but that Josus and the Hoast of Israel were at the surprise, it appears Jos. 10. 39. This Citie Jos. 21.15. is named among those which out of simeon and Juda were given to the Levites. And hence it feemes they attribute it to this Tribe.

Besides these, there are many others in the Tribe of Simeon, but oflesse same, as Hajin, of which fof. 19.7. which also Je. 21. 16. is reckoned for one of the Cities of the Levites. given out of the portion of Juda and Simeon, (for which Junius thinks Hafham is named 1 Chron. 6.59. though * in the place of Josus these two are distinguished) also Tholad, so * Andalso named i Chron.4.29. for which Jof. 19.4. we have Elibelad. Chaizar-Sufa, fo named, 1 Chron.4.34 Jos. 19.5: for which Jos. 15. we have Char Zar-Gadda, both names agreeing in fignification: for Gadda is Turma, and Sufa Equitatus.

Inthefame places of Josus, and of the Chronieles Chorma is named, which they thinke to be the lame with that of which Num. 14.45 . to which the Amalekises and Camaanites pursued the Ifraelites: But that Chorma cannot be in Simeon, nor within the Mountaines of Edumea. For Ifrael fled not that way : but backe againe to the Campe, which lay to the South of Edumea, in the Defart.

The same places also name Beersheba in this Tribe: so called of the Oath betweene Abraham and Abimeles: neer unto which Hagar wandered with her sonne Ismael. It was Gen. 21.316 allo called the Citie of Ifaac, because he dwelt long there. While the Christians held the Holy Land, they laboured much to strengthen this place, standing on the border of the Arabian Defart, and in the South bound of Canaan. It hath now the name of Gibelin. Theother Cities of Simeon which are named in the places of Josus, and of the Chronicles above noted, because they helpe us nothing in storie, I omit them. In the time of Ezekia King of Juda, certaine of this Tribe being strengthened in their owne Territories, passed . Asit seemes to * Gedor, as it is 1 Chron. 4.39. (the fame place which Jof. 15.36. is called Gedera and inthe Land of Gederothaima) which at that time was inhabited by the iffue of Cham: where they feated Juda Secinthe themselves : as also five hundred others of this Tribe, destroyed the Reliques of Amales of this Chapter in the Mountaines of Edom, and dwelt in their places.

The mountaines within this Tribe are few, and that of Samples the chiefest: unto Jud. 16.30 which hecarried the Gate-post of Gaza. The Rivers are Befor, and the Torrent of Egypt called Shichar, as is noted in Affer.

THE TRIBEOF FUDA.

F Juda the fourth fon of Jacob by Lea, there were multiplied in Egypt 74600. all which (Caleb excepted) perished in the Defarts. And of their sons there entredthe Land of Canaan 76500. bearing armes. Agreeable to the greatnesse of this number was the greatest Territorie given, called afterward Judaa: within the bounds whereof were the portions allotted to Dan and Simeon included. And many Cities named in those Tribes, did first, as they say, belong unto the Children of Juda: who ada kind of Soveraigntie over them: as Succoth, Cariathiarim, Lachis, Bethsemes, Tiglag, Beersbeba, and others. The multitude of people within this small Province (if it be meated by that ground given to this Tribe only were incredible, if the witnesse of the Scripfures had not warranted the report. For when David numbred the people, they were ound five hundred thou fand fighting men.

The Cities of Juda were many. But I will remember the chiefest of them : beginning with Arad, or Horma, which standeth in the entrance of Judea from Idumea. whose King first furprized the Israelizes as they passed by the border of Canaan towards Moab, and Numaria. ookefrom them some spoyles, and many prisoners: who being afterward overthrowne Joseph ythe specifies, the some sof Keni, the Kinsinen of Moses, obtained a possession in Judicate. that place: from which name of Acrabbim, Hierome thinkes that the name of the Toparchie called Acrabathena was denominated: of which we have spoken in Manasses. On the South fide also of Judaa they place the Cities of Jagur, Dimona, Adada, Cedes, Ashna Jethnam, and Afor or Chatfor, most of them Frontier Townes.

And then Ziph: of which there are two places so called: one besides this in the body of Juda, of which the Defart and Forrest adjoyning tooke name: where David hid himselfe from Saul. After these are the Cities of Efron, Adar, Karkah, and Ascemona, or Hast.

Turning now from Idumaa towards the North, we finde the Cities of Danna, Sh. mah, Amam, the other Afor, or Chatfor, Behaloth, and the two Sochoes : of all which fee to Jos. 15 . also Carioth, by Josua 15. 25. called Kerioth: whence Judas the Traitor was called If-carioth, as it were a man of Carioth. Then Hetham the abode of Sampson which Rehoboam re-edified. Beyond these towards the North border, and towards Elutheropo. lis, is the Citie of Jethar, or Jathir, belonging to the Levites. In Saint Hieromestimeir was called Jethira: and inhabited altogether with Christians: neere unto this Citie was Hetham, though it were within that remarkable battell fought betweene Afa King of Juda and Zara King of the Arabians, who brought into the field a Million of fighting men: and was notwithstanding beaten and put to flight: Afa following the victorie as farre as Gerar, which at the fame time he recovered.

Notfar from Jether standeth Jarmuth, whose King was slain by Josus, and the Cities overturned. Next unto it is Marefa the native City of the Prophet Michea : betweenin 2 Macca2-35. and Odolla Judas Macchabaus overthrew Gorgias, and fent thence ten thousand Dragmas of filver to be offered for Sacrifice.

O dolla or Hadullam it selfe was an ancient and magnificent Citie, taken by Fosus, and the King thereof flaine. Jonathan Macchabam beautified it greatly. Then Cesta or Kula afterward Echela, where David sometime hid himselfe: and which afterward he delivered from the affaults of the Philiftims: neere which the Prophet Abacue was buried: whose monument remained, and was seene by S. Hierome.

Neere it is Hebron, sometime called the Citie of Arbah, for which the Vulgar hath Ciriatharbe: the reason of this name they give, as if it fignified the Citie of foure: because w the foure Patriarchs, Adam, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were therein buried, but of Adam it is but supposed: and it is plain by the places 30s.14.14. and 15.13. and 20.11. that itbab here doth not fignifie four, but that it was the name of the Father of the Gianiscalled Anakim, whose fon asit seemes Anak was : and Achiman, Sheshai, and Talmai, (whom Caleb expelled, Fof. 15.) were the fons of Anak, Num. 13.23. The name of Anak fignifich Torquem, a chaine worne for ornament; and it feems that this Anak inriched by the fpoiles which himselfe and his father got, wore a chain of gold, and so got this name and leaving the custome to his posteritie, left also the name: so that in Lasine the name of Anakim may not amisse be expounded by Torquati.

The Citie Hebron was one of the ancientest Cities of Canaan, built seven years before Thom or Tank in Egypt: and it was the head and chiefe Citie of the Anakims, whom Caleb expelled: to whom it was in part given, to wit, the Villages adjoyning, and the reft to the Levites. It had a Bishop in the Christian times, and a magnificent Temple builtby

Not farre hence they find Eleutheropolis, or the free Citie, remembred often by Saint Hierome. Then Eglon, whose King Dabir affociated with the other foure Kings of the A. morites, to wit, of Hierusalem, Hebron, Jarmuth, & Lachis, besieging the Gibeonites, were by Josua utterly overthrown. From hence the next Citie of same was Emaw afterward Nicopolis, one of the Cities of Government or Prasidencies of Judaa. In sight of this Ci tie Judas Macchabaus (after he had formerly beaten both Apollonius and Seron) gaves 4.39. as is above third overthrow to Gorgias Lievtenant to Antiochus.

Inthe yeare 1301. it was overturned by an earth-quake, faith Eusebius. Inthe Chri-

From Emaus toward the West Sea there are the Cities of Nahama, Bethdagen, and Valle Terebinibis, Gader or Gedera, or Gederothaima, of which and of Gederoth, * 36.15.36. and 41. quereti-Valablus AZecha, to which Josua followed the flaughter of the five Kings before named, a City of keepsthe He-brem reading in great strength in the Valley of a Terebinth, or Turpentine, as the Vulgar readeth, 1 Sam. 17.2. whence (as it feemes) they feate it neere unto Soco, and unto Lebna of the Levites. It revolted from the subjection of the Jewes, while For am the son of Fosaphat ruled in Hierusalem: And next unto this standeth Maceda, which Fosus utterly dispeopled.

On the other fide of Emaus towards the East standeth Bethsur, otherwise Bethsura, and Bethler: one of the strongest and most sought for places in all Juda. It is seated on a high Hill; and therefore called Bethfur (the house on the Rocke, or of strength.) It was fortified for antiby Roboam, and afterward by Judas Maschabaus. Ly fins fore tit, and Antiochus Eutaper Maccie. by famine, Jonathas regained it; and it was by Simon exceedingly fortified against the Syrian Kings.

CHAP. 10. 5.3.

Beshlem is the next unto it within fixe miles of Hierufalem, otherwise Lebem: some-Gen. 3.48. time Ephrata; which name, they fay, it had of Galebs wife, when as it is so called by Moles before Caleb was famous in those parts, Gen. 38. 16. Of this Citie was Abellan, or Ib-Zan, Judge of I frael after Jephtah, famous for the thirty fonnes and thirty daughters begotten by him. Elimelec was also a Bethlemite, who with his wife Naomi fojourned in Moab during the famine of Juda in the time of the Judges, with whom Ruib the daughter in law of Naomi returned to Beshleem : and married Boo Z. of whom Obed, of whom I/has, Ruthi. of whom David. It had also the honor to be the native City of our Saviour Jesus Christ; and therefore shall the memorie thereof never end.

In Zabulon of Galileethere was also a City of the same name: and therefore was this Hieron in comfe of our Saviour called Bethleem Inda.

Therest of the Cities in this part (most of them of no great estimation) we may passe by untill we come to the magnificent Castle of Herodium, which Herod erected on a Hill, mounting thereunto with 200. Marble steps, exceeding beautifull and strong. Of others which stand single, there is that of Hebron, at the foot whereof was that Oake of Mamre, where the three Angels appeared to Abraham; which S. Hierome calleth a Fir-tree, and faith, that it ftood till the time of Constantine the younger. There is also that Mountaine called Collie Achilla, on the South of Ziph: on the top whereof the great Herod, inclofing the old Castle, erected by Jonathan Macchabaus, and called Massada, garnished it with 27 high and strong Towers : and therein left Armour and furniture for an hundred thou fand men; being as it fee meth a place unacceffible, and of incomparable strength.

In the Valley afterward called the Dead Seasor the lake Asphaltitis, this Countrie had a foure Cities, Adama, Sodom, Seboim, and Gomorra, destroyed with fire from Heaven for their unnaturall finnes.

6. ITH. distribution and the THE TRIBE OF REUBEN, and his Borderers.

The feats and bounds of Midian, Moab, and Ammon, part whereof the Reubenites wanfin Schon King of Hesbon.

N the other fide of the Dead Sea, Reuben the eldeft of Jacobs formes inhabital of whose children there were numbred at Mount Sinai 46000. who dying with the rest in the Desarts, there remained to possesse the Land promised 43700 bearing armes. But before we speake of these or the rest than inhabited the East side Jordan, something of their borderers : to wit, Midian, Moab, and Ammon, whose land in our writers are confusedly described, and not easily distinguished. And first weenen remember, that out of Abrahams kindred came mighty Families: as by Isaac and July 10 the Nation called Israel, and afterward Jewes; by Esau or Edom the Idumæans: by Ismil, the eldest sonne of Abraham, the Ismaelites : and by Ketura his last wife, the Midianes And againe by Lot, Abrahams brothers fon, those two valiant Nations of the Mounts and Ammonites: all which being but strangers in the Land of Canaan (formerly policy by the Canaanites; and by the Families of them descended) these issues and alliance of Abraham, all but Jacob, whose children were bred in Egypt, inhabited the frontierplass

Efau and his fonnes held Idumæa, which bounded Canaan on the South, I small took from the South-east part of the Dead Sea; stretching his possession over all Arabia Pe træa, and a part of Arabia the Defart, as far as the River of Tigris, from Sur to Havidin

Moab tooketherest of the coast of the dead Sea, leaving a part to Midian, and passing over Arnon, inhabited the plaines betweene Jordan and the Hills of Abarim, or Arnon, as farre North as Effebon, or Chesbon.

Ammon fatedown on the North-east side of Arnon, and possess the Tract from Rabba, afterward Philadelphia, both within the Mountains of Gilhead, and without themas far forth as Aroer, though in Moles time he had nothing left him in all that Valley: for the Amorites had thrust him over the River of Jaboc, as they had done Moab over Arnon. As these Nations compassed fundry parts of Canaan, so the border betweene the River of Jaboc and Damascus was held by the Amorites themselves, with other mixt Nations all which Territoric on the East fide of Jordan, and on the East fide of the Dead Sea, was granted by Moses to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and halfe Manasse; whereof that part which Moab had, was first possest by the Emins, a Nation of Giants weakned and broken by Chedorlahomer, after repulsed by the Moabites, as before remembred. That which the Ammonites held, was the Territorie and ancient possession of the Zamzummins Zuwi, who were also beaten at the same time by Chedorlahomer, Amraphel, and the relt and by them an easie way of conquest was prepared for the Ammonites.

Now where it is written that Arnon was the border of Moab, the same is to be under stood according to the time when Moses wrote. For then had Sehon or his Ancesto heaten the Moabites out of the plaine Countryes, between Abarim and Jordan, and driven them from Hesbon over Arnon; and this happened not long before Moses arrivallupon that border, when Vaheb governed the Moabites. For hethat ruled Moab when Moles past Arnon, was not the son of Vaheb, but his name was Balac the son of Zipper. And it may be that those Kings were elective, as the Edum wans anciently were.

Now, all that part of Moab between Arnon and Jordan, as far North as Ellebon, was inhabited by Reuben. And when Ifrael arrived there out of Egypt, it was in the possession of Schon, of the race of Canaan by Amoreus: and therefore did Jephtab the Judge of Ilrael infly defend the regaining of those Countryes against the claime of the Ammonites: because (as he alledged) Moses found them in the possession of the Amorites, and not in the hands of Moab or Ammon: who (faith Jephtah) had 300. years time to recover them, Judg. 11. and did not: whence he inferreth that they ought not to claime them now.

And left any should marvell why the Ammonites in Jephtahs time should make claim nothese Countries: whereas Moses in the place Num. 21. v. 26. rather accounts them to have been the ancient possession of the Moabites, than of the Ammonites: it is to be noted that Deut. 3.11. when it is faid that the Iron bed of Og was to be seen at Rabbath, the chiefe Citie of the Ammonites, it is also signified, that much of the Land of 0g, which the Israelites possessed, was by him or his Ancestors got from the Ammonites, as much of Schons was from the Meabites.

And as the Canaanire Nations were feated so confusedly together, that it was hard to Joseg veras. diffinguish them : fo also were the sons of Moab and Ammon, Midian, Amaleck & Ismael. Finishnotes Yetthereason seemeth plaine enough why Ammon commanded in chiefe, in Jephtahs half of the land time: for sometime the one Nation, sometime the other of all those borderers acquired of Hammon the Soveraignty: and againe, that one part of the Land which Gad held, namely, within which in this the mountaines of Galaad, or Gilbead, and as farre South as dream helogoday. themountaines of Galaad, or Gilhead, and as farre South as Arroer, belonged to the Am-faid to have bin monites. And therefore taking advantage of the time, they then fought to recover it a- given to the Gagain. Yet at fuch time as Moses overthrew Sebon at Jaha? the Ammonites had lost to the first from the Amorites all that part of their possession which lay about Arreer, and between it and 3a-Amorites by bee: Schon and Og. two Kings of the Amorites, having displanted both Moab and Ammon placeDeut. 1.11. of all within the Mountaines. For it is written in the one and twentieth of Num. v. 24. provesthat afthat Ifrael conquered the Land of Sehon from Arnon unto Jaboc, even unto the children of had gotten Ammon : fo as at this time the River of Jabor was the South bound of Ammon, within lands out of the the Mountaines, when as anciently they had also possessions over Jaboc, which at length hands of the the Gadites possess, as in the 13. chapter of Jos. 25. it appeares.

Of the memorable places of the Reubenites.

He chief cities belonging to Reuben were thefe, Kedemoth, for which the Vulgar, without any shew of warrant, readeth Jethson. The Vulgar or Hieromefollowed Joseph 370 the Septuagint, those two verses, 36. and 37. in Fes. 22. being wanting in the old Hebrew Copies, and the Septuagint reade Kedson for Kedmoth, which Kedson by writing flipt into fethfon.

This City which they gave to the Levites, imparts her name to the Defart adjoining: Deut. 2.6. from whence Mofes fent his Embassage to Schon. In the same place of Josua where this lt was amargi-Redemoth is mentioned, the Vulgar for Betfer & villa ejus, reads Bofor in folitudine Mifor, Deut, 3 wherewithout any ground from the Hebrew: whence Adrichomius makes a Town called Mi-the 70 kept the fr, in the border betweene Reuben and Gad. It was thither (faith Josephus) that Herod fent John Baptist, and whereinhe was slaine: his armie soone after being utterly overthrowne by Aretas King of Arabia, and himselfe after this murther never prospering. Not farre from Machærus was Bosor or Bozra, atowne of refuge, and belonging to the Levites, and neare it Livias upon Jordan, which Herod built in honour of Livia the mother of Tiberius Cafar.

To the North of Livias is Setim or Sittim: where the children of Israel imbraced the daughters of Midian or Moab: and where Phineas pearced the body of Zimri and Coshi, with his speare, bringing due vengeance upon them when they were in the midst of their, finne; and from hence Josus sent the discoverers to view Jerico, staying here until he went over Jordan. As for the Torrent Setim, which in this place Adrichomius dreams of, reading Joel.3.18. irrigabit torrentem Setim: The vulgar hath torrentem spinarum; and Junius, vallem Cedrorum: expounding it not for any particular place in Canaan: butfor the Church, in which the just being placed, grow as the Cedars, Pfal. 92.13.

The plaine Country hereabout, by Moses called The plains of Mosh, where he expounded the book of Deuteronomy to the people a little before his death, is in the beginning of the same book precisely bounded by Moses. On the South it had the great Desart of Paran, where they had long wandred. On the East it had Chatseroth, & Dizahab (of which two, the former is that Gazorus, of which Ptolomy in Palestina : the later was a Tracthen *Thesameasit longing to the Nabathæi in Arabia Petræa, where was *Mezahab, of which, Gen. 36.39.) Rems which by the Geographers called Medava and Medaba. On the West it had Jordan, and onthe North it had Laban (in Junius edition, by the fault of the Print, Lamban, Deuteron. 11.) whencewe read the fame which the Geographers call Libias: & fome confound it with Livias, of which of the plains of even now we spake.

Also on the same North side towards the confines of Colosyria, it had Theophel which allowe whereabout sometime Pella of Colosyria stood: which was in the region of Decapolis, readin the wars and, as Stephanus faith, was sometime called Butis. It is also noted in Meses to be over of David against and, as Stephanus faith, was sometime called Butis. It is also noted in Meses to be over Haner the Am- gainst or necreunto Suph, for which the Vulgar hath the Red Sea, as also Num.2.14: monite. Chro translateth the word Suphah in like manner: whereas in this place of Deuteronomy than 1 is no addition of any word in the Hebrew to fignifie the Sea: and yet the Scripture, what If 16.2. See be this word is foro be taken, useth the addition of Mara, thereby to distinguish it from the region of Suph or Suphah: which doubtlesse was about these plaines of Moab toward the dead Sea: where the Countrey being full of reedes, was therefore thus called: 83 all the red Sea was called Mare Suph, for like reason.

The place in these large plaines of Moab, where Moses made those divine exhaust ons, some fay was Bethabara where John baptized, which in the Storie of Gideon Bod. led Beth-bara. Josephus fayes it was where after the City Abila stood, neere Jordan, 12 place set with Palme trees: which sure was the same as Abel-sittim in the Plainesof Moab, Num. 33. 49. (that fome call Abel-fathaim, and Bel-fathim) which is reckoned by Moses in that place of Numbers for the 42 and last place of the Israelites incamping in the time of Moses: This place is also called Sittim; which word if we should interpret, we should rather bring it from Cedars than from Thornes, with Adrichemius and others It was the wood of which the Arke of the Tabernacle was made.

Toward the East of these plaines of Moab, they place the Cities, Nebo, Baal-Meon, Sibma, and Hesbon the chiefe Citie of Sehon, and Elhahel, & Kiriathaima the featofths Giants Emim. Of the two first of these Moses seemes to give a note that the names were to be changed, because they tasted of the Moabites * Idolatry. For Nebe (instead of Nomen degrum a Which, Junius, Ef. 46.1. reades Deus vaticinus) was the name of their Idoll-Oracle, and Genorum nercor- Baal-meon, is the habitation of Baal. Of the same Idoll was the Hill Nebo in these parts turis me tao, Pl. denominated: from whose top, which the common Translators call Phasgah, 16.4 non assume fes before his death saw all the land of Canaan beyond Jordan. In which story summer transform nomina dothnot take Phasgah or Pisgah for any proper name: but for an appellative, signifying muis.Hof.2.17. a Hill: and so also Vatablus in some places; as Num.21.20. where henoreth that some call Pifgah that top which looketh to Jericho, & Hair as it looketh to Moab, which op nion may be somwhat strengthened by the name of a City of Reuben, mentioned 30/13 20. called Ashdoth-Pisga, which is as much as decursus Fisca: to wit, where the water did runne downfrom Pifga. In the same place of Josus there is also named Beth-Peor belonging to Reaben . To called from the Hill Pear : from whence also Baalthe Idol was What name called Baal-Peor, which they fay was the same as Priapus: the chiefe place of whose wor- they used for called bank to have beene Banoth-Bahal, of which also Jose 3. in the Cities of Reuben: appeare but for which, Num. 22.41. they reade, the high places of Baal (for so the word fignifieth) to nath monit which place Balaak first brought Balaam to curse the Israelites.

. Of divers places bordering Reuben belonging to Midian, Moab or Edom.

Here were besides these, divers places of note over Arnon, which adjoying to Reuben: amongst which they place Gallem, the City of Phalis to whom Saul gave I Sam 25 ule his Daughter Michol from David: but Junius thinks this Towne to be in Benjamin: gathering so much out of Esa. 10.29. where it is named among the Cities of Benjanin. With better realon perhaps out of Num. 21.19. we may fay that Mathana and Nahaliel were in those confines of Reuben: through which places the Israelites past after they had left the Well called Beer: Then Deblat haim, which the Prophet Jeremy threatneth with the rest of the Cities of Moab.

Madian alfo is found in these parts, the chiefe City of the Madianites in Moab: but not Hierem 48. that Midian or Madian by the Red Sea, wherein Jethro inhabited. For of the Madianites there were two Nations, of which thefe of Moab became Idolaters, and received an exceeding overthrow by a Regiment of twelve thousand Ifractites, fent by Moles out of the plaines of Moab: at fuch time as Ifrael began to accompany their Daughters: their five Kings with Balaam the Soothsayer, were then slaine: and their regall Citie with the refidestroyed. The other Madianites, over whom Jethro was Prince or Priest, forgat nor the God of Abraham their Ancestor, but relieved & assisted the Istuelites in their painful travelsthrough the Deforts: and were in all that paffage their guides. In the South border of Moab adjoyning to Edom, and somtime reckoned as the chiefe City of Edom, there Elason. is that Petra which in the Scriptures is called Selah; which is as much as rupes or petra. It was also called Jottheel, as appears by the place, 2 Reg. 14. It was built (faith Josephus) by Lib 4 Ant. 7. Recem, one of those five Kings of the Madianites, flaine as before is faid after whom it was called Recom: Now they fay it is called Crac and Mozera. The Soldans of Egypt, for the exceeding strength thereof, kept therein all their treasures of Egypt and Arabia: of which it is the first and strongest City: the same perhaps which Pliny and Strabo call Nabather, whence also the Province adjoining tooke name: which name seemes to have bin takenat first from Nabajoth the son of Abraham by Kethura. For Nabathea is no where understood for all Arabia Petraa (at least where it is not mis-understood) but it is that Province which neighboureth Judea. For Pharan inhabited by Ismael, whose people Ptolomy calleth Pharanites, in flead of Ismaelites, and all those Territories of the Cusites, Madianites, Amalekites, Ifmaclites, Edomites, or Idumæans, the Lands of Moab, Ammon, b Hu, Sin, and of Og King of Basan, were parts of Arabia Petraa: though it be also true, that some part of Arabia the Defart belonged to the Amalekites, and Ismaelites: all I Chron. 5.19. which Nations the Scriptures in the first of Chronicles the fift, calls Hagarens, of Hagar.

Thiscitie Petra Scaurus befieged with the Roman Army, & finding the place in shew impregnable, hee was content by the perswasion of Antipater, to take a composition of mony, and to quit it. Yet Amasias king of Juda (after he had slaughtered 10000. of the Arabians in the valley called Salinarum) wan also this City . S. Hierome finds Ruth the Modbite to be naturall of this city. In the meane time when the Christians held the kingdome of Hierusalem, it had a Latine Bishop, having before binunder the Greek Church. It is seared Guil Tyrao bell. not far from Hor where Aaron died, & on the other fide towards the North is the river of face. Zareder Zered, by which Moses encamped in the 38. station. Adrichomius describeth the Numb.21.

Save also cannot be found Jos 13.27. inthis place, that is, to the South of Arnon, and under Midian. For after Abraham returned from the pursuit of the Assyrian and Persian Princes, the King of Sodom met him in the Valley of Save or Saveh, which is the Kings Dale, where Abjetom fet up his Monument, as it feemes, not far from Hierusalem. And at the same time Melchizedeck King of Salem of the Dead Sea.

Tow because the Sea of Sodom or the dead Sea, called also the Lake of Ashaliting and the falt fea(in diffinction from the Sea of Tyberias which was fresh water)alfo the Sea of the wildernesse, or rather the Sea of the plaines, is often remembred Hebrew Haraboth in the Scriptures, and in this story also, therefore I thinke it not impertinent to speake every where, & formewhat thereof. For it is like unto the Caspian Sea, which hath no out-let, or disburon of Vatablus, thening. The length of this Lake Josephus makes 180 furlongs (which make 22. miles and Deur 3-17. though Deur 4. a halfe of ours) and about 150. in breadth, which make 18. of our miles and somewhat though Deut 4. a same of cuts, and the control of t 2 Reg. 14.25.the length: and two and a halfe of theirs (which is ten of ours) in breadth. Of this Lakeor reason of this length: name seemes to Sea, Tacitus maketh this report: Lacus est inimmenso ambitu, specie maris, sapore corrupti. or, gravitate odoris accolis pestifer : neq; vento impellitur, neq; pisces aut suitas aquis volune; 10 plaines of Moab patitur, incertum unde super jecta ut solido feruntur periti, imperitiq; nandi perinde attolum which are called Homboth Motur, &c. †. V.

Of the Kings of Moah, much of whose Country within Arnon Reuben possess.

F the Kings of Moab, whose Countrie (within Arnon) Reuben possess thoughnot taken from Moab, but from Sehon the Amorite) few are known. Junius inthe 21. of Num. v. 14. nameth Vaheb, which feems to be the Ancestor or Predecessor of Balac, the fon of Zippor: which Balac fent for Balaam to curse I frael. For fearing to contend with Moses by arms, by the examples of Sehon and Og, he hoped by the help of Balaams curfings or inchantments, to take from them all ftrength and courage, and tocalt on them some pestilent diseases. And though Balaam at the first, moved by the spirit of God, blest Ifrael, contrary to the hope and defire of Moab: yet being defirous in some forttofatisfie him, & to doe him fervice, he advised Moab to fend Madianitish women among the Israelites : hoping by them, as by fit instruments of mischiese, to draw them to the Ido latrie of the Heathen: but in the end he received the reward of his falling from God, and of his evill counfaile, and was flaine among the rest of the Princes of Midian.

After these times the Kings of the Moabites are not named: saving that we finden the first of Chronicles the fourth, that Jokim, and the men of Chozeba, and Josh, and Sareph, all being of the iffue of Juda, sometime had the Dominion in Moab: but as it is written in the same Verse, These also are ancient things: to wit, as some expound it, the V. 228 particulars of these mens Governments are no where extant or remaining: or as others, hac prius fuere, these Families of Juda were once thus famous: but now their posterity choose rather to abide in Babylon, and be Clay-workers to the King there.

Then we finde Eglon King of Moab, who with the helpe of Ammon and Amalee ma-Judg 3. Apred Israel, and commanded them eighteene yeares: which Eglon, Ehud slew in his owne house, and afterward 1000. of his Nation. What name the King of Moab had unto whom David fled fearing Saul, it doth not appear: or whether it were the same against # Sam. 220 whom Saul made warre, it is not manifest, for neither are named. But in respect that this Moabite was an enemy to Saul, he received David, and relieved him; knowing that Saul 1 Sam. 14. , fought his life.

After this, David himselfe entred the Region of Moab, but not likely in the same Kings 2 Sam 8. rime: for hee flaughtered two parts of the people, and made the third part tributarie: whereupon it was faid of David, Moab is my wash-pot, over Edom will I cast my shooe: mea-1 Chron. 18. ning that he would reduce them to fuch an abjection, and appoint them for base ser vices: Plal.60.v.10. and that he would tread downe the Idumæans.

The next King after Davids time, of the Moabites, whose name liveth, was Mesha: who falling from Juda, (perhaps in remembrance of the severity of David) fastened himselfe to to the Kings of Ifrael, and paid tribute to Abab, 100000. Lambes, and 200000. Rams, 2 Reg 3. with the wooll: who revolting againe from Ifrael after the death of Abab, was invaded by Jekoram, with whom joyned the Kings of Juda and Idumæa: and being by these three Kines prest and broken, hee sled to Kir-hareseth, as is else-where shewed. There is also mention made of the Moabites without the Kings name; when that Nation, affifted by the Ammonites and Idumæans, invaded Jeholhaphat: and by reason of some private onarrels among themselves, the Moabites and Ammonites set upon the Idumæans, and flaushtered them: and then one against another, so as Jehoshaphat had a notorious victo- 2 Chron 20, rie over them all, without either blood or wound. Also in the time of Hieremy the Propher, there was a King of Moab which is not named, which was after Melha of Moab Hierem 27. many descents: for Mesha lived with Jehoram, and this Moabite in Zedechias time, fourteene Kings of Judah comming betweene, who wasted three hundred and odde

He Territory adjoyning to Reuben, is that of Gad: whereof all that part which joyned to the Mountaines, was fometime in the possession of the Ammonites, as farre to the South as Arver. Of the children of Gad, the seventh sonne of Jacob Gengo. o by Zipha, the hand-maid of Lea, there parted out of Egypt, and died in the Defart, Num. 132, 45550 and of their sonnes there entred the Land promised, 45000 bearing armes: from the halfe Tribe of Managle the River of Jabor divided them: from Reuben the Cities of Hesbon, Elbele, and Aphec.

The chiefe Citie of Gad was Aroer, which they make to be the fame with Ar, or Rab-Ellis bath Moab, the great or commanding Moab. But the learned Junius attending diligently Deut. to those words of Moses, Deut. 2.36. Ab harabero que est in ripa fluminis Arnon of Civitate ipfa que est in flumine : Where the Citicin the River is distinguished from the city upon the banke of the River, as also in like manner Jof. (c. 12.v.2. and c. 13.v.9.) thinketh that Hareher which doubtlesse belonged to the Gadites (as Numb. 32. 34. it is said that they built it) was indeed feated neere Har of the Moabites, but divers from it. For that Har was never possest by Moles, it is plaine Deuteronomy 2.9. where God forbidding Moses to rouch it, saith hee hath given Har for an inheritance to the sonnes of Lot. Now that this Citie, which in divers places is faid to be within and in the middle of the River of Arnon (and so diftinguished from Haroher, which is said in the same places to bee on the banke of Arnon) is Har of the Moabires, the fame Junius provethour of Numb. 21. 15. where Arnon is faid to bee divided into divers streames, where or among which Har is feated: And the same is confirmed by the place of Jos. 13. 25. where Ha-Toher is faid to bee seated before Rabbah : which Rabbah, as it seemes, cannot beethe

Of this Citie among the restos much as planties. Moab, both Esay and Hieremy prophecied, that it should perish, and the Lakes about runne with the blood of the Inhabitants. It was a great village neere Arnon in S. Hieroms

Keeping the bankes of Arnon, one of the next Cities of fame to Aroer, was Beimin. rah, of which Esay prophecieth, That the watersthereof should be dryed up: and all thewal of Moab withered. Not farre from Bethnimrah in this tribe Adrichomius placeth Jogbin, and Nobach or Nobe: of both which we read in the story of Gideon: and that Jogbin was in Gad, built by the Gadites, it appeares, Numb. 32. 35. and therefore Nobachallo must needs bee in these parts; but whether in Gad or Manasse it is not certaine: onely that it was anciently called Kenath, Moles witnesseth. Nobach also (faith hee) went and took Kenathwith her Towns, and called it Nobach of his owne name, where because the vers precedent speake of the Manassites, and because it is not likely that Moses would have vered this feat of the Gadites from the rest, of which he spake before, 2.34.35.36 there fore it may seeme that this * Nobach was in that part of Manasse which was in the Est of Fordan, though Adrichomius place it in Gad. For whereas he supposeth it to bethe that, and plane or Juraun, thought saul destroyed, of this we shall speak a in the Tribe of Benjamin. cedin the bor fame with Nob, which Saul destroyed, of this we shall speak a in the Tribe of Benjamin. der of the king-And as for that Karkor where Zebah & Zalmunnah rested themselves in their slightsom Gideon, to which place Gideon marched through this Nobach and Jogbeha, though some towards Banka, and make it the same with Kir-chares, of which Esay 15 and 2 Reg. 3.25. p it is notalioge yet there can be no certainty that it was in Gad: and if it be the fame with Kir-chares, it is the runprobable yet there can be no certainty that it was in Gad: and if it be the fame with Kir-chares, it is the runprobable yet there can be no certainty that it was in Gad: and if it be the fame with Kir-chares, it is that it was in certaine that it was still a principall Citie held by the Moabites, and not in the Tribe

In the body of this Tribe of Gad they place Hataroth: of which name the Scripture Num-32-34-35. witnesseth that two Cities were builded by the Gadites; the former simply called Hataroth, the later Hatroth-Sophan: for which later the vulgar makes two Cities, Koth and Shophan : the name Hataroth, is as much as Corona.

In the Valley of the Kingdome of Sehon, together with Bethnimrah, of which we have fpoken, Josua cap. 13. v. 27. nameth Beth-haram and Succoth: the former, Numb. 32.36. (where it is called Beth-haram) together with Bethnimra, is faid to have bin built by the Gadites, which (perhaps the rather, because in Josbua it is called Beth-H aram) some take b Jost ant. 18. to be Betaramptha, (of which Josephus) after by Herod called Julias. But whether this Bttaramptha were corrupted from Beth-Haram, or from Beth-Aramatha (of which Arama cL.T.Ant.c.T. that here is mention in Josephus) or from Beth-Remphan (of which Remphan, an Idellof This Greenseader those Countries, wee reade, Ad. 7. 43. and to which Junius referres the name of the least seasons. Lating Rabatha Citie Rephan, I Macchab. 37.) of this question it were hard to resolve. But touching M. tropolis Ham- Julias (according to Josephus sometime Bataramptha) the same Josephus placeth in the Region of Peras beyond Jordan, which Regio peras, as the Greeke word fignifieth, is no more than Regio ulterior, the Countrie beyond the River; and therefore they which labour to fet downe the bounds of this Perea, take more paines than needs. Foureteen Villages this Julias had belonging unto it, according to Josephus. Hee makes it to have been Ant.20.XX built by Herod Antipas, and named Julias, in honour of the adoption of Livia Augustus his wife, into the Julian Family: by which adoption she was called Julia. Another Julian Family: 83. as, he faith was built by Philip the brother of Herod, in the lower Gaulanitis, which hee Bel. Judg. 2.8. faith, is the fame as Bethfaida.

Upon the Sea of Galilee neere to Julias in Peras, (that is, in the Region over Fordan) they finde Vete Inbra, as it is called in Josephus, for Beth-eZob, which is as much as domus Josephule Bel. hillopi. Of a noble woman of this Citie, which for fafegard in the time of Warre with Judg 1.7.5. the Romanes, came with many others into Hierufalem, and was there belieged. Josephus in the place noted, reports a lamentable History; how for hunger she ate her own childe,

Of Succost b (which we faid Jof. 13. is placed with Ben-baran, in the Valley of the Kingdome of Schon) it is plaine by the story of Gideon that it is neere unto Jordan: where it is Judg. 8.54 hid that as he was past Jordan with his three hundred, wearie in the pursuite of Zebah and Zalmunnak, he requested reliefe of the men of Succoth: who denying him, and that withcomempt, in Gideons returns were by him tortured, as it feemes under a threshing Carre or Tribulum, betweene which and their flesh he put Thornes to teare their flesh as 2 Sam 12.31; o they were prest and trod under the Tribulum, and after which fort also David used some of the Ammonites, though not with Thornes, but with Iron teeth of the Tribulum. As for the name of Succost, which fignifieth fuch Tabernacles as were made in hafte, either for Men or Cattell, Moses, Gen. 33.17. witnesseth that the original of the name was from suchharbours, which Jacob in his returne from Mesopotamia built in that place: as also Exod.12.37 the place beyond the Red Sea, where the children of Ifrael, as they came from Ramefes in Egypt, had their first Station, was upon like reasoncalled Succoth: because there they fetup their first Tabernacles or Tents: which they used after for forty yeares in the Levit-23-433 Wildernesse. In remembrance whereof the Feast of Succeth, or Tabernacles was in-Stituted.

Other foure Cities of Gad are named Jof. 21.38. Ramoth in Gilead, Machanaim, Chefbon, and Jahzer, all of them by the Gadites given to the Levites, of which Jahzer, as Chefbon or Hesbon was a chiefe City of Sehon, whence Num. 32.1. his Countrie is called the Land of Tahaer. It was taken by Moses, having first fent spies to view it. In the first of Num. 22.32. the Chanicles it is made part of Gilead. In later times (as it may be gathered by the Pro- i Chron. 27-314 phecie of Esay touching Moab)it was possessed by the Moabites: to which place of Esay, Esay 6.8. allo Hieremy in a like prophecie alludes. It was at length regained (but as it seemes from Hierem 48,923 the Ammonites) by Judas Macchabaus: as it is I Macc. 5.8. where Junius out of Tolephu, reades Jahler, though the Greeke hath Galer. For Galer or Geler (as he gathereth out of Jos. 16. 3. 6 8. and Jud. 1.29.) was far from these Countries of Sehon, seated in the West border of Ephraim, not possessed by the Israelites, untill Salomons time, for whom the King of Egypt wanneit from the Canaanite, and gave it him as a Dowrie with his Daughter.

Of Cheshon it may be marvelled that in the place of Josua, and 1 Chron. 6.81. it should be faid to have beene given to the Levites by the Gadites, seeing fof. 13.0.17. it is reckoned for a principall Citie of the Reubenites: Adrichomius and fuch as little trouble themselves with such scruples, finding Casbon, 1 Macc. 5.36. among the Cities of Gilead, taken by Judas Macchabaus, makes two Cities of one: as if this Casbon had beenethe Cheshon of Gad, and that of Reuben distinct from it : but the better reconciliation is; that it being a bordering Citie, betweene Gad and Reuben, was common to both, and Pthat the Gadites gave their part to the Levites, for so also it seemes that in like reason Dibon is faid in one place built by the Gadites, and in another given to Reuben, as before is noted. Of Machanatim, which word fignifieth a double Armie, we reade Gen. 32.2. that it was therefore so called, because the Angels of God in that place met Jacob in manner of another Host or company, to joine with his for his defence: as also Luke 2. 13. wee reade of a multitude of the Host of Heaven, which appeared to the sheepeheards, at the time of our Saviours birth : and fo unto the godly King Ofwald of Northumberland, when hee was soone after to joyne battaile with the Pagan Penda of middle-England, Beda reports, that the like comfort appeared: whence the field where the Battaile was fought in the North-parts of England, is called Heaven-field. In this Gitie of Machanatim, David abode during the rebellion of Abfalom: and the same for the Arength thereof Abner chose for the feat of Isboseth, during the warre between David and the house of Saul.

Of the fourth Towne, which was Ramoth in Gilead, wee reade often in the Scripture for the recovering of which King Achab loft his life. Junius thinkes that Ramatha Min. spa, of which Josua 13. 26. was this Ramoth in Gilead. Concerning the place where La. ban and Jacob sware one to the other, as it was called Gilead, which is as much as a wit. nessing heape, because of the heape of Stones which Laban and his sonnes left for a mo. nument; fo also that it was called Mitspah, which fignifieth over-looking (because there they called God to over-fee and be witnesse to their covenant) it is plaine by the place, Gen. 31. 49. That in these parts there was not onely a Towne, but likewise a Region cal. led Mitspa, it appeares Jos. 11. 3. where wee reade of the Chivites under Hermon, in the Countrey of Mitspa, * the Towns of Mitspa, as it seems both by this place, and in the townes of this name, see in the eighth ver. following, being not in the Hill Countrey, but in the Valley. But seeing that Jephta the Judge of Ifrael, who after he came home from Tob, (whither his brethrenhad driven him) dwelt in this Towne of Mitspa, who doubtlesse was of the Tribeof Ma. Tribe of Benjanasse, and thence at first expelled by his brethren, it may seeme that they doe not well, which place this towne of Mitspa rather in Gad than in Manasse. By Judas Macchaben this Towne of Minspa, (whether in Gad or in Manasse) was utterly spoiled and burns, and w

It is supposed to bee that * Philadelphia repuring this late. teburin this late which Ptolomie findes in Caloffria. Hierome and Califtus in Arabia. It was conquered by mittooke, which Qg from the Ammonites: but as it feemes never possess by the Israelites, after the overmight feeme to throw of og, but left to the Ammonites: whereupon at length it became the Regall feat of the Ammonites, but of old it was the possession of the Zamzummims: which is as much to fay, as men for all manner of craft and wickednesse infamous. The same werealfo called Raphaim, of whom was 03, which recovered much of that which the Ammo nites had got from his Ancestors: who having beene first beaten by the Assyrians, and their assistants (as the Emims in Moab, and the Horims in Seir had been) were afterward the easier conquered by the Ammonites, as the Emirns were by Moab, and the Horims by the Idunarians. Yet did the races of Emoreus, of whom these Giants were descended, contend with the Conquerers for their ancient inheritance : and as Sehon of Hesbon hadding also called Urbs possest Moab, so had og of Basan the Ammonites, and betweene them recovered the bell part of all the Valley, betweene the Mountaines and Jordan. For this og was also master river Fabre's of Rabba or Philadelphia: And in the possession of the one or of the other of these two winding about of Rappa OI Land all those Cities and Countries which were given to Reuben, Gad, it, but in the place 2 Sam. 27, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse. In this Citie of Rabba, was the Iron bed of Og found, nine cubits of length, and foure of breadth. The Citie was taken in Davids time, and the Inhabitants slaine with Deuts. great feverity, and by divers torments. At the first assault therof urias was shor to death, having beene by direction from David appointed to be imployed in the leading of an affault, where he could not escape: wherein also many of the best of the Army perished: and wherein David fo displeased God, as his affaires had ill successe afterward, evento his dying day. From hence had David the waighty and rich Crowne of Gold, which the Kings of Ammon ware: or which, as some expoundit, was used to be put on the head of 2 Santia. their Idoll, waighing a talent, which is 60. pound waight after the common talent. In the will Typ. Belface. time of Christians it had a Metropolitane Bishop, and under him twelve others.

The mountaines which are described within this Tribe, and that of Manasse, with a Strab.l.c. pan of Reuben, are those that Peolomy calleth the hills of Hippus, a City of Caelosyria: and * ready is locus, Strabo* Trachones: the same which continue from neare Damascus, unto the defarts of aper & salerofus Month: and receive divers names, as commonly Mountaines doe, which neighbour and peares that Trabound divers Countries: for from the South part, as farre Northwards as Aftaroth, the chomistresia, in chiefe City of Og, they are called Galaad or Gilead; from thence North-ward they are these parts was properly the hill knowne by the name of Hermon, for fo Moses calleth them : The Sidonians name them country, Shirim, but the Amorites Shenir, others Seir: of which name all thosehils also were called the server for Coche Perode. Hierem. 22. led, which part Judea and Idumea: and lastly, they are called Libanus, for so the Prophet Hiereny makes them all one, calling the high mountains of Galaad, the head of Libanus. These Mountaines are very fruitfull, and full of good pastures, and have many trees which yeeld Ballamum, and many other medicinable drugs. The Rivers of this Tribe Hier. 8.8.91 are the waters of Nimrah, and Dibon, and the River Jabor: others doe also fancy another River, which rifing out of the Rocks of Arnon, falleth into Fordan.

His Tribe of Gad possess halfe the Countrie of the Ammonites, who together with the Moabites, held that part of Arabia petras called Nabathes, as well within as without the Mountains of Gilead; though at this time when the Gadites wanit, it was in the possession of Sehon and Og, Amorites: and therfore Moses did not expell the Ammonites, but the Amorites, who had thrust the issues of Lot over the mountaines Trachones or Gilead, as before. Of Gamala (fo called, because the Hill on which it stood, was in fashionlike the back of a Cammell) which Josephus placeth not farre from Gadara, in the lower Gaulanitis over against Tarichea, which is on the West side of the Sea or Lake of Tiberias, see this Fosephus in the fourth booke of the Jewish warre: where he describes cap. 1.03 the place by nature to be almost invincible: and in the storie of the siege, shewes how Vehillan with much danger of his owne person, entring it, was at first repulsed, with or thervery memorable accidents : and how at length, after the comming of Titus when it was taken, many leaping down the rocks with their wives and children, to the number of five thousand, thus perished: besides foure thousand slain by the Romanes: so that none escaped save onely two women that hid themselves.

About four miles West from Gadara, and as much East from Tiberias (which is on the other fide of the Lake) Josephus placeth Hippus, or Hippene, whence Ptolomie gives Invitafua, the names to the hils that compaffe the plaines in which it standeth: so that it may seem to have been of no small note. It is seated farre from the hill Countrey: on the East of the Lake, as also Plinie noteth lib. 5. cap. 15. tion. Forbesides other adventures, it was taken by L. Annius Lievtenant to Vespasian. and 1000 of the ablest young men put to the sword, and the Citie burnt. In the years 1120.it was rebuilt by Baldwine King of Damascus: and in the same year recovered by Baldwine de Burgo King of Jerusalem: and by him utterly razed. Neare unto Gerasais the village of Magedan, or after the Syriake Magedu, or after the Greek Magdala, where the Pharifees and Sadducees defired of our Saviour a figne from heaven: the fame place or some adjoyning to it, which S. Marke calleth Dalmanutha. By the circumstances of which storie it appeares, that this coast lay between the Lake of Tiberias, and the Countrey of Decapolis. Brochard makes both these places to be one; and findes it to be Phiale. the fountaine of Jordan according to Josephus: but this Phiale is too far from the Scaof Galilee, and from Bethlaida, to be either Magdala or Dalmanutha. For as it appeares by the flory, not farre hence towards the North was the Defart of Beth faida, where Chris filled 5000 people with the five barley loaves and two fishes. On the North of this Bethfaida, they place Julias, not that which was built by Hered but the other by Philip, which boundeth the Region Trachonitis towards the South. It was sometime a Village, and not long after the birth of Christ it was compassed with wall by Philip the Tetrach of Ituraa and Trachonitis: and after the name of Inlia, the wife of Tiberias, called Julias, as hath been further spoken in the Tribe of Gad . whereit was noted that Fosephus makes this Julias to be the fame as Beth Saida. Upon the East file of the same Lake of Tiberras stands Coroz aim, or Corazim, of which Christ in Masshen : Woe be unto thee Corazim.

But the principall Citie of all these in ancient time was Afteroth: sometime people with the Giants Raphaim: and therefore the Countrey adjoyning called the Land of Gi. ants, of whose race was Og King of Basan. In Genesis this Citie is called Asteroth of Conaim, whence I Mac. 5.26. it it called fimply Carnaim, as Jof. 1 3.21. it is called Afternit. without the addition of Carnaim. The word Carnaim fignifieth a paire of Horns, which agree well with the name of their Idoll Astereth, which was the image of a sheepe, asis elsewhere noted, that Astaroth in Deuteronomie signifieth sheepe. Others from the ambiguity of the Hebrew take Karnaim, to have been the name of the people which inhair *Because Horn ted this Cirie: and expound it heroes * radiantes. For of old the Raphai which inhabited when it is polithis Citie (Gen. 14.5.) were Giant-like men, as appeares by comparing the words Dist. 3.11. Og ex residuo gigantum, with the words, Jos. 13. 12. Og ex reliquis Raphacount the Verb of this but if the Karnaim (or Carnajim) were these Raphai, the word would not have been in Noune is some the dual number : neither would Moses in the place of Genesis have said the Raphei in A. steroth of the Karnaim, but either the Raphai in Asteroth of the Raphai, or some other est whereupon way fittest for perspicuity: for this naming of both thus in the same clause, distinguished one from the other.

Not farre from Asteroth, Adrichomius out of Brochard and Breidenbachius placettici dar in the way out of Syria into Galilee, four miles from Corazin. This Citie (faithh) Jacem, gave of gallet, is remembred in the Canticles, and in the book of Judith, and there are that of this Citt bulous painters understand David in his 120. Psalme: and here the Sepulchre of 306 is yet to be seen lain Breidenbach.

Now concerning the Texts which he citeth, it is so that the Greeke hath Galadia stead of the word Cedar, which the Vulgar doth use in that place of Judith, and joynah Carmel and Galilee. The Canticles and the 120. Pfalme doe rather prove that Cedar wis not hereabout, than any way helpe Adrichomius. For that they speake of Scenita Cedareni, it is apparent, and as evident by the place in the Canticles, that they were decilors, much more than any under the Climates of the Land of Canaan: whence Junius out of Lampridius and Plinie placeth them in Arabia Petras, farre from these parts. Touching the Sepulchre of Job, it is certaine that the Arabians and Saracens (holding those places) faine many things to abuse the Christians, and to get money. Further, it may wellbeas-Rup Lyan Oleaf. firmed, that many (if not all) the historicall circumstances of Job are so obscure, that we Rup. Lynan. Uleaps. The Land of Hus or Hus wherein Job dwelt is from the Greck Ourswhich the Septua- For owand an gint use for the word Huts, translated by the Vulgar sometime Hus, as Job 1. 1. sometime ged one into Austin, as Hierem. 25.20. This Land is placed by Junius between Palastine and Calosyria, the other: belides Chamatha (or Hamath) under Palmyrene, in the Countrey called by Ptolomy Tra whence they chonitis or Bathanaa, the bounds of which Countries are confounded with Basan in this Outside. halfe Tribe of Manafes. And that this Land of Hus was thus feated, it may in part bee Hence also by gathered out of the place of fer. 25.20. where he reckons the Hushites among the pro-thers it is calmiscuous borderers of the Israelites, whom he therefore calleth promissions or miscel-led Ausanitis, laneam turbam, because their bounds were not onely joyned but confounded, and their fermes shey Seigniories mingled one with the other: but of this place the words of Hieremie, Lam. 4. readitin the 21 speaking of the same Prophecie, of which he speaketh in the 25. Chapter, must needs in Gento.23. he expounded, as Junius reades them, distinguishing the Land of Hus from Edom: Offla Edomi, O que habitas interra Hutzi O Daughter of Edom O thou which dwellest in the Land of Hus. Now because the Vulgar doth not so diftinguish, but readeth, Filia Edom and habitas in terra Hus; Daughter of Edom which dwelleft in the Land of Hus: Hence, as in feemes, fome of the learned have thought that Job was an Edomite, as we have faid, and King of Edom, which if they understand by it Idumaa or Edom, so called in Moses time, they are greatly mistaken, making this Land of Hus to be in Idumea. For it is very pro- Deut 3.92 bable that Esau when he first parted from Jacob, did not leate himselfe in Edom or Seir, which lyeth on the South border of Judaa, but inhabited Seir far to the East of Jordan, andhelda part of those Mountaines, otherwise called Galaad, and Hermon, which by comprison the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites Shenir, for Seir; and from this hishabitation did Esau incounter Jacob when he returned out of Mesopotamia, who pasfedby the very border of Efay his abiding. It is true that at fuch time as Mofes wandered in the Defarts, that the posterity of Esan inhabited Sear to the South of Judea: for it is like that the Amorites who had beaten both Ammon and Moub, did also drive the Edominesout of those parts, who thence-forward seated themselves to the South of Judea, bordering the Defart Paran, and stretched their habitations over the Defarts as far as Hor where Auron died.

Now for this Hus which gave the name to a part of the Land of Trachonitis, whether it were Hus the fon of Aram, as Junius thinkes in his noteupon Gen. 10.23. or rather Hus the fonof Nachor, Abrahams brother, the question is doubtfull. For my part I rather endine to thinke, that is was Hus the fon of Nachor: partly because these Families of Aram femelong before to have been loft: and partly because in 196 32.2. Elibrathe fourth of whence the July friends, which seemes to be of Jobs own Countrey, is called a Buzite, of Buz the bro-sepungint call ther of Hus, the sonne of Nachor: as also fer. 25 in the same continuation (though some him exequine arbox Marie though some Austride, other Nations named between) where Hus is spoken of there Bu? is also named Neither doth it hinder our conjecture, that in the place of 70b 32. Elibuthe Bullite is faid to bee of the Family of Ram: (which Junius expounds to be as much as of the Familie of Aram) for that by this Aram we are not to understand Aram the sonne of Sem, Junius himselfe makethit plaine, both in his annotation upon the beginning of his book, where he faith that one of Jobs friends (which must needs be this Elibu) was of the posterity of Nachor (salfointhis place he confesseth so much expressly,) and in as much as hee readeth not d simila Aram, or Ram, but & familia Syria; like as elsewhere Laban who forung of Nachor

As for the other three of Jobs friends (of whom by this note of Elihu his being of the See Sixtus Se. Frian Family, or of the Family of Nachor) it is implyed that they were of other kin-nenfit dreds; as also by the Septuagints addition, that this Elihu was of the Land of Hus, or Ausi-taitis implyed that they thought onely Elibu to have beene of Jobs own Countrie. Franciscus Brochard the Monke, in his description of the holy Land in the journy from Moon Eastward, findeth Sweeha, and Theman on the East of the Sea of Galilee: both ve-Yheere to the Land of Hus: whereof the one may seeme to have denominated Bildad the Shachite; the other EliphaTthe Themanite: two of the three friends of Job, of the which Job 2.11. But Junius thinks that the Shuchites were inhabitants of Arabia the Deri, descended of Shuach the son of Abraham and Ketura : of whom Gen, 25.2. perhaps, with he, the fame whom Plinie calls Saccai. So also he thinketh the Themanices of whom Eliphaz was, to have beene of Arabia the Defart: and Eliphaz himselfe to have been of the posteritie of Theman the son of Eliphaz, which was the sonne of Esau. And so also Nahamah, whence T fopher the third of Jobs friends (which in this place of Job. 2. 11. are mentioned) is by the same learned Expositor, thought either to be named of Thinnahby transposition of letters (which Thimnah Gen. 36.40. is named among the sons of E_{fau} that gave denomination to the places where they were feated) or elfe to be the fame N_4 . hamab, which Jos. 15.41. is reckoned for a Citie of Juda in the border, as hee thinkes, of Edom. And yet I deny not but that neere the Land of Hus, in Basan, as it seemes, in the Tribe of Manases, there is a Region which (at least) in later times was called Suite, or of some like name. For this is evident by the Historic of Willielmus Tyrius, which reports of a Fort in this Region of Suita or Suites (as he calls it diversly) of exceeding great Arength and use for the retaining of the whole Countrie: which, in the time of Baldming the second King of Jerusalem, was with great digging through rockes recovered by the Christians; having not long before been lost, to the great disadvantage of the Countrie. while it was in the hands of the Saracens. The fituation of this Fort is by Tyrius defenbed to be fixteen miles from the Citie Tiberias, on the East of Jordan: by Adricheming four miles North-ward from the place where Jordan enters the lake Tiberias at Corain, Other Cities of this part of Manaffes named in the Scripture are these: Golan, Gehill.

Other Cities of this part of Manages named in the Scriptus of the Ifraelites was called thera, Mitsa of Gilead, and Kenath, which after the comming of the Ifraelites was called Nobach. Of Nobach or Kenath, and Mitsa of Gilead, we have spoken by occasion among the Cities of Gad: The other two were given to the Levites, and Golam made one of the Cities of refuge: from which Golam we have both Gaulanitis superior and inserior, of the Cities of refuge: from which Golam we have both Gaulanitis superior and inserior, of the cities of Basan by some, but the writersor Josephus. Behesshithera is accounted the chiefe Citie of Basan by some, but the writersor rupting the name into Bozra, it is consounded with Betser or Bozra of Reuben, and hence Hierom has Bozra of Edom. Argob is oft named for a Region in this Tract, and hence Hierom has Bozra of Edom. Argob is oft named for a Region in this Tract, and hence Hierom has Bozra of Edom. Argob is oft named for a Region in this Tract, and hence Hierom has Bozra of a Citie placed by some about the waters of Merom (as they are called by Josus which make the Lake Samachouitis, as Joseph. cals it. Whenty of the marish ground on both sides, for Lyons and other wilde beasts, which harbour in the shrubs that plemisully grow there.

Adjoyning to this Lake in this Countrey of Manasses, Josephus names two places of strength, fortified by himself in the beginning of the Jews rebellion: Seleucia the one, and so so are the other. In the North side of this halfe Tribe of Manasse, and in the North east, the Scripture nameth divers bordering places toward Danasses, as Tedad, Chanan, and Chaisser-Henan, lying in a line drawne from the West; of which three Cities were exel. 47.15. with which also agrees the place Num. 34.8. where for Chauram, between Exel. 47.15. with which also agrees the place Num. 34.8. where for Chauram, between Tsedad, and Chaisser-Henan, Ziphron is named. The Historie of the Syrians the chiefe borderers of the Israelites

Amascus of all other in this border, and of that part of the world, was the most famous, excelling in Beautie, Antiquirie, and Riches, and was therefore called the Citie of joy or gladnesse; and the House pleasure; and is not onely remembred in many places of Scripture, by the best Historians and Cosmographers. The Hebrewes, saith so by the best Historians and Cosmographers. The Hebrewes, saith so by the best Historians and Cosmographers.

Saint Hierome upon Esay seemeth to bee: though in his Hebrew questions he affirmeth In Eas. 17. that it was founded by Damaseus, the sonne of Eliezer Abrahams Steward; a thing Genas, 2. very unlikely, seeing the Citie was formerly knowne by that name, as appeares by Abrahams calling this his Steward Eliezer of Damaseo. David was the first that subjected it to the Kingdome of Juda, after the overthrow of Adadezer their King, but in Salomons time, Rezon recovered it againe, though he had no title at all or right to that principalitie: but David having overthrown Hadadezer King of Sophena (otherwise Syria Soba or Zoba) Razon or Rezon with the remainder of that broken Armie, invaded Damaseena, and possess Damaseus it selfe, and became an enemie to Salomon all his 1/Reg. 11.40.

Thenext King of Damascus was Adad the Edomite, who slying into Egypt from 1 Reg. 13. David and Josh, when they flew all the males in Edom, was there entertained, and marryed Taphnes the King of Egypts Wives fifter: of whom Taphnes in Egypt was fo called. This Adad returning againe, became an enemie to Salomon all his life, and (as some writers affirme) invaded Damascus, and thrust Rezon thence-out. In the line of Adad that Kingdome continued nine descents (as hereafter may be shewed in the Catologue of those Kings of Syria) to whom the Assyrians and then the Gracians succeeded. This Citie was exceeding strong, compassed with waters from the rivers of Abanah, and Pharpar: whereof one of them, prophane writers call Chryforrhoas, the golden 2 Reg 5. river. Junius takes it for Adonis. The countrey adjoyning is very fruitfull of excellent Wines and Wheats, and all manner of excellent fruits. It had in it a very strong Castle, built as it feems by the Florentines, after it became Christian: the Lillies being found cut Hoold 6.Bell. in many Marbles in that Cittadell. Against this Citie the Prophets Amos, Esay, Jeremie, Sacr. and Zucharias, prophecied that it should be taken, burnt, demolished, and made a heape 1-3.8.10.8 17. offines. In the time of the last Rezon, and tenth King of the Damascens, Teglasphalaster, invited by AchaZ King of Juda, carried away the naturals of Damascus into the East: 2 Reg. 16. leaving of his owne Nation to inhabit it. After that it was utterly ruined by the Babylonians faith Hierome upon E fay: which thing was performed by Salmanaffer, according Efay 170 to Junius in his note upon that place, five yeares after the Prophecie. In time it was reflored by the Macedonians, and the Ptolomies; but long after, when Syriafel into the hands of the Romans, it was taken by Metellus and Lollius. In the time of the Christians it had Forance. an Archbishop: Saint Hierome living, as he affirmeth upon the Alls, it was the Metropolis of the Sarazens: being taken by Haomer their King from the Romans, in the yeare of our redemption 636. and in the yeare 1147. Inthe yeare 14.00. Tamberlaine Emperour of the Parthians, invaded that region, and Herold 160.00 befieged the Citie with an Armie of 1200000. (if the number be not mistaken.) He entred it, and put all to the fword, filling the ditch with his prisoners; those that retired into the Castle, which seemed a place impregnable, hee overtopped with another Castle adjoyning: he forbare the demolishing of the Citie in respect of the beauty of the Church, garnished with 40. gates or sumptuous porches. It had within it 9000. Lanternes of gold and filver: but while he invaded Egypt, they againe surprized Damascus. Lastly, in his returne after three moneths siege, he forc't it: the Mahometans prostrating themselves with their Priests, defired mercie. But Tamberlaine commanding them to enter the Church, he burnt them and it, to the number of 30000. and did so demolish it, as those that came afterwards to see their houses, knew them not by the foundations. And as a Trophey of his victorie, hee raised three Towers with great Art, builded with the heads of those whom he had slaughtered. After this, it was restored and reposses by the Soldane of Egypt with a garrison of Mammalukes: And in the yeare 1517, Selimus Emperour of the Turkes wrested it out of the hands of the Egyptians: Kk 2

Ow be it that Damascus were founded by Hus the son of Aram, or by Damascus the sonne of Eliezer Abrahams steward, we find no relation of their Kings, or Common-wealth till Davids time. For it stood without the bounds of Canage. and therefore neglected by Moses, Josua, and the Judges, as impertinent to that Storie, But were it for that it had some Reguli, or petty Kings over it, as all the Cities of those parts had, yet none of them became famous for ought that is left to writing, till fuch time as David overthrew Adadez er Prince of Sophena or Syria Zoba: the same Nation which Plinie calleth Nubai, inhabiting betweene Batania and Euphrates. Now the bettern understand the storie of those Syrian Princes, whom soone after the Kings of Damascus made their vassals, the Reader may informe himself, That on the North-east parts of the holy Land, there were three chiefe principalities, whereof the Kings or Commanders greatly vexed or disturbed the State or Common-wealth of Ifrael, namely, Damasius or Aram, Sophena or Syria Zoba, and Chamath or Chamath. Zoba; of which these were the Princes in Davids and Salumons times : Razon or Rezon of Damascus, Adadezer of Syris 10 Zeba, and Tohu of Chamath. But it feemeth that Damascus was one of the Cities subjet to AdadeZer when David invaded him, though when Saul made warre against Zoba], mascus was not named. And as Josephu affirmeth, the leader of those succours, which were levied and fent to Hadad-Heger from Damascus, had the name of Adad: who was in that battaile flaine with 22000. Aramites of Damascus: whereof, as of the overthow of AdadeZer, ReZen, the Commander of his Armie, taking advantage, made him like King of Damascus : AdadeZer and Adad of Damascus being both slaine. About the fame time Tohu King of Chamath or Iturea, hearing that his neighbour and enemy Ale deZer was utterly overthrowne, fendeth for peace to David, and presenteth him with rich gifts; but in dolo, faith S. Hierome; it was craftily done of him. Now to the North of the Holy Land, and to the West of Damascus, the Tyrians and Zidonians inhabited: but they for the most part were in league and peace with the Judæans and Israelies. But to returne to the Kings of Syria, I meane of Syria as it is taken in the Scripture, containing Damascena, Soba or Zoba, and Chamath, or Ituraa; to which I may add Gelin, because it is so accounted in the second of Sam. 15. as joyning in the Territorie to Da mascus (for Syria at large is farre greater, of which Palastina it selfe is but a Province al have noted in the beginning of this Tract:) It is not agreed among the Historians offer mer times, nor of our later writers, who was the first of those Adads of Syria Zoba, and

Some account Rezon, others Adad of Idumae: of whom it is written in the fift of Kings, that David having invaded that Region, and left 30ab there to destroy all themak children thereof: Adad of the Kings feed, fled into Egypt; and was there married to Taphnesthe Queens fifter, as before; who hearing of Davids death, and of the death of his Captaine 70ab (whom indeed all the bordering Nations feared) he turned against and as Bunting thinketh, this Adad did expell Rezon out of Damascus, and wasthful of the Syrian Kings. To me it seemeth otherwise. For, as I take it, Adadeg the fonne of Rebob, whom Saul invaded, was the Founder of that Principalitie: and the first of Adads, who for saking his Fathers name, as he grew powerfull, tooke upon him the stile of Adad, the great god of the Asyrians, faith Macrobius, which fignified Onenesse or Unitie. I also finde a Citie called Adada, in the same part of Syria: of which whether these Princes took the name, or gave it, I am ignorant. For Adad-ezer, Ben-adad El-adad were the same in name, with the differences of Ezer, Ben, and Eli, adjoyned And that Adadezer was of greatest power, it appeareth first, because it is against him, than David undertooke the warre: secondly, because he levied 22000. Aramites out of the Territory of Damascus: as out of his proper Dominions: for had the Damascus had a King apart, it is probable that the Scriptures would have given us his name: thirdly, because Syria Zoba, of the most of which AdadeZer was King, was an exceeding lang Territorie, & contained of Arabia the Defart as far as to Emphrates, according to Plinie and the greatest part of Arabia Petræa, according to Niger. Whosoever was the first, whether Adadezer, or Adad of Idumæa, Rezon was the second: Who was an enemie to tree-it. Is rate all the dayes of Salomon. Besides the evill that Adad did, the evill that Hadad did, yeares after he was carried to Hadad of Idumæa, lately returned out of Egypt: to wit, 23.

The third King of Damascus, and of Zobah both, was Hezion ito Hezion succeeded Ta- 1 King 13-18.

The third King of Damascus, and of Zobah both, was Hezion ito Hezion succeeded Ta- 1 King 13-18.

King of Juda the son of Abiam, the son of Roboam, the son of Salomon, being vexed and invaded by Baasha, the successour of Nadab, the son of Feroboam, sent to Benhadad the son of Continuous, the son of Hezion, King of Aram, that dwelt at Damascus, to invade strate so while Baasha sought to fortiste Rama against As: therby to block him up, that he should not enter into any of the Territories of Israel) who according to the defire of As, having received his presents, willingly invaded the Countrie of Nepthalim, and tooke divers Cites, and spoyles thence: As in the meane while carrying away all the Materials, which Baasha had brought to fortiste Rama withall, and converted them to his owne use.

This Benhadads Father Tabremmon was in league with Afa: and fo was his Father He- 1 Res 15.4-18. zion: for Asa requireth the continuance of that friendship from Benbadad, his sonne: thoughit seemeth that the gold and silver sent him out of the Templeswas the most forcible argument. And that this Tabremmon invaded Ifrael, before the enterprize of his some Benhadad, it is conjectured. For Benhadad when he was prisoner with Achab, spake as followeth: The Cities which my Father tooke from thy Father, I will restore: and thou received hall make streetes or keepers of the borders, for thee in Damascus: as my father did in Samaria. And herein there arifeth a great doubt (if the argument it felfe were of much interest. ponance) because Tabremmon was Father indeed to Benhadad which invaded Baasha, at tregate therequest of Asa; But this Benhadad that twice entred upon Achab, and was the second timetaken prisoner, was rather the sonne of Benhadad, the first of that name, the confederate of Afa and Abiam, as before, than the sonne of Tabremmon. For betweene the invalion of Benhadad the first, in Baasha's time, and the siege of Samaria, and the overthrow of Benhadad by Achab, there past 49-yeares, as may be gathered out of the raignes of the Kings of Israel. So that if we allow 30. years, of age to Benhadad, when he invaded Baalha, and after that 49. yeares ere he was taken by Achab, which make eighty lacking one, it is unlikely that Benhadad at fuch an age should make warre. Besides all this, the first Benhadad came with no such pompe; but the second Benhadad vaunteth, that hewas followed with 32. Kings : and therefore I refolve, that Benhadad the fonne of Tabremmon invaded Baasha and Omri; and Benhadad the second invaded Achab, at whose hands this Benhadad received two notorious overthrowes the first at Samaria, by a fally of 700. Ifraelites: the second at Aphec, where, with the like number in effect, a Region the Israelites flaughtered 200000 of the Aramites; besides 27000 which were crushe by the fall of the wall of Aphec. And this Benhadad, Achab againe setteth at liberty: to whom hee rendreth those townes that his father had taken from the Predecessour of Achab, but being returned, he refused to render Ramoth Gilead, a frontier Towne, and of great importance. Now three yeares after (for folong the league lasted) Ramoth not being trigges delivered, Achab invaded Gilead, and befieged the City, being affilted by Josaphas. The Aramites came to succour and fight: in which Achab is wounded, & dyeth that night. After this, Benhadad senderh the commander of his forces called Naaman, to Foram the son of Achab to be healed of the leprofie, and though EliZeus had healed him, yet he picketh quarrell against Foram: and when Foram by EliZeus his intelligence had escaped his plot, 2 Reg. 5. tesent men, and Chariots to take the Prophet, as is aforesaid. After this Benhadad the sonne of Hazael, there succeeded three others by the same name, of whom the Stories are loft, only Nicholaus Damascenus cited by Josephus, makes mention of them; and in one of these Kings times it was that Jeroboam the second, the sonne of Joss, recovered Damasens it selfe to Juda, saith the Geneva, but better in Junius, Uique recuperabat Damascum et Chamatham Jehuda pro Ifraele; that is, Andhin he recovered for Israel, Damascus and Chamatha of Judea; for these Cities somtimes conquered by David, did of right belong to the Tribe of Juda.

And it is likely that this conquest upon the Adads was performed: the first ofthese three Adads then living, of whom there is no Storie. For when as Jehous the King of the ten Tribes had thrice overcome the Syrians in the time of Benhadad the fon of Haqui, and had recovered the Cities which HaZael had won from Ifrael; and so left his Kingdome to his some Feroboam the second; it seemeth that this Feroboam without delay, and having nothing elfe left for him to enterprize, instantly followed his fathers good for tune, and invaded Dama fous.

Razin, or Rezin, after Josephus Rases, after Zonaras Raason the 10. Adad, making league with Pekah, or Phacas King of Ifrael, against Achaz King of Juda; both carry awaya great number of prisoners. After this they both besiege Acha? in Hierusalem: but in van Then Adad alone invadeth Elath, and beating out the Jewes, maketh it a Colonie of 9. rians. Wherefore Achab brought Teglatphalaffar against Razin, who took him, and beheaded him, and won Damascus: with whom ended the line of the Adads and the King dome of Danascus: the Asyrians becomming masters both of that and Israel. These Adads as they raigned in order are thus reckoned.

Benhadad, who invaded Baasha. Benhadad the second, taken prisoner by Achab.

HaZael, whom Elisha foretold, with teares, of his advancement, the same who over threw Joran King of Ifrael at Ramoth Gilead. And that there was a second Hazael which preceded Benhadad the third, it is not improbable, because that Hazael which took Gul and compounded the war with Joss, made the Expedition thirty yeares, and perchand more after the first Hazael which flifted his master Benhadad, and had slaine Foram the fonne of Achab King of Ifrael. For Joss began to raigne in the 7. yeare of Jehu King of Israeland after he had raigned 23 yeares, the Temple was not yet repaired, after which (and how long we know not) it is faid that Hazael took Geth, and turned his face towards Terusalem. It is also some proofe that HaZael that took Geth, was not the same with Ha-Zaelthat murthered Benhadad, because he could not at that time be of good yeares, being as it feemeth, the fecond person in the kingdom, and Commander of Benhadads men of warre. To this HaZael (be he the first or second) succeeded 8 Benhadad the third, whom Joash King of Ifrael thrice overthrew.

Relinor Rezin the last, who joyned with Pekah King of Ifrael, against Juda, at which rime Achaz King of Juda waged for his defence Teglarphalaffer.

Now between Benhadad the third, and Rezin the last, Nicolaus Damascenus finds three other Kings of the Adads, which make twelve in all.

CHAP.II.S.4.

For the rest of the Princes of Syria, which were but Reguli, as those of Emath, and Gesfur, we find that Tohu was King of Emath or Camath in Davids time, to whom he lent & Sam 8 a. his some Foram with presents, after Davids victorie against Adadezer. Also Senacherib Elay 37. fpeaketh of a King of Emath, but names him not.

FGeffur we findetwo Kingsnamed; to wit; Talmai, and his Father Ammibur: to Talmai, whose daughter David married, it was that Absalom fled, who was his maternall grandfather. Of the Kings of Sephena or Syria, Soba or Calofyria there are two named, Rehob or Rechob the Father of Adade Zer, and Adade Zer himselfe; anditis plaine that after his death the feat of the Kings of Seba was transferred to Damasum, a Citie better fitting their greatnesse. After Rezin became Lord of both Principalities. And the race of these Kings of Syria, (which became so potent, and joyned Soba, Damascus, Emath, and the Defart of Arabia, with other Provinces into one, under Rezin thesecond of the Adads) as it began with David, so it ended at once with the kingdom of Ifrael For Aha? King of Juda waged the Afgrian Teglasphalassar against Pekah King of If ael, and against Rezin the last King of Damaseus: which Teglath first invaded Damastena, and the Region of Soba, and tooke Damasteus it selfe, and did put to death Rezin the last, carrying the Inhabitants captive. This was the second time that the Assyrians attempted Ifrael. For first Phul Belochus entred the borders thereof (Menahem governing Ifrael) who stopt the enterprise of Phul with a thousand talents of silver: for this Phil Belochus, whose pedigree we will examine hereafter, being scarce warme as yetin his feat at Babylon, which he, with the helpe of his companion Arbaces, had wrested from Sardanapalus: having besides this King of Syria in his way, who seemed to be a great and strong Prince, was content to take the composition of a thousand talents of the King of Ifrael for that present time. But his sonne Teglath following the purpose of his father Belochus, and finding so excellent an occasion, as the warre begun betweene Ifraeland Judah, Pekah commanding in the one, and Achaz in the other, his neighbour Regin being also wrapt in that warre, and wasted in strength thereby, did willingly accept the offer of Achaz King of Juda, his imprest and entertainment. So, first attempting Damaseus, which lay in his path towards Israel, he carried it (as is before remembred) and then with great ease possest himself of the Cities of Nephthalim; leading with hima great part of the people captive. And his some Salmanasser, whom Ptolomie calleth Nabonaffer, after the revolt of Hofea, forced Samaria, and rent that Kingdome afunder. So as the line and race of Ninus in Sardanapalus, whom Belochus supplanted; the face and Monarchie of the Syrian Adads in ReZin, whom Teglath flaughtered; the Kingdome of Israel in Hosea, whom Salmanasser over urned; happened neere about a time that of Ninus in the dayes of Belochus, and the other two in the dayes of Teglatphalasser, and Salmana ser his son. For Sardanapalus perished, O sia ruling Juda; and the other two kingdomes were diffolved, Achaz yet living.

Lastly, the Kingdome of Juda it selfe, being attempted by Senacherib, the sonne of Salmanasser in vaine, and preserved for the time by God miraculously, was at length

344 utterly overturned. Hierusalem and the Temple burnt 132 yeares after the captivitie of Ifrael and Samaria: the destruction of Ifrael being in the ninth yeare of Hofea: that of Juda in the eleventh of Zedechia. Now the Emperours of Affgria and Babylon held also the Kingdome of Syria, from the eight yeare of Salmanaffar, to the last of Baltaffar, whom Herodoius calleth Labynitus: in all about 200. yeares. After these the Persians from C1.

rus to Darius their last King, held Syria about 200. yeares.

Then Alexander Macedon tooke this among other Provinces of the Persian Empire. his successors the Seleucide raigned therein, till it became subject unto the power of the Romanes, from whom it was wrested long after by the Saracens, and remaineth nowin possession of the Turke, as shall be shewed in due place. Thus much of the Nations borde is ring upon the Israelites, with whom they had most to doeboth in warre and peace, being the only people, whose History in those ancient times carried an affured face of truth.

CHAP. XII.

OF THE TRIBBOF BENJAMIN, and of Herusalem.

Of divers memorable places in the Tribe of Benjamin, whereof Hiericho, Gilgal, Missalli, Missall thel, Rama, Gobah and Gibha.

Fene Tribe of Benjamin, the twelfth and youngest son of Jacob; whom he had by Rachel, there were mustered at Mount Sinai 35000. ale bodyes: all which perishing in the Defarts, there entred the Holyland of their iffues 45600 fit to beare Armes and these had their Terrimit on this fide Jordan, between Juda and Ephraim: The Cities withinhis Tribe neerest Jordan, are Lod, Haded, and Ono: of which, Lodan

One were built by Shemed a Benjamite: they were all three re-inhabited with Boile mites, after the returne out of Captivity, as is mentioned, Nehem. 11.35. and Eld. 2.35 where Adrichemius reading Lod, Hadid, Ono, makes besides Hadid in Nehemia, a Citi called Lodhadid: This Hadid or Chadid was rebuilt by Simon Machabaus.

Samarim or Tiemaraim, named of Tiemary, one of the fons of Canaan, was another of their Cities: and further into the Land standeth Jericho, one of the Toparchies and the last of Juda, seated in a most fruitfull valley, adorned with many palme trees: and there fore elsewhere called the City of Palmes. From the time of Jofus, who utterly deftroy ed it, it lay waste untill the time of Achad: in whose dayes Chiel of Bethel laid the new foundation of it, in the loffe of Abiram his eldest sonne, and built the gates of it in the loffe of his youngest son Segub: according to the curse of Josua: in which and other to spects, Hof. 12.14. calleth Josua a Prophet. In after-times it was destroyed by Vespassan, and re-built by Agrian.

To the Southeast of Jericho stood * Halmon of the Levites, of which 30f.21.18. Toth South Betharaba, of which 30.6.15. and c.18. Then that Gilgal of which there is so much mention in the Scripture, where Jofus first are of the fruits of the land.circumcifed all thost borne in the Defarts, and celebrated the Passeover. The reason of the name, or rather a memorable application of the Erymologic of this name (for it seemes by the place, Deut. 11.30. that the name was knowne before the comming of the Israelites into Canaan) is noted Jos. 5.9.0b devolutionens probri Agyptiati, be cause their fore-skinnes (the people being there circumcised) were tumbled downed the Hill: which from thence was called Collis praputiorum. This Gilgal was also called Gdi loth, as appeares by comparing the places, 30f. 15.7 and 18.17. for it was in the border of Jordan, of which Jof. 22.13. and Geleloth fignifieth borders. It flood (though in for distance) directly Eastward, over against the two * Hils GaraZim and Hebal: upon the one of which the bleffings, and on the other the curfings were to be read to the people both being the mountaines of Ephraim. Further, for the situation of this Gilgal, it is to be nored, that both it, and Mitha of Benjamin (of which also we reade oft in the Scripture) were feated about the midst of the length of the land of Canaan: for which reason & Sa. 2 1 Sam.7.15. muel chose these two places, to either of which he came yearly to give judgement to the Ifraelites; of which two, Gilgal, (as is faid) was neere Jordan on the East fide of this Tribe: and Mitfa neere the West Sea, towards the land of the Philistims.

The third place, which is named with these two, whither also Samuel used yearely to b Faniss in this come, is Bethel: which also was seated in this Tribe of Benjamin. But to return to Gilgal, place, for Bethel which was the first place where the Arke resided, after they past over Jordan (from Despois, and whence it was carried to Silo, and thence to Kiriath-jeharim, and at length to Hierufalem) interpressing herein Gilgal it was that Josua pitched up the twelve stones, which were taken out of the whetethe arke channell of Jordan, when it was drie, that the Ifraelites might passe over it: by which abode. For Storie, as it is fet downe Jof 4-it appears, that the same day that they passed over Jordan, the Law, Exed. they lodged at Gilgal. At the fame Gilgal, to omit many other memorable things, it was 33.17.the greethat Samuel hewed Agag the King of the Amalekites in pieces. And as for Mitfla, whither Samuel came yearely to give judgement, there also were often the greatest meetings feaths were to heldas that for the revenge of the Levites wife against Gibba, and the Benjamites, Ju 20. 1, and another against the Philistims, 1 Sam. 7.12. Thither also Judas Macchabass gatheredthe Jewes, (when Hierusalem was possest by the Heathen) as it is 1 Macch 3.47. in norspeakeof which place this reason of their meeting is added; Qui a locus orationi fuerat Mits antea Madi. Touching this Misspa, to avoide confusion, it is to be remembred, that the Scriptings; and betures mention foure places of this name: Mitspa of Juda, of which Jos. 15.38. Mitspa of Gilead, of which we have spoken already in the Tribe of Gad. Mitspa of the Moabites, the differenter where David for a while held himselfe, commending his Parents to the King of Moab, great meetings 1 Sam, 22.3. and lastly, this chiefe Mitspa of the Benjamites. Necreunto this Mirspa, the Scripture mentioneth Beth-car, after called Aben-Hezer, the Alewas, that is, the Stone of helpe; where Samuel pitched up the Pillar or Stone, for a Trophey i Sam. 10.3.

Touching Bethel, which (as it feemes) was the third place where Samuel held his chiefe Militard Glieds of which the meetings for the ministring of Justice, that it was anciently called LuZ and how it was takenby the iffue of Joseph (though it belonged to the portion of Benjamin, as it is Nehem. by that will added 11.31 and Jos. 18.22.) and how another Citie called Luz Incere adjoyning to it, was built by the man of the Citie which shewed the entrance to the Spies, as it is Jud. 1. and suanoresthe of the occasion of the name from Jacobs vision: and how Jeroboam, by erecting one of three quarters, his calves here, of Bethel (which fignifieth the house of God) made it Beth-azen, that Eath, which s, the house of Vanitie, Hof. 4.15 and 10.5 as also other memorable things of this place, hey are so well known out of the Histories of the Scripture, that we may wel passe them though Adriche

b Secce S. in the Scriptures, Rama, Gidha, and Gebah. Of the name Rama, b it is noted already, in e Of this Ama the description of Ephrain, that there were many townes so called, because of their high fituation. But whereas they finde out Rama in the Tribe of Juda (as it feemes, because Mat. 2. it appeares that it bordered Bethlehem) and also out of Brochard and Breedenbach make Silo to have beene called Rama, and find yet another Rama in Zabulon; the fethree have no warrant in the Scripture. Of Rama in the Tribe of Affer, as it feemes, we have testimonie, 70f. 19.29. and of another in Nephthalim, 70f. 19.36. of a third Rama, where Samuel dwelt in Mount Ephraim, 1 Sam. 25.1. which more often is called & Ramatha. and I Sam. 1. 1. Ramathaim T sophim: for which the Septuagint have Aramathaim Sophim taking the Article affixed in the beginning, for a part of the word, whence they thinke to Joseph of Arimathaa Mat. 27.57. was denominated.

Of a fourth Rams we read 2 Reg. 8.29. which is Ramoth in Gilead. The first, which ward the Welt, is most often mentioned, is Rama of Benjamin, seated, as we said, necre Bethel the uner. most South-border of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes: for which cause Baashainthe time of Afa King of Juda, fortified it, to hinder those that did flie from him to Afa. Of this Rama or Ramatha, I should rather think Joseph was, that buried Christ because it was neerer to Hierufalem, and after the captivitie belonged to Judaa, as it appeares, Efd. 2.26. wherein that it is joyned with Gebab, it is plaine that he speaketh of that Rama with whose stones (after Baasha had ceased to buildit) Asa (asit is I Reg. 25.22.) built Gebal adjoyning to it : both being in Benjamin. And as Rama was the South-border of the tons Tribes, so was Gebah the North-border of the Kingdom of Juda: whence 2 Reg. 23.8. we reade that Josiah through all his Kingdome, even from Gebah, which wash North-border, to Beer-sheba, which was the South-border, destroyed the placesoff-

The third Citie Gibba, which was the Citie of Saul (the wickednesse of which Cities the time of the Judges had almost utterly rooted out this Tribe) Adrichomius confounds with Gebah, making one of two (as they are evidently diftinguished, Efay 10.27.) of which word & Gibba, in another form Gibbath, he imagineth Gibbaath, another Cuit this Tribe, making two of one. The vicinitie of this Citie also to Rama of Benjamina pears Jud. 19.13. where the Levite with his wife, not able to reach to Rama, took uping lodging at Gibba. By that place of 1 Sam. 22.6. it feems that there was in this Gibba form Tower or Cittadel called Rama: where Junius reads in excelso, for in Rama: but it may be that the name of the Kings Palace in this Citie, was Rama: as it feems that in Rama of St. muel, the name of the chiefe place where Samuel with the Colledge of Prophets abode, ws Najoth. The great Citic of Hai overthrowne by Josua, which Jos. 7.2. is placed men Beth-aven, upon the East of Bethel, was in this Tribe, as is proved Neh. 7. 10.30. though it be not named by Jofic. 28. for it was burned by him and laid desolate, as it is Jose 8.88 In solitudinem in tumulum perpetuum. Another Citie of chiefe note is reckoned 10/18. 25. In this Tribe was Gibbon, the chiefe Citie of the Hevites: whose cunning to binde the Ifraelises by oath to fave their lives, is fet downe Jof. 9. whence they were reckned among the * Nethinai or Profelites, and were bound to certaine publique services in the house of God: which oath of faving these Gebeonites, broken in part after by Saul, was by God punished by a famine; 2 Sam. 2 I. I. This Gibeon or Gibbon with Almonand that (of both which we have spoken) and with Hanothoth the natall place of Hieremitthe Prophet, were faid 70f. 21.28 to be given to the Levites by the Benjamites. Neere withis Hanothoth was Nob, as appeares 1 Reg. 2.26. where Abiathar the Prieft, which was of Nob before it was destroyed by Saul, is sent to his grounds at Hanothoth. It is reckoned the mountaines in the Tribe of Benjamin, Neh.9.31. and though in the time of Saul the refiding place of Bahrain. the Ark was at Kiriath-jeharim: yet by the lamentable tragedie of bloudshed, which sal raised in this place (as it is set downe I Sam. 21. and 22.) in the judgement of Junius, it's proved that the Tabernacle was there for a time.

Micmas also in this Tribe, Nehem. 9.31. was a place of fame, of which Eff. 10.28 where also he nameth Gallim, and Migrom in this Tribe In Micmas Saul had his Camp. I Sam. 13.2. (when he left Gibbs to Jonathan) and there also was Jonathan Macchabaus h aboad, 1 Macc. 9.73. Of Gifcala in Galilee Josephus makes often mention, but of any ho in Benjamin, which they make the natall place of S. Paul, whence (they fay) when it was taken by the Romans, he failed with his parents to Tharfis, of this I find no good warm Other places of leffe importance I omit, and come to the Citie of Higrufalem; and to Princes and Governours of this Citie: A great part whereof was in the Tribe of Benjamin whence Jof. 18.28. it is named among the Cities of Benjamin,

Of divers memorable things concerning Hierusalem.

T what time Hierufalem was built (which afterward became the Princeffe of all Cities) it doth not appeare. Some there are who imagine that Melchifeder was the founder thereof in Abrahams time. But, *according to others, that Citie *Secintheliout of which Melchisedec encountred Abraham (in his returne from the overthrow of the halfe of the Affrian and Persian Kings or Captaines, when Lot was made prisoner) standeth by the river of Jordan, in the halfe Tribe of Manaffe bordering Zabulon, which was also called Salem, and by the Greekes Solima.

Hierusalem (whensoever or by whomsoever built) was a principall Citie in Josua his time : yet not fo renowned as Hazor the Metropolis (in those dayes and before) of all the Canaamtes. AdoniZedek (whom Jojus flew) was then King of Hierusalem. That it was belonging to the Jebusites it is manifest: for how long soever they held it before Moses time, they were Masters and Lords thereof almost 400. yeeres after him: even till David wanne it : and therefore in all likelihood, it was by the Jebusai (the children of Jebusans the son of Canaan) built; after whom it was called Jebus. And so much did that Nation 2 relyc on the strength of the place, as when David attempted it, they bragged that their lame, and blinde, and impotent people should defend it.

David after he had by Gods affiltance possess it, and turned out the Jebusises, gave it an exceeding great increase of circuit: strengthened it with a Citadel or Castle: and beautified it with many Palaces, and other buildings: changing the name from Jebussalem, the Cine of the Jebusites, to Hierusalem, which the Greeks call Hierosolyma. After Davids time Salomon amplified, beautified, and ftrengthned it exceedingly. For befides the work For Come. Ap. 12. of the Temple, which was no leffe admirable than renowned among all Nations, the Palaces, gates, and wals, could not any where in the world be exampled: and befides, that had 1,0000. Inhabitants, the women and children not accounted. The ditch had 60. foot depth, cut out of the very rocke: and 250 foot of breadth: whereof the like hath feldome been heard of, either fince or before.

After the death of Salomon, and that the Kingdome of the Jewes was cut afunder, Shibut King of Egypt, and his predecessor, having bred up for that purpose Adad the Idu- 2 Chroniz. mam, and Jeroboam Salomons servant; and both married to Egyptians: the State by the onedifturbed, by the other broken : Shifhac first invaded the Territorie of Juda, entred 2 Kinsta. It was again fackt, and a part of the wall thrown down by Jose King of Istael;

while Amasia the twelfth King thereof governed Juda.

Not long after, AshaZ the fifteenth King of Juda impoverished the Temple, and presented Teglatphalasser with the treasures thereof. Before the captivitie, the people of the land, through the exhortation of godly Kings, made many and large offerings to repaire the Temple of Salomon. The wrong done by Ptolomaus Lagi to thefe cond Temple, was required by the bountie of his fon Prolomaus Philadelphus. The mifchiefe wrought by Antiochus Epiphanes and his followers, was amended partly by the great offerings which were fent to Hierusalem out of other Nations. Finally, all the loffes, which either the Citie or Temple had endured, might well seeme forgotten in the M.T.c. proScylla raigne of Herod, that usurping and wicked, but magnificent King, who amplified the Citie, new built the Temple, and with many fumptuous workes did so adorne them, that he left them farre more stately and glorious than they had beene in the dayes of Sale.

6. III. Of the destruction of Hierusalem by the Romans.

N this flourishing estate, it was at the comming of our Saviour Christ Jesus: and at ter his death and ascension, it so continued about 40. yeares. But then did Titusthe Roman, being stirred up by God to be the revenger of Christ his death, and to punil, the fewes sinfull ingratitude, incompasse it with a Roman armie, and became Lordthere of. He began the fiege at such time as the Jewes, from all parts, were come up to the celebration of the Paffeever: fo as the Citie was then filled with many hundreds of those fands of all forts; and no maner of provision or store for any such multitudes. An extreme famine, with the civill diffention, opposed them within the walls; a forcible enemicalliled them without. The Idumeans also, who lay in wait for the destruction of the Junis Kingdome, thrust them selves into the Citie, of purpose to berray it: who also burnt the Temple, when Nabuchodonofor tooke it. And to be short, there perished of all sons, from the first besieging to the consumnation of the victorie, eleven hundred thousand foules: and the Citie was so beaten downe and demolished, as those which came afterward to see the desolation thereof, could hardly beleeve that there had beene any such place or habitation. Only the three Herodian towers (works most magnificent, and to over-topping the rest) were spared, as well for lodgings for the Romane garrisons, as that thereby their victorie might be the more notorious and famous: for by those buildings of strength and State remaining, after-ages might judge what the rest were; and their honour be the greater and more shining, that there-over became victorious.

After this, such Jewes as were scattered here and there in Judea, and other Provinces, began again to inhabit some part of the Citie; and by degrees to re-build it, and strengthen it as they could, being then at peace, & tributaries to the Roman State: but after 6; years, when they again offered to revolt and rebel, Elius Adrianus the Emperour flaugh tered many thousands of them, and overturned those three Herodian Towers, with all the rest, making it good which Christ himselfe had foretold; That there should not stands one stone upon another, of that ungratefull Citie. Afterward, when his furie was appealed, and the Prophecie accomplished, he took one part without the wal, wherein stood Mount Calvarie, and the Sepulchre of Christ, and excluding of the rest the greatest portion, heagaine made it a Citie of great capacitie, and called it after his owne name, Alia Capitolia In the gate toward Bethel, he caused a Sow to be cutin Marble, and set in the front theros, which he did in despight of the Jews Nation: making an Edie, that they should not from thence-forthever enter into the Citie, neither should they dare so much as to beholdit from any other high place over-topping it-

But the Christian Religion flourishing in Palæstina, it was inhabited at length by all Guil. Tir. net-Nations, and especially by Christians; and so it continued 500 yeares It was afterward in the 636 yeare after Christ, taken by the Egyptian Saracens, who onupriva

In the yeare 1099. it was regained by Godfrey of Buillon, by affault, with an exceeding flaughter of the Saracens; which Godfrey, when he was elected King thereof refifed tobe crowned with a Crowne of gold, because Christ, for whom he fought, was Garines of therein crowned with thornes. After this recovery, it remained under the fucceffors of 1819,000. Godfrey fourescore and eight yeares: till in the yeare 1197. it was regained by Saladine of Egypt: and lastly, in the yeare 1517. in the time of seliming the Turkes cast out the Egyptians, who now hold it, and call it Cuzumbarec, or the Holy Citie. Neither was it Terusalemalone that hath so oftentimes bin bearen downe and made desolate, but all the great Cities of the World have with their Inhabitants, in feverall times and ages, fuffered the same shipwracke. And it hath bin Gods just will, to the end others might take warning if they would not onely to punish the impiety of men, by famine, by the fword, by fire, and by flaverie; but he hath revenged himselse of the very places they possest; of the walls and buildings, yea, of the foyle and the bealts that fed thereon.

For even that land, sometime called holy, hathen effect lost all her sertilitie and fruitfulnelle; witnesse the many hundreds of thousands which it fed in the dayes of the Kings of Juda and I frael; it being at this time all over, in effect, exceeding from and barraine. rallopleafed God, nor onely to confume with fire from heaven, the Ciries of the Sodomitts; but the very soile it selfe hath felt, and dorn feele the hand of God to this day. God would not spare the beafts that belonged to Amalek, no not any finall number of them to be facrificed to himfelfe : neither was it enough that Athan himfelfe was ftoned, but that his moveables were also confumed and brought to ashes.

6. IIII. Of the vaine and malicious reports of Heather writers, touching the ancient Temes

F the originall of the Jewes, prophane writers have conceived diversly and injuriously. Quintilian speakes infamously of them, and of their Leader; who (faith he) gathered together a pernicious Nation. Diodore and Strabo make them gyptains. Others affirme that while Isis governed Egypt, the people were so increaed, as firosolymus and Judus led thence a great multitude of that Nation, with whom hey planted the neighbour Regions: which might be meant by Moses and Maron: for the name of Moles was accidentall, because he was taken up and saved out of the waters. But Islame, of all other most malicious, doth derive the Jewes from the Syrian Kings; of whom, Damafous, faith he, was the first : and to him fucceeded Abraham, Mofes and Ifrael. Jufint 360 He again fupposeth (somewhat contrary to himselfe) that Israel had ten sonnes, among whom he divided the land of Juda; fo called of Judas his eldest, who had the greatest portion. The youngest of the sonnes of I/rael he calleth foseph: who being brought up in gypt, became learned in magicall Arts, and in the interpretations of Dreames, and gres prodigious; and this Jojeph (faith he) was father to Mofes: who with the rest, by asonoftheir foule diseases, and lest they should infect others, were banished Egyptunher, he telleth how these men thus banished, when in the Desarts they suffered exeme thirst and famine, and therein found reliefe the seventh day, for this cause ever terobscreed the seventh day, and kept it Holy, making it a Law among themselves, hich afterward became a branch of their Religion. He addeth alfo, that they might not ameout of their owne Tribes, lest discovering their uncleanenesse, they might also be spelled by other Nations, as they were by the Egyptians. These and the like fables ath Justine.

Cornelius Tacitus doth as groffely belie them, in affirming, that in the immost Oratorie their Temple, they had the golden head of an Affe, which they adored. But herein Taforgetteth himselfe, having in the fift booke of his owne History truely confessed the Jewes, that they worshipped one only God: & thought it most prophane to repre-

fent the Deitte by any materiall figure, by the shape of a man, or any other creature and they had therefore in their Temples no Image or representation, no not so much as inarry Citie by them inhabited. Somewhat like this hath Alexander Polyhistor, in Szephans, who also makes Judas with Idumea, the first parents of the Jewes.

Tert in Apol.

Claudius Iolans drawes them from Judens, whose parents were Sparton and Thebi. whence it came that the Spartans or Lacedamonians challenged kindred of the Hebren; but they did it as descended of Abraham, faith Josephus; Some of these reports seeme to have bin gathered out of divine letters; though wrested and perverted, according to the custome of the Heathen. For so have they obscured and altered the Storie of the Creat. on, of Paradife, of the Floud; and given new names to the children of Adam in the fifth. age: to Noah and his fonnes, in the fecond: and fo to Abraham, I faac, and Jacob, Mofes, and therest of the Fathers, and leaders of the Hebrewes : all which fainings, as touching the Fines and their originalls, Josephus against Appion, and Tertulisan have sufficiently at Iwered, For that the Hebrewes were the children of Arphaxad and Heber, no mandoub. teth and fo Chaldeans originally, taking name either of Heber, the fonne of Sale, orelic (faith Montanus) of wandring, as is before remembred. And therefore doth Stephans, the Greeke Grammarian, derive the Hebrewes or Jewes, from Arabon; having millan the name of Abraham; who was the some of Heber, in the fixth descent. Their ancier names were first changed by the two grand-children of Abram : for after Jacob, other wife Ifrael, the chiefe part were called Ifrael, another partafter Efan or Edom, Edomini. ar length the remnant of 3400b, being most of the Tribe of 34da, honoured the name of Judas, the sonne of Jacob, and became Judasns or Jewes : as also for a time in the name of Ephraim the fon of Fofeph, the chiefe of the Patriarches of the ten Tribes, the ref of the ten Tribes were comprehended : but were first rooted out when the Kingdom of

If ael fell. The Indeans continued their names, though they suffered the same serving not long after, under Nabuchodonosor.

The government which this Nation under-went, was first paternall: which continued till they served the Egyptians. They were secondly ruled by their Captains and nucletil they served the Egyptians. They were fecondly ruled by their Captains at Leaders, Moses and Iosaa, by a policie Divine. Thirdly, they subjected themselves Leaders, Moses and Iosaa, by a policie Divine. Thirdly, they subjected themselves Leaders, Moses and Iosaa Saul for the first: Of whom, and his successions, before we intreat, we are first to speake of their Government under Jules, after the death of Josus: with somewhat of the things of Fame in other Nations about

Hen Josua was now dead, who with the advice of the 70. Elders, and the high Priest, held authoritie over the people, & ordered that Common-weale: it pleased God to direct the Tribe of Juda (in whom to Kingdome was afterward established) to undertake the Warre against the Canaanstee, over whom (with Gods favour, and the affistance of Simeon) they became victorious.

In the first attempt which they made, they not onely slew tenne thousand but made AdonibeZek prisoner: the greatest and cruellest Commander, both of the Canaanses and PeriZites. This tyrants crueltie, as elsewhere hath beene signified, the returned in the same kinde upon his owne head: and so by the torments which now felt in his owne person (before no otherwise knowne unto him but by his manney she in his owne person (before no otherwise knowne unto him but by his manney she in his owne person (before no otherwise knowne unto him but by his manney she in his owne person (before no otherwise knowne unto him but by his manney she him him but by his manney she him him but by his manney she had a she

The tribes of fuda and Simeon did also master and possessed during this inter-regnum (or as some thinke, before the death of Josua) the Cities of Azotus, Askalon, Ekron and Hierulalem, which they burnt, and the febusites after re-edified. They tooke also the Cities of Hebron, Debir, or Kiriathsepher, and Zephath, afterwards Horma. And although it be not fet downe in expresse words that any one person commanded in chiefe over the people, as Moses and foster did: yet it seemeth that Caleb was of greatest authority among them: and that he, with the advice of Phinees, directed and ordered their warres. For if any think that they proceeded without a Chiefe, the good successe which followed their undertakings, witnesseth the contrary. And it was Caleb even while Josua governed, as appeares, Jos. 10.39. that propounded the attempt of Debir, to the rest of the Captaines: for the performance of which enterprise, he promised his Daughter Achian: which he performed to Othoniel his younger brother after the conquest: whose behaviout in that service was such, as (next unto the ordinance of God) it gave him the greareft reputation among them, and may be esteemed the second cause of his preferment and election for their first Judge soone after. But while those of Juda made warre with their borderers, from whom they onely recovered the mountainous Countries (for they could not drive out the Inhabitants of the Valleyes, because they had Chariots of judg 1.15 Iron.) The rest of the Tribes sought also to enlarge and establish their owne Territories. In which warre they laboured with variable successe: for as the house of Joseph re-Judg. 1.250 covered Bethel, or Luz, from the Hittites, so did the Amorites recover from Dan all the Judg 1.30. plaine Countries, and forc't them to fave themselves in the Mountaines. And now the Is ulives unmindfull of Gods benefits, and how often he had miraculously a-fore-time defended them, and made them victorious over their enemies (the Elders being also confuned, who better advised themin the Inter-regnum) did not onely joyne themfelvesin marriage with the Heathen Nations: but (that which was more detestable) they served the Idols of Baal, and Afteroth, with other the dead gods of the Canaanites and Amorites. And therefore did the Lord God, whom they had provoked with their Idolatrie, deliver them into the hands of the Aramites of Mesopotamia, whom Chuhan Rishathains at that time commanded. But after they had felt the smart of Gods displeasure against them eight yeares, it pleased him to have compassion on his people, and toraise up Othoniel to be their Judge and Leader: who by God affisted, delivered Judge 100 hisbrethren from oppression, and inforced the Aramites to returne into their owne Difarts, and into Mesopotamia adjoyning: after which the Israelites had peace fourtie yeares, during all the time of Otheniels government. This Otheniel is thought by To- 2608. status to have bin the younger brother of Caleb, for as much as in the booke of Judges he is twice called Otheneil, the sonne of Cenaz, Calebs younger brother. Others doe rather interpret those words [Calebs younger brother] as if they signified the meanelt of his kindred. Indeed it is not likely that Calebs Daughter should marrie with her owne Uncle: yet it followes not therefore that Othoniel should have bin the meanest of the kindred. Wherefore we may better thinke that he was the Nephew of Caleb, (as some learned men expound it) and as the very words of Scripture seeme to enforce. For Caleb was the sonne of Jephunneth, and Othoniel the sonne of Cenas, Calebs youngerbrother; that is, he was not brother to Caleb, but his ounger brothers sonne; to whom it was not onely lawfull, but commendable to marry with his Coufin German Calebs daughter.

How long it was from the death of Josua to the government of Othoniel, it cannot be found : but it seemes to have bin no short time. For many Warres were made In that space against the people of the Land. Laish was then taken (as is thought) by the Danites; and the best Writers are of opinion, that between the times of Josus and Othoniel that civill Warre brake out betweene the Benjamites and the rest of Ifrael, for theforeing to death of the Levites Wife. For it is written, that in those dayes there was & 19. no King in Israel, but every man did that which was good in his owns eye. And as Juda led the people against the Canaanites during the Inter-regnum, so was he commanded to do against Benjamin, even by the Lord God, whose direction they craved, as wanting a Judge to appoint what should be done; which sheweth it to have bin when Is was dead, and before the government of Othoniel, especially considering, that all other times wherein they wanted Governors, were spent under such oppression of strangers, as would have given them no leave to have attempted such a civill Warre, if their gers, as would have given, as it was in the managing of this action; wherein they fo weake. ned the body of their estate, by effusion of bloud, that in many ages they could not bring into the field such numbers as formerly they had mustered against their bordering enemics.

Of the memorable things of this age in other Nations: and of the difficultie in the computation

Here lived in this Age of Othoniel, Pandon or Pandareus, according to Homer, the fift King of Athens; who began to rule in the twentieth yeare of Othoniel, and governed fortie yeares. He was Father to Erifthem: his Daughters were Prom and Philomela, so greatly mentioned in fables.

Cadmus also about this time obtained Thebes: Of whose Daughter Semele was borne Dionyfius, or Liber Pater: under whom Linus the Mufician lived. In his time also the Ci.

ties of Melus, Paphus, and Tharfus were built.

Ida and Dataylus flourished in this age, who are said to have found out the use of Imn but Genesis hath raught us the contrary, and that Tubalcain long before wrought cunning. ly both in Iron and Braffe. Not long after this time, Amphion & Zethus governed Their whom divers Chronologers find in Ebuds time. But S. Augustine making a repetition of those fables, which were devised among the Grecians and other Nations, during the government of the Judges, begins with Triptolemus, of whose parentage there is as link agreement. Vives upon the thirteenth Chapter of S. Augustine de Civitate Dei, and the eighteenth booke, hath gathered all the opinions of this mans progenie, where heetha defires his pedigree may find it. Lattantius and Eufebius make him native of Attica:and the sonne of Eleusius King of Eleusius: which Eleusius by carefull industric had fedth people of that Territorie in the time of a great famine. This, when upon the like occide Triptolemus could not performe, fearing the furie of the people, he fled thence by Semin kinde of Galley or long Boat, which carried in her Prow a graven or carved Serpentinho because he made exceeding great speed to returne and to relieve his people with Com, from some neighbour Nation: it was fained by the Poets, that his Coach was carried by Serpents through the ayre.

Whether the times of these Kings, which lived together with Othoniel, and after him, with the rest of the Judges and Kings of Israel and Juda, be precisely set downe, Icanot avow; for the Chronologers, both of the former and latter times, differ in many particular lars; to examine all which would require the whole time of a long life: and therefore l desire to be excused, if in these comparisons I erre with others of better judgement. For whether Eusebius and all that follow him, or his opposites (who make themselves some versant with these ancient Kings, and with the very yeare when they began to rule) have hit the marke of time, of all other the farthest off and most defaced, I cannot but greatly doubt. First, because the Authors themselves, from whom the ancientest Chronologus have borrowed light, had nothing for the warrant of their owne workes, but conjecture: Secondly, because their owne disagreement and contention in those elder dayes, with that of our owne age among the labourers in times, is fuch, as no man among them hathyet lo edified any mans understanding, save his own; but that he is greatly distracted, afterwhat patterne to erect his buildings.

This difagreement is found not onely in the raignes of Heathen Kings and Princes, but even in the computation of those times which the indisputable authority of holy Scrip ture hath summed up, as in that of Abrahams birth; and after in the times of the July and the oppressions of Israel, in the times from the egression to the building of Salamon Temple, in the Persian Empire, the seventie Weekes, and in what not ! Wheresoever the account of times may fuffer examination, the arguments are opposite, and contention are fuch, as for ought that I fee, men have fought by fo many wayes to uncover the Suns orthat yeare, I avow it no otherwise than as a borrowed knowledge, or at least as a private opinion: which I submit to better judgements. Namin prissis rebus veritas non ad unouem querenda; In ancient things we are not to require an exact narration of the truth. faves Diodore.

of Ehuds time, and of Proferpina, Orithya, Tereus, Tantalus, Tityus, Admetus, and others that lived about those times.

Frer the death of Othoniel, when Ifrael fell backe to their former Idolatrie, God incouraged Moab to invade and suppresse them: to performe which he joyned the forces of Ammon, and Amalee unto his owne, and so (as all kinde of miserie readily findeth out those whom God hath abandoned, or for a time with-drawne his helpe from, thereby to make them feele the difference betweene his grace and his difpleasure) these Heathen neighbouring Nations had an easie conquest over Israel, whom God himselfe exposed to those perills, within which they were so speedily folded up. Inthismiserable estate they continued full eighteene yeares under Eglon King of the Moabites, and his confederates. Yet, as the mercies of God are infinite, he turned not his eares from their crying repentance: but raised up Ehud the son of Gerato deliver them: by which weake man, though maimed in his right hand, yet confident in the just nesses his quarrell, and fearing that the Ifraelites were too few in numbers to contend with the Head of those valiant Nations, he resolved to attempt upon the person of Eglon, whom if he could but extinguish, he affured himselfe of the following victory: especially giving his Nation no time to reestablish their government, or to choose a King to command and direct them in the Warres. According to which resolution, Ehud went on as an Embassadour to Eglan, loaden with presents from the Israelites, as to appeale him, and obtain ning private accesse upon the pretence of some secret to be revealed, he pierc't his body with a Poniard, made of purpose with a double edge : and shutting the doores of his close upon him escaped.

It may seeme that being confident of his good successe, he had prepared the strength of If rael in readineffe. For fuddenly after his returne, he did repaffe Jordan, and invading the Territory of Moab, overthrew their Army confishing of 10000. able and strong men: whereof not any one escaped. After which victorie, and that Sangar his Successour had miraculously slaine 600. Philistims with an Oxe goade: the Land and People of Israel lived in peace unto the end of four-score yeares from the death of Othoniel, which terme expired in the Worlds yeare 2691.

Inthedayes of Ebud, Naomi with Elimelech her husband, and with her two fonnes, travailed into Moab, and so the storie of Ruth is to be referred to this time. About the beginning of the fourescore yeares which are given to Ehud, it was that Oreus King of the Molossions, otherwise Pluto, Stole Proserpina, as she walked to gather flowers in the fields of Hipponium in Sicilia: or (according to Pausanias) by the River Cephisus, which pausin Atis elsewhere he calleth Chemer, if he meane nor two distinct Rivers. This stealth being made knowne to Pyrithous, with whom Hercules and Theseus joyned themselves, they agreed together to recover her: bur Pluto or Orcus (whom others call Aidonius) had (as they fay) a very huge Dogge, which fastened on Pyrithous, and tare him in peeces, and had allo worried Thefeus, but that Hercules speedily rescued him, and by strength tooke and mastered the Dogge Cerberus: whereof grew the fable of Hercules his delivering Theseus out of Hell. But Zezes, as I take it, hath written this story somewhat more according to thetruth. For Thefeus and Parithous, faith hee, attempted to fleale Proferpina Daughter to Aidonins, King of the Molossians, who had Ceres to Wife, the mother of Proferpind: Proferpina being a generall name also for all faire women. This purpose of theirs being knowne to Aidonius, Theseus and Pyrithous were both taken; and because Pyrithous was the principall in this conspiracie, and Theseus drawne on by a kinde of affection or inforcement, the one was given for food to Aidonius his great Dogge Certhat the dayes thereby are made more darke, and the clouds more condensed than be berus, the other held prisoner, till Hercules by the instigation of Euristheus delivered fore: I can therefore give no other warrant, than other menhave done in these companies frong hand. The Molosis which Stephanus writes with a single (S) were a tations: and therefore that fuch and fuch Kings and Kingdomes tooke beginning in the people of Epirus, inhabiting neere the Mountaines of Pindus: of which Mountaines Octa is one of the most famous, where Hercules burnt himselfe. The River of Acheron (which the Poets describe to be in Hell) riseth out of the same Hills. There is another Nation of the Molossi in Thessali: but these are neighbours to the Cassiopai, saith Plu. tarch in his Greeke questions.

The rape of Orithya, the Daughter of Erithew, King of Athens, taken away by Borea of Thrace, is referred to the time of Ehud. The Poets ascribe this rape to the North. winde, because Thrace is situate North from Athens. In this time also Terem ravished Philomela, of which the fable was devised of her conversion into a Nightingale. For Tereus having married her fister Progne, conducting Philomela from Athens to see her fifter, forced her in her paffage, and withall cut out her tongue, that she might notcom. plaine; perswading Progne his Wife, that Philomela died in the mid-way: all which her brother in lawes mercilesse behaviour towards her, Philomela expressed by her needle upon cloth, and fent into Progne. In revenge whereof Progne caused her onely some Itys to becut in peeces, and fet before Tereus her husband, fo dreft as it appeared to be Tome other ordinary food: of which when he had eaten his fill, she caused his head hands and feet, to be presented unto him: and then fled away with such speed to. wards Athens where her Father Pandion yet lived, as the Poets fained, that fhe war turned it to a Swallow. The place where it was performed, Straho findes to be Day. lis in Phoeis: and the Tombe of Tereus, Paulanias hath built neere the Rockes Mergi, in the Territorie of Athens. By which, as also by the name Daulis, where these things, are supposed to have bin done (whence also Philomela is called Daulias ales) it ap. peares that it is true, which Thueydides notes by way of digression in his Peloponnellan Warre, That this Tereus was not King in that which is now called Thracia, or in 0. dryfe, (as the Poets call him Odryfius) but that Phocis a Countrie in Greece not fare from Attica, a Citie whereof is called Daulia, was in Pandions time inhabited by Thus. ans : of which this Tereus was King : whence Pandion, to have amitie with his neighbours, made him his fonne in law : as it is good to beleeve, faith Thucydides, that Panling King of Athens made that alliance with a neighbour King, from whom he might have fuccour, rather than with any Tereus, that should have held the Kingdome of Odnik which was greatly distant from thence. The occasion that the Poets chosea Swallow ! for Progne to be turned into may seeme to have bin partly because, as Pausanias lays, Daulide nec nidificant, nec babitant in tota circum regione Hirundines ; as if a Swallow, to membring the wrong that was there done to her, and her fifter, did for ever after hate that place.

Neere this time Melampus (who is faid to have understood the voyces of Birds and Beafts) flourished, being also esteemed for an excellent Physician. He restored to their former health the Daughters of Pratus King of the Argives, who (as the Poets please) Homer. O diff. 11. were made mad by Juno: and thinking themselves to be Kine, fled into the Woods, far ring to be constrained to the Plough: for in those Countries where the ground was light, they diduse often to plough with Kine.

In the seven and fortieth yeare of Ebud, Tros began to raigne in Dardania, and gave it his owne name; about which time Phemone the chiefe Priest of Apollo in Delpos, deviled the Heroicall Verse.

Of the fame date was Tantalus, King of Lydia: whom Eusebius makes King of Phrygid: and also of that part of which the people were anciently Maones. Of Tantalus was devifed the fable that some Poets have applied to the passion of love: and some to the cover tous that dare not injoy his riches. Eulebius calls this Tantalus the son of Jupiter, by the Nymph Pleta: Diaconus and Didymus in Zezes, give him another Mother. He was faid to be the fon of Jupiter, as some will have it; because he had that Planet in his ascendent, betokening wisedome and riches. It is said that when he made a feast to the gods, having nothing more precious, he caused his owne sonto be slaine and drest to the banquet: of whom Ceres are part of one of the shoulders: whereby was signified that those men which feeke after Divine knowledge, preferre nothing on earth before it: no not the care of their owne children, of all else the most dearest. And where it was devised, that he had alwayes Water and Fruit offered to his lips, and yet suffered the torment of hunger and thirst, it was meant thereby, that though he abounded (by reason of his riches) in all delicacie of the world, yet his minde being otherwise and to higher defires transported, he enjoyed no pleasure at all by the rest. Of whom ovid:

Quarit aquas in aquis & poma fugacia captat Tantalus, boc illi garrula lingua dedit. Here Tantalus in water feekes for water, and doth miffe The fleeting fruit he catcheth at: His long tongue brought him this.

This punishment, they fay, was inflicted upon him, for that he discovered the secrets of the gods: that is, because he taught wisedome and vertue to mortall men: which storie Cornelius Gallus hath elegantly exprest in Verse. Others expound this fable otherwise, and fay, That Tantalus, though he excelled in riches, yet being thirftie of more abundance, was never fatisfied. Of whom Horace against coverousnesse:

Tantalus à labies sitiens fugientia captat Flumina : quid rides? mutato nomine de te Fabula narratur.

Others conceive where it is fained of Tantalus, that he gave the Nedar and Ambrofia of the gods to vaine and unworthy men, that he was therefore by them in that fort punithed. Of which Natalis out of Pindarus:

> Immortalitatem quod furatus. Coetaneis convivis Nectar Ambrofiamque dedit.

Because that stealing immortalitie. He did both Nettar and Ambrofia give To guests of his owne age, to make them live?

Whereby it was meant, that the fecrets of Divinitie ought not to be imparted to the unpure Vulgar. For as the cleanest meates in a foule stomacke, are therein corrupted, so themost high and reserved mysteries are often perverted by an uncleane and defiled

Toyouit is given (faith Christ in Marke) to know the mysterie of the Kingdome of God, Marke 4.11. but unto them that are without, all things bee done in parables. So is it faid of him, that hee expounded all things to his Difciples apart. And therefore doth Gregorie Nazianzene in- Marke 4.34. ferreupona place of S. Pythagoras, faith Revelin, thought it not the part of a wife man, Afino lyram exponere, autmfferia, que itareciperet, ut Sus tubam, & fidem graculus, & unquenta Scarabaus: quare sikntium indixit discipulis, ne vulzo di vinorum arcana patefacerent, que meditando facility quam loquendo apprehendantur; To set an Asse to a harpe, or to learne mysteries: which he would handle as a Swine doth a Trumpet, or a Jay a viall, or Scarabies, and uncleane flies soveraigne ountment. Wherefore he commanded sitence to his disciples, that they should not disclose divine mysteries to the common sort, which are easier learned by meditation than bybabbling. And therefore did the Egyptians communicate their mysteries among their Priests in certaine Hieroglyphick letters, to the end that their secrets might be hidden from the Vulgar and that they might bestow the more time in the contemplation of their covered meanings.

But to proceed with the contemporaries of Aod, or Ehud, with him it is also faid, that Tirus lived whom Apollo flew, because he fought to force his Mother Latona. Euphorion hath it thus, that Tityus was the fon of Elara, the Daughter of Orchomenus; wich Elara being beloved of Jupiter, to avoyd Juno's revenge, he hid Elara in the earth, where she Was delivered of Tilym: whose Mother dying, and himselfe therein nourished, he was herefore called the fon of the earth. Paufanias speaking of the grave of this Gyant, affrings that his body occupied the third part of a furlong. But Tibullus hath a louder lie his stature out of Homer:

Nine furlongs stretcht lyes Tityus, who for his wicked deeds, The hungry birds with his renewing liver daily feeds.

This Strabo doth thus expound; that Apollo killing this cruell and wicked Tyrant of Panopea, a Citie in Phocis, it was fained by the Poets to the terrour of others, that he was still eaten in Hell by birds, and yet still lived, and had his steff renewed. Admetus King of The false lived also in this Age, whom it is said that Apollo first served as a Heard man, and afterward for his excellent wit was by him advanced; but having he flaine Hyacinthus, he croft the Hellespont, and fled into Phrygia: where together with Neptune, he was entertained by Laomedon, and got his bread by working in bricke, for building of the walls of Troy, not by making the bricks leape into their places by playing on his Harpe: according to him in Ovid, which faith:

Strong Ilion thou shalt see with walls and towers high, Built with the harpe of wife Apollo's Harmonie.

Thus the Poets: but others, that he laboured with his hands, as hired in this worke And that he also laboured at the building of the Labyrinsh in Greece, all the Meganins witnesse, saith Pausarias.

In these daies also of Ehud, or (as some finde it) in the dayes of Deborah, lived Persus, the sonne of Jupiter and Danae, by whose Souldiers (as they failed out of Peloponnesis, feeke their adventure on Africa fide) Medufa, the Daughter and Successor of Phorem, be ing weakely accompanied as she hunted, neere the Lake Tritan, was surprised and slane: whose beauty, when Perseus beheld, he caused her head to be imbalimed, and carried in Greece: the beauty whereof was fuch and fo much admired, and the beholders fo after nished which beheld it, as thereof grew the fiction, that all that looked on Medusa's head,

Cecrops, the second of that name, and 7. King of Ashens, and Acrifius the 13. or after Eusebius, the 14. King of the Argives, began also their raignes, as it is said, in the im of this Judge: of which the first ruled 40. yeares, and the second 31. yeares. Also Belle rophon lived in this age, being the some of Glaucus, the some of Sifyphus: who intically Antea or Sthenebia, the wife of Pratus of the Argives, to accompany her, but refle fing it, the accused him to her husband that he offered to force her: whereupon Pians fent Bellerophon into Lycia, about fome affaires of weight, betweene him and his fome in law Jobates: giving secret order to Jobates to dispatch him: but Jobates thinking it disher nourable to lay violent hands on him, imployed him against Chimara, a Monster vomiting or breathing fire. Now the gods (as the report is) pittying his innocency, fent him the winged Horse Pegasus, sprung up of the bloud of Medusa, formerly staine by the souldiers of Perfeus in Africa, to transport him; a horse that none other could master or bridle but Minerva: upon which beaft Bellerophon over-came Chimara: and performed the other fervices given him in charge: which done, as he returned toward Lycia, the Lycians lay in ambush to have slaine him : but being victorious also over all those, hear rived to Joba'es in lafetie: whom Jobates for his eminent vertues honoured, first with one of his Daughters : and afterward with his Kingdome : after which he grew foir folent, as he attempted to flye up to heaven upon his Pegafus: whose pride Jupiter dil daining, caused one of his stinging flyes so to vexe Pegasus, as he cast off Bellerophen from his backe, into the Valley of Cilicia, where he died blinde; of which burthen Pegala being discharged (as the fable goeth) flew backe to heaven: and being sed in Jupites owne stable, Aurora begg'd him of Jupiter to ride on before the Sunne. This tale is de and undeferved adversitie, and to cast downe those which are too high minutes are too high mi or rather certaine death, he found both deliverance and honour: but waxing over proud and prefumptuous in his glorious fortunes, he was againe throwne downe into the extremitie of forrow, and ever-during miserie. Secondly by others. That under the name of Chimara, was meant a cruell Pyrat of the Lycians, whose ship had in her prow a Lyon, Plutar in elital a Goate in the mid-ship, and a Dragon in the stearne, of which three beasts this Monster mulier. Chimera was faid to be compounded, whom Bellerophon pursued with a kinde of Galley, of such swiftnesse, that it was called the flying Horse: to whom the invention of sayles (the wings of a ship) are also attributed. Many other expositions are made of this tale by other Authors: but it is not unlikely, that Chimera was the name of a ship, for so Virgil calleth one of the greatest ships of Aneus.

CHAP.13. S.4. of the History of the World

Ionalfo, from whom the Athenians (being ignorant of the antiquitie of their parent ad Apoll. Tavan) derive their name of Iones, is faid to have bin about Ehads time : Homer calls them Jaones, which hath a neere resemblance to the word Javan. Perhaps it might be fo that Ion himselfe tooke name from Javan : it being a custome observable in the Histories of all times, to revive the ancient name of a fore-father, in some the principall of his

Fter Ifrael had lived in peace and plenty to the end of these 80. yeares, they againe began to forget the giver of all goodnesse, and many of those being worne Out, which were witnesses of the former miserie, and of Gods deliverance by Elud; and after him by Samgar; the rest began to returne to their former neglect of Gods commandements. For as Plentie and Peace are the parents of idle fecuritie; fo is fecuniyas fruitfull in begetting and bringing forth both danger and subversion: of which all estates in the world have tasted by interchange of times. Therefore when their sines were againe ripe for punishment, Jahin King of Hazor, after the death of Ehud, invaded the Territorie of Ifrael; and having in his fervice 900. iron Chariots, besides the rest of his forces, he held them in subjection twenty yeares, till it pleased God to raise up Deborah, the Prophetesse, who incouraged Barac to levie a force out of Nepthalim, and Zabalon, to incounter the Canaanites. That the men of Nepthalim were more forward than the restinthis action, it may seeme to have proceeded partly from the authoritie that Barac had among them, being of the fame Tribe; and partly from their feeling of the common grievance, which in them was more fensible than in others, because Hazor and Harofeth the chiefe holds of Jabin, were in Nepthalim. So in the dayes of Jeptha the Gileadites tooke the greatest care, because the Ammonites, with whom the Warre was, pressed most upon them, as being their borderers. Now as it pleased God by the left hand of Ehudto deliver Israel from the Moabites: and by the counsaile and courage of awoman, to free them from the yoke of Canaan, and to kill the valiant Sifera by Jael the Kenites wife . fo was it his will at other times, to worke the like great things by the weakelt meanes. For the mighty Affyrian Nabuchodonofor, who was a King of Kings, and resultes, he overthrew by his owne imaginations, the causers of his brutish melanchoy: and changed his matchlesse pride into the base humility of a Beast. And to approve that he is the Lord of all power, he fometime punisherh by invisible strength, as when he flaughtered the Armie of Senacherib by his Angell, or as he did the Egyptians in Mossi time: sometime by dead bodies, as when he drowned Pharas by the waves of the Sea; and the Canaanites by haile-stones in the time of Josua: sometimes by the ministeicofmen, as when he overthrew the foure Kings of the East, Chedorlaomer; and his companions, by the houshold servants of Abraham. He caused the Moabites and Amowne stable, Aurora begg'd him of Jupiter to rice on before the Sume. I homes to set upon their owne confederate the Army of the Edomites; and having slaine homes to set upon their owne confederate the Army of the Edomites; and having slaine versly expounded as first by some, That it pleaseth God to relieve men intuition and undeferved adversitie, and to cast downe those which are too high minded: according to another in the sight of Jebos applies and of the like to these a volume of 2 Chron. 2011.

all his powerfulnesse, and great mercies, she sheweth the weake estate whereinto Israel was brought for their Idolattie by the Canaanites, and other bordering Nations, in the was prought to the ld or speare seene among forty thousand of Israel? She also sheweth how the Ifraelites were fevered and amased, some of them confined over Jordan, and durst not joyne themselves to the rest; as those of Reuben in Gilead: that the Asherican kept the Sea-coast, and for soke their habitations towards the Land; and the children of Dan, who neighboured the Sea, crept into their ships for safetie, shewing thereby that all were dispersed, and all in effect lost. Shee then curied the Inhabitants of Meroz, who dwelling neere the place of the battaile (belike fearing the successe) came not out to affer Ifrael, and then bleffeth Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite, who nailed Sifera, in her Tent: shewing the ancient affection of that race to the Israelites. For though the Familie of Heber were inforced in that miserable time of subjection, to hold correspondence with Jabin the Canaanite, yet when occasion offered them meanes, they witnessed their love and faith to their ancient friends. Lastly, the derideth the Mother of signs who promised her son the victory in her owne hopes : and fancied to her selfe, and described the spolle, both of Garments and Maidens by him gotten. For conclusion, the directerh her praise thankesto God onely victorious.

From the beginning of Jabins oppression to the end of that peace, which Deborahand Barac purchased unto Israel, there passed 40. yeares. In which time the Kingdome of Arges, which had continued 544 yeares, was translated to Mycana: The translationof this Kingdome Vives out of Pausanias writeth to this effect: After Danaus, Lynus fucceeded in Argos, after whom the children of Abas the sonne of Lyncess divided the Kingdome: of which Acrifius being eldeft, held Arges it felfe: Pratus his brother police Ephyra or Corinth, and Tirynthos, and other Cities, with all the Territorie towards the Sea, there being many monuments in Tiryathos, which witnesse Pratus possession, links

Now Acrifius was fore-told by an Oracle, that he should be slaine by the some of his Daughter Danae: whereupon he caused her to be inclosed in a Tower, with end that no man might accompanie her. But the Lady being exceeding faire, it is fained that Jupiter turned himselfe into a golden shower: which falling into her in begat her with childe: the meaning whereof was, that some Kings sonne, or other worthy man, corrupted her Keepers with gold, and enjoyed her, of whom Perfess was borne; who when he grew to mans estate, either by chance (faith Ctessas) or in shewing his grand-father the invention of the diffus, or leaden ball, flew him unwilling! After this Perseus, to avoide the infamie of Patricide in Argos, changed Kingdoms with his Uncle Pratus: and built Mycana. This imprisonment of Danae, Sophalls reporteth otherwise: and that she was inclosed in a brazen vault, under the Kins Hall with her Nurse and Keepers. Upon this close custodie Horace hath this witte de fervation:

Si non Acrisium Virginis abditæ Custodem pavidum, Jupiter & Venus Rififfent, fore enim tutum iter & patens Converso in pretium Deo.

did so master them in a short time (the hand of God being with-held from their defence) as to fave themselves, they crept into caves of the mountaines, and other the like places of hardest accesse: their enemies possessing all the plaines and fruitfull vallies: and in harvest time, by themselves, and the multitude of their cattell, destroying all that grew up: covering the fields as thicke as graffe-hoppers: which servitude lasted seven yeares.

Jud.6.7.5. 3ud.c.6.&.7.

Then the Lord by his Angell stirred up Gideon the sonne of Frash, afterward called Jerubbaal: whose feare and unwillingnesse, and how it pleased God to hearten him in his enterprize, it is both largely and precifely fet downe in the holy Scriptures: as also how it pleafed God by a few felect perfons, namely 300, out of 32000. men, to make them know that he onely was the Lord of Hofts. Each of thefe 300- by Gideons ap. pointment carried a trumper, and light in a pitcher, instruments of more terrour than force, with which he gave the great Armie of their enemies an alarum: who hearing fo loud a noyfe, and feeing (at the cracke of formany pitchers broken) formany lightsabout them esteeming the Armie of Israel to be infinite, and strucken with a sodine feare, they all fled without a ftroke ftricken, and were flaughtered in great numbers: two of their Princes being made prisoners and same In his returnet he Ephramicsbegan to quarrell with Gideon because he made warre without their affistance, being then greedy of glory, the victory being gotten: who (if. Gideon had failed and fallen inthe enterprise) would no doubt have held themselves happy by being neglected But Giden appealing them with a milde answer, followed after the enemie, in which pursuite being tyred with travaile, and weary even with the flaughtering of his enemies, hee defired reliefe from the inhabitants of Succoth, to the end, that (his men being refreshed) he might over-take the other two Kings of the Midianites: which had faved themselves by flight. For they were foure Princes of the Nations, which had invaded and walted Ifrael: to wit, Oreb and Seeb, which were taken already, and Zebah and Zalmunna, which

Gideon being denied by them of Succesth, fought the like reliefe from the Inhabitans of Penuel, who in like fort refused to succour him. Toboth of these places he threamed therefore the revenge, which in his returne from the profecution of the other two Pin ; ces, he performed: to wit, that he would teare the fleth of those of Succetb with Thoms & Briars, and destroy the Inhabitants and Citie of Penuel. Now why the people of their two Cities should refuse reliefe to their brethren the Israelites, especially aftersogeat a victorie: if I may prefume to make conjecture, it feemes likely, first, that those Cities fet over fordan, and in the way of all invafions, to be made by the Moabites, Ammo nites and Midianites, into Ifrael, had either made their own peace with those nations, and were not spoiled by them; or else they knowing that Zeba and Zalmunna were escaped with a great part of their army, might feare their revenge in the future. Secondly, it may be laid to the condition and dispositions of these men as it is not rare to finde of the like humour in all ages. For there are multitudes of men, especially of those which follows the warre, that both envie and maligne others, if they performe any praise-worthyactions, for the honour and fafety of their owne Countrey, though themselves may be a fured to bearea part of the finart of contrary fuccesse. And such malicious hearts can rither be contented that their Prince and Countrey should suffer hazzard and want, that that fuch men as they mislike, should be the authors or actors of any glory or good to either.

A place in Bafan, as it is Now Gideon, how or wherefoever it were that he refreshed himselfe and his weary and hungry Souldiers, yet he followed the opportunity, and purfued his former victor ry to the uttermost : and finding Zebah and Zalmunna in Karker (fuspecting no further attempt npon them) he againe surprised them, and slaughtered those 15000. remaining having put to the fword in the former attempt 1 20000 and withall he tooke Zebah and Zalmunna prisoners: whom because themselves had executed Gideons brethren be fore at Tabor, he caused them both to be flaine : or (as it is written) at their owne requel flew them with his owne hands, his Sonne whom he first commanded to doe it, refu fing it ; and in his returne from the confiummation of this marveilous victory, he took revenge of the Elders of Succest, and of the Citizens of Pennel. Forgiving no offens committed against him, either by strangers or by his brethren the Israelites. But such mercy as he shewed to others, his owne children found soone after his death, according to that which hath beene faid before. The debts of crueltie and mercie are never left unfatisfied: for as hee flew the 70. Elders of Succoth, with great and unufull forments, fo were his owne 70 fons, all but one, murthered by his owne baftard Abimelec: The like Analogie is observed by the Rabbines, in the greatest of the plagues which God brought upon the Egyptians, who having caused the male children of the Hebrewes to be slaine, others of them to be cast into the river and drowned: God rewarded them even with the like measure, destroying their owne first borne by his Angel, and drowning thar ash and his Armie in the red sea. And hereof a world of examples might be given both out of the Scriptures and other Histories.

In the end so much did the people reverence Gideon in the present for this victorie, and their owne deliverance, as they offered him the Soveraigntie over them, and to establish him in the Government; which he refused, answering; I will not raigne over you, neither Jud. 8.23. hall my childe raigne over you, but the Lord shall, &c. But he defired the people that they would bestow on him the golden care-rings which every man had gotten. For the 1smadites, neighbours, and mixt with the Midianites, used to weare them: the weight of all which was a thousand and seven hundred Shekles of gold, which makes of ours 2380. li. if weld low the account of the Shekle vulgar. And because he converted that gold into an Ephod, a garment of gold, blew filke, purple, scarlet, and fine linnen, belonging to the Jud. 2.2. High Priest onely, and set up the same in his owne Citie of ophra or Ephra, which drew Ifrael to Idolatrie, the same was the destruction of Gideon and his house.

There was another kind of Ephod belides this of the High Priefts, which the Levites used, and so did David when he danced before the Arke; and Samuel, while he was yet

Now if any man demand how it was possible for Gideon with 300. men to destroy 120000. Of their enemies, and afterward 15000, which remained, wee may remember, that although Gideon with 300 gave the first alarme, and put the Midianites in rout and disorder: yet all the rest of the Armie came in to the slaughter, and pursuite : for it is written; That the mem of Israel being gathered together out of Nepthalie, and out of Asher, and out Jud,723. of Manaffe, pursued after the Midianites: for this armie Gideon left in terits behinde him, when he went down to view the armie of his enemies, who with the noyfe of his 300. trumpets came after him to the execution.

Therelived with Gideon, Egeus, the forme of Pandion, who raigned in Athens: Eurysheus King of Mycene: Acreus and Thyestes the sonnes of Pelops, who bare dominion over a great part of Peloponnesus, and after the death of Eurystheur, the Kingdome of Mycene fell into the hand of Atreus. This is that Atreus, who holding his brother in jeealousie, as an attempter, both of his Wife and Crowne, slew the children of Thyestes, and caufing their flesh to be drest, did therewith feast their father. But this crueltie was not unrevenged. For both Acreus and his sonne Agamemnon were slaine by a base sonne of Threstes, year the grand-childen, and all the linage of Atreus dyed by the same

In Gideons time also those things were supposed to have beene done, which are writtenof Dedalus and Icarus. Dedalus, they fay, having flaine his Nephew Attalus, fled to Minos, King of Crete, for fuccour; where for his excellent workmanship hee was greatly effectmed, having made for Minosa Labyrinth, like unto that of Egypt. Afterward hewas faid to have framed an artificiall Cowe for Pasiphae the Queene, that shee, being inlove with a faire Bull, might by putting her selfe into the Cowe, satisfie her lust; a thing no leffe unnatural than incredible, had not that shamelesse Emperour Domitian exhibited the like beaftly spectacle, openly before the people of Rome, in his Amphitheater; of purpose, as may seeme, to verifie the old fable. For so it appeares by those verses of Martial, wherein the flattering Poet magnifieth the abominable shew, as a goodly Pascant, in those vicious times.

> Janetam Pasiphaen Dieteo credite Tauro Vidimus, accepit fabula prisca fidem. Nec se miratar Cafar long ava vetuftas Quicquid fame canit, donat arena tibi.

construction of it, thinking that D ædalus was ofher counsaile, and her Pandar for the enticing of a Secretarie of Minos called Taurus, which fignisheth a Bull, who begather with the childe; and that she being delivered of two sonness, the one resembling Taurus, the other husband Minos, it was fained that she was delivered of the Monster Minosaur, half a her husband Minos, it was fained that she was delivered of the Monster Minosaur, half a Man, and halfe a Bull. But this practice being discovered, and D ædalus appointed to be sain, he shed out of Crete to Cocalus King of Sicil: in which passage has fonce to transport dition, as it was fained that he fashioned wings for himselfe and his sonne to transport them. For whereas Minos pursued him with boats which had oares onely, D ædalus framed sailes both for his owne boate, and for his sonnes, by which he outwent those that had him in chase. Upon which new invention, Icarus bearing himselfe overbold, wason werborne and drowned.

It is also written of Dædalus, that he made Images that could move themselves, and go, because he carved them with legs, armes, and hands; whereas those that preceded him, could onely present the bodie and head of those men, whom they carried to counterfait, and yet the workmanship was esteemed very rare. But Plutareb, who had seene someof those that were called the Images of Dædalus, found them exceeding rude.

With Gideon also flourished Linus the Theban, the son of Apollo, and Terpsichore, who instructed Thamaris, Orpheus, and Hercules. He wrote of the Creation, of the Sunnead Moones course, and of the generation of living Creatures, but in the end he was slainely

Hercules his scholler with his owne harpe. Againe, in this age those things spoken of Sphinx and Oedipus, are thought to have bin performed. This Sphinx being a great robber by fea and land, was by the Corimbian Armie, led by Oedipus, overcome. But that which was written of her propounding of riddles, to those whom shee mastered, was meant by the rockie and unaccessible mountaine neere Thebes, which she defended; and by Oedipus disfolving her probleme, hisvictorie over her. She was painted with wings, because exceeding swift, and with the bodie of a Lyon, for her crueltie. But that which Palaphatus reports of Sphinx, were more probable, did not the time disprove it, for he calls her an Amazonite, and the wife of Cadmin who when by her helpe he had cast Draco out of Thebes (neglecting her) he married the fifter of Draco, which Sphinx taking in despightfull part, with her own troope shelds the mountaine by Thebes, from whence she continued a sharpe warre upon the Theban, till by Oedipus overthrowne. About this time did Mines thrust his brother out of cou, and held sharpe war with the Megarians and Athenians, because his son Andregums flaine by them. He possest himselfe of Megara, by the treason of Scylla, Daughteros N. fus the King. He was long mafter of the fea, and brought the Athenians to the tributed delivering him every yeare seven of their sons : which tribute Thefeus released, as stable shewed, when I come to the time of the next Judge Thola. In the end he was simes Camerinus or Camicus in Sicilia by Cocalus the King, while he purfued Dadalus: andwas esteemed by some to be the first law-giver to those Ilands.

To this time are referred many deeds of Hercules, as the killing of Anteus the Gyan, who was faid to have 60 and odde cubits of length, which though Plutarch doth confirm, reporting that there was such a bodie found by Sertorius the Roman, in Lybia, when Hercules slew Anteus: yet for my selfe I thinke it but alowed lie. That Anteus was great strength and a cunning wrestler, Eusebius affirmeth: and because hee cast so many men to the ground, he was fained to be the sonne of the earth. Plinie saith, that he inhabited neere the gardens Hesperides in Mauritania. S. Augustine affirmes, that this Hurales was not of Greece, but of Lybia: and the Hydra also which he overcame, Plate expounds.

§. VI.
Of the expedition of the Argonautes.

Pelius the fon of Neptune, brother by the mothers fide to Efon, who was Jafansh ther, raigning in Jolcos a town of The state, was warned by the Oracle of Apollo to take he of him that wore but one shoe. This Pelias afterward facrificing to Neptune, invited 7a-Con to him, who comming hastily, lost one shoe in passing over a brooke: whereupon Pelias demanded of him what course he would take (supposing he were able) against one of whom an Oracle should advise him to take heed? to which question when Take for had briefly answered, that he would fend him to Colchos to fetch the golden Fleece. Pelias immediately commanded him to undertake that service. Therfore Jason prepared for the voyage, having a ship built by Argus the sonne of Phryxus, by the counfell of Pallas: wherein he procured all the bravest men of Greece to saile with him: as Typhis the Master of the ship, Orpheus the famous Poet, Castor and Pollux the sonnes of Tyndarus, Telamon and Peleus sonnes of Aacus, and fathers of Ajax and Achilles, Hercules. Theseus, Zetes and Calais the two winged sonnes of Boreas, Amphiaraus the great Soothfayer, Meleager of Calidon that flew the great wilde Boare: Ascalaphus and Falmenus or Almenus the sonnes of Mars, who were afterwards at the last warre of Troy. Laërtes the father of Ulyffes, Atalanta a warlike virgin, Idas and Lynceus the sonnes of Aphareus, who afterwards in fight with Caftor and Pollus flew Caftor, and wonnded Pollux, but were flaine themselves: Lyncens by Pollux, Idas by Jupiter with These and many other went with Jason in the ship Argo: in whose prowe was a table of the Beech of Dodona, which could speake. They arrived first at Lemnos; the women of which Iland, having slaine all the males, purposing to lead an Amazonian life, were neverthelesse contented to take their pleasure of the Argonautes. Hence they came to the Country about Czzicus: where dwelt a people called Doliones: over whom then raigned one Czzicus: who entertained them friendly: but it so fell out, that loosing thence by night, they were driven by contrary winds back into his port, neither knowing that it was the same Haven, nor being known by the Doliones to be the same ment but rather taken for some of their bordering enemies: by which meanes they fell to blows, insomuch that the Argonauts slew the most part of the Doliones together with their King Cyzicus: which when by day-light they perceived, with many teares they solemnized his funerall. Then departed they againe, and arrived shortly in Mysia, where they left Hercules and Polyphemus the son of Elates, who went to seeke Hylas the dar-

Polyphemus built a towne in Mysia called Cios, wherein he raigned. Hercules returned to Argos. From Mysia the Argonautes failed into Bythinia, which then was peopled by the Bebryces, the ancient Inhabitants of the Country, over whom Amyous the fonne of Neptune was then King. Hee being a strong man, compelled all strangers to fight with him at whorlebats, in which kind of fight he had flaine many, and was now himfelfe flain by Pollux. The Bebryces in revenge of his death flew all upon Pollux, but his companions rescued him, with great slaughter of the people. They sayled from hence to Salmydessus a towne in Thrace (fomewhat out of their way) wherin Phineus a Soothlayer dwelt, who was blind and vexed with the Harpyes. The Harpyes were faid to be a kinde of birds which had the faces of women, and foule long clawes, very filthy creatures, which when the table was furnished for Phineus, came flying in, and devouring or carrying away the greater part of the victuals, did so defile the rest, that they could not be endured. When therefore the Argonautes craved his advise, and direction for their Voyage: you shal doe wel (quoth he) first of all to deliver me from the Harpyes, and then afterwards to aske my counfaile. Whereupon they caused the table to be covered, and meat fet on which was no fooner fet down than that prefently in came the Harpyes and played their accustomed pranks: when Zetes and Calais the winged yong men saw this; they drew their fwords and purfued them through the air; some fay that both the Har-Presand the yong men died of wearinesse in the fight, & pursuit But Apollonius saith that the Harpies did covenant with the youths, to doe no more harme to Phineus, and were therupon dismissed. For this good turn Phineus gave them informations of the way,& advertised them with all of the dangerous rocks called Symplegades, which by force of Winds running together, did shut up the passage: wherfore he willed them to put a Pigeonbefore them in the passage: & if that passed safe, then to adventure after her if not, then by no means to hazard themselves in vain. They did so, & perceiving that the Pigeonhad only lost a piece of her taile, they observed the next opening of the rocks, and then rowng with all their might, passed through safe, only the end of their poope was bruised.

To she had a promise by oath. Then gave she to him a medicine this Jajon agreed, and confirmed his promise by oath. Then gave she to him a medicine wherewith she bad him to annoint both his body and his armed men would rife out of the whim from their violence: further she told him, that armed men would rife out of the ground, from the teeth which he should sowe, and set upon him. To remedy which in convenience, she bad him throw stones amongst them as soone as they came up thick, whereupon they would fall together to blowes, in such wise that he might easily slay whereupon they would fall together to blowes, in such wise that he might easily slay them. Jajon followed her counsaile; whereto when the event had answered, he againe devised how to destroy the Argonauses, and burne their ship; which Medaa penceiving, went to Jason, and brought him by night to the Fleece, which hung on an Oake in the grove of Mars, where, they say, it was kept by a Dragon, that never slep. This Dragon was by the Mazique of Medaa cast into a sleepe: so taking away the golden Fleece, she went with Jason into the ship Argo; having with her, her brother passes the surface of the went with Jason into the ship Argo; having with her, her brother passes the surface of the

Afterwards he sent may of his subjects to seeke the ship Argo, threatning that if they brought not backe Media, they should suffer in her stead. In the meane while the Argonautes were driven about the Seas, and were come to the River Eridanus, which is Po in Italie.

Jupiter, offended with the flaughter of Absyrius, vexed them with a great tempes, and carryed them they knew not whither; when they came to the Ilands Absyride, there the ship Argo (that there might want no incredible thing in this Fable) spake to them and said, that the anger of Jupiter should not cease, till they came to Austria, and were cleansed by Circe, from the murther of Absyrius. Now they there upon sayling between the coasts of Lybia and Gallia, and passing through the Sas Sardinia, and alongs the coast of Hetruria, came to the Ile of Aea, wherein Circedwell, who cleansed them. Thence they sayled by the coast of the Syrens, who sang to allust them into danger: but Orpheus on the other side sang so well that he stayed them. One ly Butes swamme out unto them, whom Venus ravished, and carryed to Lylibaum in Sintered well.

Having past the Syrens, they came betweene Scylla and Charybdis, and the stragling rocks which seemed to cast out great store of stames and smoake. But Thetis and the streides, conveyed them safe through at the appointment of Juno. So they coasted Civilia where the beeves of the Sunne were, and touched at Coreyra, the Hand of the Phaates, where King Alernous raigned. Meane while the men of Colchos, that had been set by Aetes in quest of the ship of Argo, hearing no newes of it, and searing his anger, they sulfill dnot his will, betooke themselves to new habitations: some of them dwell in the mountaines of Coreyre, others in the Hands Absyrtides, and some comming to the Pheaces, there found the ship Argo, and demanded Medea of Alcinous: whereto Alcinous made answer, that if the were not Jasons mife, they should have her; but if the were already married, he would not take her from her husband. Arete, the wife of Alcinous, hearing this, married them: wherefore they of Colchos, not daring to returne home, flayed with the Phaaces; fo the Argonantes departed thence, and after a while cameto Crete. In this Iland Mines raigned, who had a man of brassegiven to him (as fome of the Fablers fay) by Vulcan. This man had one veine in his body reaching from the necketo the heele, the end whereof was closed up with a brazen naile; his name was Talus: his cultome was to runne thrice a day about the Iland for the defence of it. When he saw the ship Argo passe by, he threw stones at it, but Medaa with her Magique defroved him. Some fay that she flew him by potions, which made him mad; others. that promifing to make him immortall, the drew out the nailethat stopt his veine, by whichmeans all his bloud ran out, and he died; others there are that fay he was flaine by Paan, who wounded him with an arrow in the heele. From hence the Argonautes fayled to Agina, where they were fain to fight for fresh water. And lastly, from Agina they failed by Esbera and Locris home to Jolcos, where they arrived, having spent foure whole moneths in the expedition.

Somethere are that by this journey of Jajon, understand the mystery of the Philosophersitione, called the golden Fleece, to which also, other super-fine Chymists draw the twelve labours of Hercules. Suidas thinkes that by the golden Fleece was meant a golden booke of Parchment, which is of sheep-skin, and therefore called golden, because it was taught therein how other mettals might be transmuted. Others would fignifie by Jalon, wisedome, and moderation, which overcommethall perils: but that which is most probable, is the opinion of Dercilus, that the story of such a passage was true, and that Jason with the rest went indeed to rob Colchos, to which they might arrive by boat. For not far from Caucasus there are certaine steep falling torrents which wash downemany graines of gold, as in many other parts of the world; and the people there inhabiting use to set many sleeces of wooll in those descents of waters, in which the graines of gold remaine, and the water passeth thorow, which Strabe witnesseth to be true. Themany rockes, straits, fands, and currents, in the passage betweene Greece and the bottome of Ponsus, are Poetically converted into those fiery buls, the armed men rifing out of the ground, the Dragon cast asleepe, and the like. The man of brasse, the Syrens, Stylla and Charybdis, were other hazzards and adventures which they fell into in the Mediterran Sea, disguised, as the rest, by Orpheus, under Poeticall morals: all which Homer afterward used (the man of braffe excepted) in the description of uly ses his travels on the same In-land seas.

Such is humane ambition, amonster that neither feareth God (though all-powerfull, and whose revenges are without date and for everlasting) neither hath it respect to nature, which labouin the preservation of every being: but it rageth also against her, though gar-Thed with beautie which never dyeth, and with love that hath no end. passions and affections, by which the soules of men are tormented, are by their contraries often-times refisted or qualified. But ambition, which begetteth every vice, and is it selfe the childe and darling of Satan, looketh onely towards the ends by it selfe set downe, forgetting nothing (how fearefull and inhumane foever) which may serveit: remembring nothing, what soever justice, piety, right or religion can offer and alledge on the contrary. It ascribeth the lamentable effects of like attempts, to the errour or weakenesse of the undertakers, and rather praiseth the adventure than feareth the like successe. It was the first sinne that the world had, and began in Angels: for which they were cast into hell, without hope of redemption. It was more ancient than man, and therefore no part of his naturall corruption. The punishment also preteded to his creation, yet hath the Divell, which felt the smart thereof, taught him to forget the one as out of date, and to practife the other, as befitting every age, and mans con-

Josham, the youngest of Gideons sonnes, having escaped the present perill, sought by his best persivasions to alienate the Stebemites from the affishing of this merciles tyran, letting them know, that those which were vertuous, and whom reason and religionhad taught the safe and happy estate of moderate subjection, had refused to receive as unlaw. full, what others had no power to give, without direction from the King of kings: who from the beginning (as to his own peculiar people) had appointed them by whomand how to be governed. This he taught them by the Olive, which contented it felfe to with its fatnesse, the Figge-tree with its sweetnesse, and the Vine with the good juya it had: the Bramble onely, who was most base, cut downe all the rest, and accepted the Soveraigntie. Laftly, in the affault of the Castle or Tower of Teber, himself a was wounded in the head with a stone throwne over the wall by a woman; and finding himselfe mortally bruised, he commanded his own Page to pierce his body, thereby avoid the dishonour of being slaine by so feeble a hand.

While Abimelech usurped the Government, the Lapitha and Centaures made warres gainst the Thebans. These Nations were descended of Apollo, and were the first inthose parts that devised to manage horses, to bridle and to sit them: insomuch as whenthey first came down from the mountaines of Pindus, into the plaines, those which hadnever feene horsemenbefore, thought them creatures compounded of men and horses; loud the Mexicans when Ferdinando Cortes the Spaniard first invaded that Empire.

After the death of Abimelech, Tholo of Iffachar governed Ifrael 23. yeares, and after him Jair the Gileadite 22. yeares, who feemes to be descended of Jair the some of Ma nasse, who in Moses time conquered a great part of Gilead, and called the same afterhis ownename, Havoth Jair. For to this Jair there remained thirty of those Cities which his ancestor had recovered from the Amorites. Of these Judges, because there is nothing else written, it is an argument that during all their times Ifrael lived without disturbance

When Jair judged Ifrael, Priamus began to raigne in Troy, who at fuch time as Hacules facked Ilium, was carryed away captive with his fifter Hefione into Greece, & heigh afterward redeemed for ransome, he rebuilt and greatly strengthened and adorned ras and so farre enlarged his Dominions, as he became the supreme Lord in effect of Asia the lesse. He married Hecuba the daughter of Cisses King of Thrace, and had in a (faith Cicero) fiftie fonnes, whereof seventeene by Hecuba, of whom Paris was one; who attempting to recover his aunt Hesione, took Helena the wife of Menelam, the cause of the warre which followed.

Theseus the tenth King of Athens, began likewise to raigne in the beginning of Just fome writers call him the forme of Neptune and Athra: but Plut arch in the forme of life, finds him begotten by Egeus, of whom the Grecian sea between it and Asia theles took name. For when Mines had maftered the Asbenians, fo far as he fore't themtop him feven of their sonnes every yeare for tribute, whom he inclosed within a Labyrinth. ro he devoured by the monster Minotaure because belike the sonnes of Taurse, which he begat on Pasiphae the Queene, had the charge of them: among these seven Thesess thrust himselfe, not doubting by his valour to deliver the rest, and to free the Countrie of that flaverie occasioned for the death of Androgeus, Minos his sonne.

And having possest himselfe of Ariadnes affection, who was Minos daughter, he received from her a bottome of thred, by which he conducted himselfe through all the crooked and inextricable turnings of the Labyrinth, made in all like that of the Citie of Crocodilesin Egypt; by meane whereof having flaine Minotaur, he found a ready way to returne. But whereas his father Ægem had given order, that if he came backe with vi-Aorie and in fafetie, he should use a white saile in signe thereof, and nor that mournefull blacke faile under which they left the port of Athens: This instruction being either forgottenor neglected, Egens descrying the Shippe of Thesens with a blacke faile, did cast himselfe over the Rockes downe into the Sea, afterward called of his name A-

One of the first famous acts of Thesew, was the killing of Segren, who kept a passage betweene Megara and the Peloponnessan Isthmes, and threw all whom he mastered into the Sea, from the high rockes. Afterward he did the like to Geregon, by wreftling, who used by that art to kill others. Healfo ridde the Countrie of Procrustes, who used to benddowne the strong limbes of two trees, and fastned by cords such as hee tooke, part of them to one, and part to the other bough, and by the springing up tare them asunder. So did he root out Periphetes and other mischievous theeves and murtherers. He overthrew the Armie of the Amazons, who after many victories and vaftations, entred the Territorie of Athens. Thefews having taken their Queen Hippolita prisoner, begat on her Hippolytus; with whom afterward his mother in law Phedra, falling in love; and he refuling to abuse his fathers bed, Phadra perswaded Theseus that his son offered to force her after which it is fained, that Thefeus befought Neptune to revenge this wrong of his somes by some violent death. Neptune taking a time of advantage, sent out his Sea-Calves, as Hippolysus passed by the sea shore, and so affrighted his horses, as casting the Coachover, he was (by being intangled therein) torne in pieces. Which miserable and undeferved deftinie, when Phedra had heard of the strangled her selfe. After which it is fained, that Diana intreated Asculapins to fer Hippolysus his pieces together, and to restore him to life: which done, because he was chaste, she led him with her into Italie. to accompany her inher hunting, and field fports.

It is probable that Hippolytus, when his Father fought his life, thinking to escape by Sea, was affronted thereat, and did receive many wounds in forcing his paffage and escape; which wounds Æsculapius, to wit, some skilful! Physician, or Chirurgion, healed againe: after which he passed into Italie, where he lived with Diana, that is, the life of a hunter, in which he most delighted. But of those ancient prophane Stories Plutarch faith well, that as Cosmographers in their descriptions of the world, where they finde many vast places whereof they know nothing, fill the same with strange Beafts, Birds, and Fishes, and with Mathematicall lines; so doe the Gracian Historians and Poets imbroder and intermixe the tales of ancient times, with a world of fictions and fabulous discourses. True it is, that Theseus did many great things in imitation of Hercules, whom he made his patterne, and was the first that gathered the Athenians, from being dispersed in thinne and ragged Villages: in recompence whereof, and for devising them Lawes to live under, and in order, he was by the beggarly, mutable, and ungratefull multitude, in the end banished. Some say, per offracifmum, by the Law of Lottes, or names written on shells, which was a device of his Yet Eusebius and Bunting, with Halicarnaseus, doe in effect consent, that the City was entred, and burnt in the first yeare of Demophoon Kine of Atbens, the fuccessour of Mnesthem, the successor of Thesens, seventeen dayes before the Summer Tropique; and that about the eleventh of September following, the Trojani crost the Hellespont into Thrace, and wintered there, and in the next spring that they navi. gated into Sicilia, where wintering the second yeare, the next summer they arrived at Laurentum, and builded Lavinium. But S. Augustine hath otherwise, That when Polyphi. In Sicyonia, Phallus the two and twentieth King, raigned eight years, beginning by the common account in the time of Thola. His fuccessors, Adrastus, who raigned four years, & Polyphides, who raigned thirteen, are accounted to the time of Jair; fo is also Mnellhut King of Ashens, and Asreus, who held a great part of Peloponnefus. 9. V II.

Of the warre of Thebes which was in this age.

N this age was the warre of Thebes, the most ancient that ever Greek Poet or Hillo rian wrote of: Wherefore the Roman Poet Lucretius, affirming (as the Epicurein this point held truly against the Peripatetickes) that the world had a beginning, weeth them with this objection.

> Si nulla fuit genitalis origo Rerumq; & mundi, semperque aterna fuere, Cur supra bellum Thebanum, & funera Troja, Non alias alsi quoque res cecimere Poeta?

> If all this world had no originall, But things have ever bin as now they are: Before the fiege of Thebes or Troyes last fall, Why did no Poet fing some elder warre ?

It is true that in these times Greece was very salvage, the inbabitants being often chaced as from place to place, by the Captaines of greater Tribes: and no man thinking the ground whereon he dwelt his owne longer than he could hold it by ftrong hand. Wherefore merchandize and other intercourse they used little, neither did they plant many trees, or fowe more come than was necessary for their sustenance. Money they had little or none, for it is thought that the name of mony was not heard of in Greece, when Homer did write, who measures the value of gold and braffe by the worth in cattell; faying that the golden armour of Glaucus was worth an hundred Beeves, and the copper armour of Diomedia worth nine.

Robberies by land and sea were common and without shame, and to steale horses of kine was the usuall exercise of their great men. Their townes were not many, whereof those that were walled were very few, and not great. For Mycena the principall City in Peloponnesus was a very little thing, and it may well be thought that the rest were proportionable: briefly, Greece was then in her infancie, and though in some small towns of that halfe Ile of Peloponnefus, the Inhabitants might have enjoyed quietneffe within their narrow bounds as likewise did the Athenians, because their Country was so barren, that nonedid care to take it from them: yet that the land in generall was very rude, if will eafily appeare to fuch as confider what Thucidy des the greatest of their Historians hath written to this effect, in the Preface to his Historic. Wherefore, as in these later rimes, idle Chroniclers use when they want good matter, to fill whole books with reports of great frosts, or dry summers, and other such things which no man cares to reade so did they who spake of Greece in her beginnings, remember onely the great flouds which were in the times of Ogyges and Deucation: or else rehearse fables of men changed into birds, of strange monsters, of adulterie committed by their gods, and the mighty men which they begat, without writing ought that favoured of humanitie before the time of the warre of Thebes: the briefe whereof is this.

Oedipus the sonne of Laises King of Thebes, having bin cast forth when he was an infant, because an Oracle foretold what evill should come to passe by him, did afterwards inanarrow passage, contending for the way, slay his owne father, not knowing either. then or long after, who hee was. Afterward hee became King of Thebes, by marriage of the Queene Josafta, called by Homer Epicafte: on whom, not knowing her to be his mo- Homody [11] ther, heebegate two fonnes, Eteocles and Polynices. But when in processe of time, finding out by good circumstances, who were his parents, hee understood the grievous murther and incest hee had committed, hee tore out his owne eyes for griefe, and left the Citie. His wife (and mother) did hang herfelfe. Some fay that Oedipus having his eyes pulled out, was expelled Thebes, bitterly curfing his fonnes, because they suffered their father to bee cast out of the Towne, and aided him not. Howsoever it were, his two Sonnes made this agreement, that the one of them should raigne one yeare, and the other another yeare, and fo by course rule interchangeably. But this appointment was ill observed. For when Polynices had after a yeares government refigned the Kingdome to his Brother: or (according to others) when Eteocles had raigned the first yeare, hee refused to give over the rule to Polynices. Hereupon Po-Innies fledde unto Argos, where Adrastus the Sonne of Talaas then raigned, unto whose palace comming by night, he was driven to seeke lodging in an out-house, on the backe-fide.

There hee mer with Tydeus the fonne of Oeneus, who was fled from Calydon: with whomstriving about their lodging, hee fell to blowes. Adrastus hearing the noise, cameforth and tooke up the quarrell. At which time perceiving in the shield of Ty deusa Bore, in that of Polynices a Lion, hee remembred an olde Oracle by which heewas advised to give his two daughters in marriage to a Lyon and a Bore: and accordingly he did bestow his daughter Argia upon Tydeus, and Deipyle upon Polynices, promifing to restore them both to their Countreies. To this purpose levying an Army, and affembling as many valiant Captaines as hee could draw to follow him, hee was defirous among others to carry Amphiaraus the fonne of Oicleus a great Sooth-sayer, and a valiant man, along with him. But Amphiaraus, who is faid to have foreseene all things, knowing well that none of the Captaines should escape, save onely Adrastus, did both utterly refuse to bee one in that expedition, and perswaded others to stay at home. Polynices therefore dealt with Eriphyle the Wife of Amphiaraus, offering unto heravery faire bracelet, upon condition that shee should cause her Husband to assist him. The South-sayer knowing what should worke his destinie, forbad his wife to take any gift of Polynices. But the bracelet was in her eye so precious a Jewell, that she could not refuse it. Therefore whereas a great controversie betweene Amphiaraus and Adrastus, was by way of compromise put unto the decision of Eriphyle, either of them being bound by solemne oath to stand to her appointment: shee ordered the matter 10, as a Woman should that did love a bracelet better than her husband. Hee now finding that it was farre more easie to soresee than avoide destiny, sought for such comfort as revenge might affoord him, giving in charge unto his fonnes, that when they came to full age, they should kill their mother, and make strong warre upon the Thebanes.

Now had Adrastus affembled all his forces, of which, the seven chiefe Leaders were bimselfe, Amphiaraus, Capaneus, and Hippomedon (in stead of whom some name Mecifew) all Argives, with Polynices the Theban, Tideus the Atolian, and Parthenopeus the Arcadian, sonne of Meleager and Atalanta. When the Army came to the Nemzan Wood, they met a woman, whom they defired to helpe them to some water; shee having a childe in her armes, laied it downe, and led the Argives to a spring: but ere shee returned, a ferpent had flaine the childe. This woman was Hypsipyle the daughter of Those the Lemnian, whom shee would have saved when the women of the Ile slew all the males by conspiracie, intending to lead an AmaZonian life. For such her Piety the Lemnian wives did fell her to Pyrats, and the Pyrats to Lyeurgus Lord of the Country. about Nemaa, whose young sonne Opheltes or Archemorus she did nurse, and lost, asis shewed before. When upon the childes death she hid her selfe for feare of her master Amphiar aus told her sonnes where they should find her: and the Argives did both kill the Serpent which had flaine the childe, and in memorie of the chance, did institute for lemne funerall games called Nemaan, wherein Adrastus wanne the prize with his swift horse Areon, Tydeus with the whorlbats, Amphiaraus at running and quoiting, Polynices at wreftling, Parthenopaus at shooting, and one Laodocus in darting. This was the first infi. tution of the Neman games, which continued after famous in Greece for very many a. 10 ges. There are, who think that they were ordained in honour of one Ophelius a Lacede. monian. Some fay by Hercules when he had flaine the Nemaan Lyon: but the common opinion agrees with that which is here fet downe. From Nemaathe Argives marching onwards arrived at Citheron, whence Tydeus was by them sent Embassadour to Thebes, to require of Eseccles the performance of Cove. nants between him and Polynices. This message was nothing agreeable to Eteocles, who was throughly refolved to hold what he had, as long as he could: which Tydeus percei. ving, and intending partly to get honour, partly to trie what mettle was in the Thebans. he made many challenges, and obtained victorie in all of them, not without much enviand malice of the people, who layd fifty men in ambush to intercept him at his returne to to the Army, of which fifty he flew all but one, whom he fent backe to the Citicasa reporter and witnesse of his valour. When the Argives understood how resolved Eta. cles was, they presented themselves before the Citie, and encamped round about it. Thebes is faid to have had at that time feven gates, which belike stood not far afunder, fering that the Argives (who afterward when they were very farre stronger, could scarce muster up more thousands than Thebes had gates) did compasse the Towne, Adrassus quartered before the gate Homoloides, Capaneus before the Ogygean, Tydeus before Cunis Amphiaraus at Proetis, Hippomedon at Anchais, Parthenopaus at Electa, and Polynicesa Hypsika. In the mean season, Executes having armed his men, and appointed Commanders unto them, took advise of Tirefias the Soothfayer, who promised victory to the Thebas to if Menacius the sonne of Creen, a principall man of the City, would vow himselfe to be flaine in honour of Mars the god of warre. So full of malice and pride is the Divell, and fo envious at his Creators glory, that he not onely challengeth honour due to God alone, as oblations and facrifice with all Divine worthip, but commandeth us to offer our selves and our children unto him, when he hath sufficiently clowded mens understanding, and bewitched their wils with ignorance and blinded evotion. And fuch abominable facrifice of men, maides, and children hath he exacted of the Syrians, Carthaginians, Gals, Germans, Cyprians, Egyptians, & of many other, if not of all Nations, when through ignorance or feare they were most filled with superstition. But as they grew more wile, fo did he waxe leffe impudent in cunning, though not leffe malicious in defiring the con 4 tinuance of fuch barbarous inhumanitie. For King Diphilus in Cyprus without advice of any Oracle, made the Idoll of that Country rest contented with an Oxe in stead of a man. Tiberius forbad humane facrifices in Afrike, and crucified the Priests in the groves where they had practifed them. Hercules taught the Italians to drown men of hay in flead of the living: yet among the falvages in the West Indies these cruell offerings have been practised of late ages: which, as it is a sufficient argument that Satans malice is onelycovered and hidden by this subtiltie among civill people: so may it serve as a probable conjecture of the barbarismes then raigning in Greece. For Menacius, as soone as heunderflood that his death might purchase victory to his people, bestowed himselfe (as hee thought) upon Mars, killing himselfe before the gates of the City. Then was a battalles fought, wherein the Argives prevailed so far at the first, that Capaneus advancing ladders to the wals got up upon the rampart: whence, when he fell or was cast down, or (as Writer) ters have it) was fricken down by Jupiter with a thunder-bolt, the Argives fled. Many on each part were flain in this battell, which caused both sides to defire that Executes and Polynices might try out the quarrell in fingle fight: whereto the two brethren according

Another battell was fought after their death, wherein the formes of Aftacus behaved themselves very valiantly: Ismarus one of the sonnes slew Hippomedon, which was one of the feven Princes: Parthenopaus being another of the feven (who was faid to have bin so faire, that none would hurt him when his face was bare) was flain by Amphidicus, or, assome say, by Periclymenus the sonne of Neptune: and the valiant Tydeus by Menalippus; yet ere Tydeus died, the head of Menalippus was brought unto him by Amphiaraus. which he cruelly tore open, and fwallowed up the braines. Upon which fact, it is faid. that Pallas, who had brought from Jupiter fuch remedie for his wounds, as should have made him immortall, refused to bestow it upon him: whereby perhaps was meant that hishonour which might have continued immortall, did perish through the beastly rage that he shewed at his death.

The hoast of the Argives being wholly discomfitted, Adrastus and Amphiaraus fled : of 10 whom Amphiaraus is said to have beene swallowed quicke into the earth, neare to the river Ismenus, together with his Chariot, and so lost out of mens fight, being peradvennure overwhelmed with dead carkaffes, or drowned in the river: and his bodie never found, nor greatly fought for. Adrastus escaped on his good horse Arion, and came to Athens: where sitting at an Altar, called the Altar of Mercie, he made supplication for their aide to recover their bodies. For Croon having obtained the Government of Thebes after the death of Executes, would not suffer the bodies of the Argives to bee buried: but caused Antizone, the onely daughter then living of Oedipus, to bee buried quicke, because she had sought out and buried the bodie ofher brother Polynices, contrary to Creens Edict. The Athenians condescending to the request of Adrastus, did send forth an Armie under the conduct of Thefens, which tooke Thebes, and restored the bodies of the Argives to Sepulture: at which time Evadne the wife of Capaneus threw her selfeinto the funerall fire, and was burnt willingly with her Husband. But it little contented the fonnes of those Captaines which were flaine at Thebes, that any leffe revenge should be taken of their fathers death, than the ruine of the Citie: where fore tenne year afterhaving levied forces, Azialeus the sonne of Adrastus, Diomedes of Tydeus, Promashus of Parthemopaus, Sthenelus of Capaneus, Thersander of Polynices, and Euripylus of Mesifius, marched thither under the conduct of Alemaon, the fon of Amphiaraus: with whom also went his bother Amphilottus. Apollo promised victorie if Alemaon were their Captain, whom afterward by another Oracle he commanded to kill his own mother.

When they came to the Citie, they were incountred by Landamas the fon of Eteocles then King of the Thebanes, (for Creen was onely Tutor to Laidamas) who though he did valiantly in the battell, and flew Agialeus, yet was hee put to the worst, and driven to flie, or (according to Apollodorus) flain by Alemaon. After this disaster the citizens began to desire composition; but in the meane time they conveyed themselves with their wives and children away from thence by night, and so began to wander up and downe, till at lengththey built the Town called Estima. The Argives, when they perceived that their enemies had quitted the Town, entring into it, facked it, threw down the walls, and laid it waste; howbeit it is reported by some, that the Town was saved by Thirsander, the son of Polynices, who causing the Citizens to returne, did there raigne over them. That he saved the Citie from utter destruction, it is very likely, for he raigned there, and led the The-

uponthe Amonites, they were inforc's to feek Jephta, whom they had formerly defpifed and cast from them, because he was base borne; but he (notwithstanding those former injuries) participating more of godly compaffion than of divellish harred and revenge was content to lead the Gileadites to the Warre, upon condition that they should effablish him their Governour after victorie. And when hee had disputed with Ammon for the Land, disproved Ammons right, and fortified the title of Ifrael by many arguments. the same prevailing nothing, he began the warre; and being strengthened by God, over. threw them: and did not onely beaterhem out of the plaines, but forc't them over the mountaines of Arabia, even to Minnith, and Abel of the vineyards, Cities express there. tofore in the description of the holy Land. The second Booke of the first part

After the sethings the children of Israel, of the Tribe of Ephraim, either envious Tephra's victorie, or otherwise making way to their future calamitie, and to the most orie. your flavery that ever Ifrael fuffered, quarrelled with Jephia, that they were not called to the Warre, as before time they had contested with Gideon. Jephra hereupon inforced no to defend himselfe against their furie, in the incounter slew of them 42000. which so weakned the bodie of the Land, as the Philiftims had an easie conquest of themallor long after. Tephta, after he had judged I frael fixe yeares, died: to whom fucceeded Iblan who ruled seven yeares: after him Elon was their Judge tenne yeares: in all which time Ifrael had peace. Eufebius findes not Elon, whom he calleth Adon, for in the Septuaging,

Now before I goe on with the rest, it shall be necessarie upon the occasion of Topha's account of the times Jud. 11.28. (where he faies that Ifrael had then posses the East side of Jordan 300 years) to speak somewhat of the times of the Judges and of the differing opinions among the Divines and Chronologers: there being found three places of Scrip-16 tures touching this point, feeming repugnant or difagreeing: the first is in this dispute betweene Jephta and Ammon, for the right and possession of Gilead: the second is that of Saint Paul, Atts 12. the third is that which is in the first of Kings. Jephia here challengen the possession of Gilead for 300. years: Saint Paul giveth to the Judges, as it feems, from the end of Joses to the last of Heli, 450. yeares. In the first of Kings it is taught, that from the departing of Israel out of Egypt, to the foundation of Salomons Temple, there were confumed 480. years. To the first Beroaldus findeth Jephra's 300. yeares to be but 266. yeares, to wit, 18.0f Josua, 40.0f Othoniel, 80.0f And and Samzar, 40.0f Debon, 40. of Gideon, 3. of Abimelech, 23. of Thola, and 22. of Jair : But Jephta (faith Beroaldui) putteth or proposeth a certaine number for an uncertaine: Sic ut dicat annum agi propin tresentesimum, ex quo nullus litem ea de re moverit Israeli; So he speaketh (saith he) asmaning, that then it was about or wel-nighthe three hundreth yeare, fince Ifrael poffeffed those Countries, no man making question of their right. Codoman on the contrary findes more years than Jephra named by 65. to wit, 365. where of 71. were spent in Israels captivitie, at severall times, of which (as Codoman thinketh) Jephta forbare to repeate the whole fumme or any great part, left the Ammonite should have justly objected, that 71. of those yeares the Ifraelites were in captivitie and vaffals to their neighbour Princes, and therefore knowing that to name three hundred yeares, it was enough for prescription, he omitted the rest.

To justifie this account of 365. yeares, besides the 71. yeares of captivitie or affirm ction, to bee added to Beroaldus his 266. hee addeth also 28. yeares more, and so maketh up the summe of 365. These 28. yeares hee finderhout thus: twenty yeares hee gives to the Seniors betweene Josua and Oshoniel: and where Beroaldus alloweth eighteene yeares to Fosua his government, Codoman accounts that his rule lasted 26. according to Josephus : whereas Saint Augustine and Ensebius give him 27. Melanathon 32. The truth is, that this addition of 28. years is farre more doubtfull than the other of 71. But though wee admit not of this addition, yet by accounting of some part of the yeares of affliction (to wit, 34. yeares of the 71.) if we adde them to the 266. yeares of Beroaldus, which reckoneth none of these, we have the just number of 300. yeares. Neither is it strange that Jephra should leave out more than halfe of the yeares of affliction: feeing, as it is already faid, the Ammonites might except against the 71. yeares, and fay, that during these yeares, or at least a good part of them, the Israelites had no quiet possession of the Countries in question. Martin Luther is the author of a third opinion, making those 300. yeares remembred by Jephta, to bee 306. which odde veares, faith hee, Jephta omitteth. But because the yeares of every Judge, as they reigned, cannot make up the number of 306. but doe onely compound 266. therefore doth Lusher adde to this number the whole time which Moses spent in the Desarts of Arabia Petra; which forty yeares of Moses added to the number which Beroaldus findeth of 266. make indeed 306.

But I see nothing in the Text to warrant Luthers judgement herein: for in the dispute betweene Jephia and Ammon for the Land of Gilead, it is written in the person of Ammon, in these words: Because Is raeltooke my Land, when they came up from Egypt, from Arnon unto Jaboc, &c. now therefore restore those Lands quietly; or in peace. So by this placeitis plaine, that the time is not to be accounted from Mogs departure out of Egypt: but from the time that the Land was possest. For it is said, Quia cepit Israel terram meam, Behold Ifrael tooke my Land: and therefore the beginning of this account is to be referred to the time of the taking: which Jephta's answer also confirmeth in these words: 20 When Ifrael dwell in Heshbon, and in her Townes, and in Areer, and in her Townes, and in all the Cities that are by the coast of Arnon 300. yeares: why did ye not then recover them Judit 126, in that space? soas this place speaks it directly, that Israel had inhabited and dwelt in the Cities of Gilead 300. yeares: and therefore to account the times from the hopes orintents that Israel had to posselle it, it seemeth somewhat strained to mee: for we doe not use to reckon the time of our conquests in France, from our Princes intents or purpo-

Junius neverthelesse likes the opinion of Luther, and sayes, that this time of 300 years hathreference, and is to take beginning from the first of Jephra's narration; when he makes a briefe repetition of Moses whole journey: to wit, at the sixteenth Verseof the ekventh Chapter of Judges, in our translation in these words: But when I frael came up Junius in the sto from Egypt, &c. and therefore Moses his 40. yeares (as he thinkes) are to be accounted, of Judg. annote which make the number of 305. yeares: and not onely the time in which Ifrael possess Gilead, according to the Text, and Jephta's owne words: of which I leave the judgment toothers; ro whom also Ileave to judge, whether we may not begin the 480. yeares, from the deliverance out of Egypt to the Temple, even from the first departure out of Egyp, and yet finde a more probable reconciliation of Saint Pauls and Jephta's account with this reckoning, than any of those that as yet have been signified. For first, touching Jephra's three hundred yeares of possession of the East side of Jordan, it is to be remembred, that for a good while before the Ifraelites possessed it, Sehon and og had dispossessed Moab and Ammon thereof: so that when the Israelites had conquered Schon and 0g, the right of possession which they had, passed to Israel; and so Jephia might say that they had possessed those Countries 300. years, reckoning 266. yeares of their own possession, and the rest of the possession of the two Kings, Sehon and Og, whose right the Israelites had by the law of conquest.

The second place disputed is this of S. Paul, Att. 13. that from the end of Fosica, to Read the 24. of the beginning of Samuel, there past 450. yeares. And this place Luther understandeth Joseph India also besides the letter (as I find his opinion cited by Functives Krentzhem us, and Beza) 2 of Judg 7for I have not reade his Commentaries. For he accounterh from the death of Mofes, to 4 Bezain his anthe last yeare of Heli, but 357. yeares: and this he doth the better to approve the times notations upon the 13. of the from the egression out of Egypt to the building of the Temple, which in the first of Kings Ad.v.10.

6. is said to be 480. yeares.

Nowforasinuchas S. Paul (as it seemes) findes 450. yeares from the death of Fosua, to the last of Hell, and leaves but thirty yeares for Saul and Samuel, who governed 40. for David who ruled 40. and for Salomon who wore the Crown three whole yeares ere the the foundation of the Templewas laid; therefore Luther takes it, that there was errour in the Scribe, who wrote out this piece of Scripture of S. Paul: to wit, Then afterward hee gave unto them Judges about 450. yeares, unto the time of Samuel the Pro-Pher: the words [then afterward] being clearely referred to the death, or after the death of Jojua, as shall be hereafter proved. But where Saint, Luke, rehearing the words of Saint Paul, wrote 350. yeares (faith Luther) the Scribe in the transcription being decei. ved by the affinity of those two Greek words, whereof the one fignifieth 300. and the other 400. wrote Tetracosios, for Triacosios; 400. yeares for 300 yeares; and 450. for 350. This he seeketh to strengthen by many arguments: to which opinion Beza in his great annotations adhereth. A contrary judgement to this hath Codoman: where Luther and Bel's begin at Moses death, he takes his account from the death of Josua, and from thence to the beginning of Samuelhe makes 430. yeares: to wit, of the Judges (not reckoning Sampsons yeares) 319. and of yeares of servirude and affliction under strangers, 111. The reason why he doth not reckon Sampsons twenty yeares, is, because he gers, 111. The reason why he doctriot tears, in which the Philipins are faid to have to oppressed Israel. For it is plaine, that during all Sampsons time they were Lords over Ifrael. So then of the Judges, besides the III. yeares of servitude, Codoman reckoneth (as I have faid) 319. yeares, which two fummes put together, make 430. yeares. And whereas Saint Paul nameth 450. yeares, he finds 20. yeares to make up Saint Pauls number, to have bin spentafter the death of Joshua by the Seniors, before the Cap. tivity of Culhan, or the election of Othoniel: which 20. yeares added to 430. make 450. according to Saint Paul. To approve this time of the Flders, he citeth two places of Scriptures, namely the 24. of Joins, and the fecond of Judges, in each of which plazes it is written, that I frael ferved the Lord all the dayes of Joshua, and all the dates of 10 the Elders that over lived Joshua: so as to these times of the Elders, Codoman given 20. yeares, which make as before 450. according to Saint Paul. Neither would it bred any great difficulty in this opinion, if here also the 20. yeares of the Seniors between Jofhus and Otheniel should be denied. For they which deny these yeares, and make Othoniels 40. to begin prefently upon the death of Joshua, as in the beginning of this reckoning, they have 20. yeares lesse than Codoman, so toward the end of it (when they reckonthe yeares of affliction apart from the yeares of the Judges) in the number of Samplons yeares, and of the forty yeeres of the Philiftims oppressing the If selices, they to have 20. yeares more than Codoman. For they reckon these 40. yeares of oppression all of them a-part from Sampsons 20. but Codoman, as is faid, makes Sampsons 20. tobe the one halfe of the forty of the Philistims oppressions; so that if the 20. years of the St. niors be not allowed to Codoman, then he may reckon (as the letter of the Text feems to inforce) that the Philifims in any Inter-regnum, before Sampson judged Israel, vexed the Ifraelites 40. years, besides the 20. while Sampson was their Judge; and so the reckoning will come to 450. yeares between the end of Josua, and the beginning of Samuel, though we admit not of an Inter-regnum of the Seniors between Josua and Othoniel: For, if the times of their affliction be summed, they make 111. yeares, to which swe adde the yeares of the Judges, which are 339. we have the just summe of 450. And this computation either one way or other, may feeme to be much more probable, than theirsthat correct the Text, although we should admit of their correction there of of, and read with them 350. for 450. For whereas they conceive that this time of 350. years, is to begin immediately, or foone after the death of Moses: certainely the place of S. Paul doth evidently reach the contrary, though it be received for true that there was visium scriptoris in the reft. For these be Saint Pauls words: And about the time of forty yeares, God suffered their manners in the wildernesse: And he destroyed seven Na tions in the Land of Canaan, and divided their Land to them by lot. Then afterward he gave unto them Judges about 450. yeares unto the time of Samuel the Prophet. So as first in the eighteenth verse he speaketh of Moses, and of his yeares spent in the Wildernesse, then in the nineteenth versehe commeth unto the acts of Josia; which were, that he destroyed seven Nations in the land of Canaan, and divided their Land 1016 them by lot. In the twentieth Verseit followeth, Then afterward bee gave them Judge about 450 yeares, &c. and therefore to reckon from the death of Mofes, is wide of Saint Pauls meaning, fo farre as my weak understanding can pierce it. The onely inconvenience of any weight in opinion of Codeman touching this place in the Alli, is, that it feemes irreconcileable with the account, I Reg. 6. 11. For if indeed there were spent 450. yeares between the end of Jofus and the beginning of Samuel, certainly there mult

neying from Egypt, and the foundation of the Temple by Salemon. To this difficulty

Codoman answereth, that these 480. years, 1 Reg. 6.1. must begin to be reckoned, not in the beginning, but in the ending of their journeying from Egypt, which he makes to be 25. yeares after the beginning of Othomiels government; from whence if wee cast the veares of the Judges, with the yeares of servicude (which summes, according to his account, of which we have already spoken, make 397. yeares) and so to these yeares adde the 40. of Samuel, and Saul, and the 40. of David, and the 3. of Salomon, wee shall have the just summe of 480. yeares. Neither is it hard (saith he) that the annus egressionis, I Reg. 6.1. should be understood egressianis non incipientis, sedsinita, the yeere of their comming out of Egypt (for foit is in the originall) or the yeare after they came out of Egypt, may well be understood for the year eafter they were come out thence, that is, after they had ended their wandring from thence. For sowee finde that things which were done 40. yeares after they had fet foot out of Egypt, are faid to have bin done in their going out of Egypt; as Pfal. 114. When I fraclcame, out of Egypt, Jordan was driven backe, and Deut 4.45. These are the testimonies which Moses spake when they came out of Egipt. And thus farre it feemes we may very well agree with Codoman, for the interpretation of the abenitusto be as much as quam exivifent, or ab exitufinito: for if Junius, Dent 4.45. doe well read gumm exivifent, for inexitu, as it seemes that herein he doth well, why may not we also, to avoid contradiction in the Scripture, expound abexitu to be pastauam exivisione?

The next point to be cleared, is how their journeying should be said not to have had enduntill the 25, yeare after the victory of athaniel. To this Godoman answereth, that then it had no end till when all the Tribes had obtained their portions, which happened notuntill this time: at which time the Danites at length feated themselves, as it is declared, Jud. 18. For doubtleffe to this time the expedition may most conveniently be re-Jud. 18.1 ferred. And thus without any great inconvenience to him appearing, doth Codoman reconcile the account of Jephea, and S. Paul, with that in the first of King.c.6. Now wherasitisfaid that the expedition of the Danites was when there was no King in Ifrael: to this Codoman answereth, that it is not necessary that we should suppose that Othoniel livedall those 40. yeares of rest, of which Jud. 3.11. so that by the 25. yeare after his vio cory, either he might have bin dead, or at least, as Gideon did, he might have refused all foveraignty, and so either way it might truely bee said that at this time (to wit, the 25. yeare after Othoniels victory) there was no King in Ifrael. This opinion of Codoman, if it were as consonant to other Chronologers, grounding their opinions on the plaine Text, where it is indisputable, as it is in it selfe round enough and coherent, might perhaps be received as good: especially considering, that the speeches of S. Paul have not otherwise found any interpretation, maintaining them as absolutely true, in such manner as they found, and are fet downe. But feeing that he wanteth all helpe of authority, we may juftly suspect the supposition whereupon his opinion is grounded; it being such as the consent of many Authors would hardly suffice to make very probable. For who hath told Codoman, that the conquest of Laish, by the Tribe of Dan, was performed in the five and twentieth yeere of Othoniel? Or what other probability hath hee than his owne conjecture, to shew that Othoniel did so renounce the office of a Judge after five andtwenty yeeres, that it might then be truely faid there was no King in Ifrael, but every mandid that which was good in his owne eyes?

Now concerning the rehearfall of the law by Moses, and the stopping of Jordan, they might indeed bee properly faid to have been, when Ifrael came out of Egypt like as we say that King Edward the first was crowned when he came out of the holy Land, for so all journeles with their accidents commonly take name from the place either whence or whither they tend. But I thinke that hee can finde no such phrase of peech in Scripture as limiteth a journey by an accident, or faith by converting the pro-Polition, when Jordan was turning back, Ifrael came out of Egypt. Indeed most unproperit were to give date unto actions commenced long after, from an expedition finished long before, namely, to fay, that King Edward at his arrivall out of Palæstina did winne Scolland, or died at Carlile. How may we then beleeve that enterprize performed for many yeeres after the division of the Land (which followed the conquest at the jourfees end) should be said to have bin at the time of the departure out of Egypte Or who will not thinke it most strange, that the most notable account of time, serving as the one-Vguide for certaine ages in facred Chronologie, should not take name and beginning from that illustrious deliverance out of Egyps, rehearfed often by God himselfe among the principall of his benefits to Ifrael, whereof the very day and moneth are recorded in Scripture (as likewise are the yeare and moneth wherein it expired) and the forme of the yeare upon that occasion changed; but should have reference to the surprizing of a Town by fixe hundred men, that robbed a Chappell by the way, and stole from thence Idols to be their guides, as not going to work in Gods name. For this accident whereupon Codoman buildeth, hath either no time given to it, or a time far different from that which he supposeth, and is indeed rather by him placed in such a yeare, because it best flood with his interpretation fo to have it, than for any certainety or likelihood of the Wherefore we may best agree with such as affirme that the Apostle S. Paul did not 10 thing it selfe. herein labour to set downethe course of time exactly (a thing no way concerning his purpose) but onely to shew that God, who had chosen Israel to be his people, delivered them out of bondage, and ruled them by Judges and Prophets unto the time of Saul, did raise up our Lord Jesus Christ out of the seed of David the King, in whose succession the Crowne was established, and promise made of a Kingdome that should have no end, Now in rehearing briefly thus much which tended as a Preface to the declaration following (wherein he sheweth Christ to have beene the true Messias) the Apostle was so farre from labouring to make an exact calculation of times (the History being so well known & beleeved of the Jewes to whom he preached) that he spake as it were at large 20 of the 40. yeares consumed in the wildernesse, whereof no man doubted, saying, that God suffered their manners in the wildernesse about 40. yeares. In like manner hepoceeded, faying, that from the division of the Land unto the daies of Samuel the Prophet, in whose time they required to have a King, there passed about 450. yeares. Neither did he stand to tell them, that an hundred and eleven yeares of bondage mentioned in this middle while, were by exact computation to be included within the 339. yeares of the Judges: for this had bin an impertinent digression from the argument which he had in hand. Wherefore it is not a work so needfull as laborious, to search out of this place that 10 which the Apostle did not here intend to teach, when the summe of 480. yeares is soex. pressely and purposely set downe.

Now that the words of S. Paul (if there be no fault in the copy through error of some Scribe) are not fo curiously to be examined in matter of Chronologie, but must be taken, as having reference to the memory and apprehension of the vulgar, it is evident by his ascribing in the same place 40. yeares to the reigne of Saul: whereas it is manifest that those yeares were divided between Saul & Samuel, yea, that far the greater part of them were spent under the government of the Prophet, howsoever they are here included in the reigne of the King. As for those that with so much cunning for sake the general opinion, when it favoureth not such exposition as they bring out of a good minde, to help where the need is not overgreat; I had rather commend their diligence, than follow their example. The words of S. Paul were sufficiently justified by Beroaldus, as having 40 reference to a common opinion among the Scribes in those dayes, that the 111. years of servitude were to be reckoned apart from the 339. yeares ascribed to the Judges which account the Apostle would not in this place stand to contradict, but rather chose to speake as the vulgar, qualifying it with a quasi, where he faith quasi quadringentie quinquagintaannis, As it were foure hundred and fifty yeares. But Codoman being not thus contented, would needs have it be so indeed, and therefore dis-joines the members to make the account even. In so doing he dasheth himselfe against a notable Text, where upon all Authors have builded, (as well they might and ought) that purposely and precifely doth cast up the yeares from the departure out of Egypt, unto the building of Sollmons Temple, not omitting the very Moneth it selfe.

Now(as commonly the first apprehensions are strongest) having already given faith 10 his owne interpretation of S. Paul, he thinketh it more needfull to finde fome new exposition for that which is of it selfe most plaine, and to examine his owne conjecture upon a place that is full of controversie. Thus by expounding, after a strange Methode, that which is manifest by that which is obscure, he loseth himselfe in those waies where in before him never man walked. Surely if one should urge him to give reason of these new opinions, he must needs answer, that Oshoniel could not governe above 25. years, because then was the taking of Laish, at which time there was no King in Israel; That the Danites must needs have taken Lailh at that time, because else we could not reckon backwards from the foundation of the Temple to any action that might be termed the comming of Israel out of Egypt, without excluding the yeeres of fervitude; And that the veeres of servitude must needes be included, for that otherwise he himselfe should have menthis time vainely, in feeking to pleasure S. Paul with an exposition. Whether this ground be strong enough to uphold a Paradoxe, I leave it to the decision of the judicious

And now to proceed in our story. To the time of Jephta are referred the death of Hercules, the rape of Helen by Paris, and the provisions which her husband Menelaus. reigning then in Sparta, and his brother Agamemnon King of Mycenæ, made for her recovery. Others referre this rape of Helen to the fourth yeere of 1674n: from which time, if the warre of Troy (as they suppose) did not begin till the third of Aslon or Elon, yet the Greeks had fixe yeeres to prepare themselves: the rule holding not true in this War, langapraparatio belli celerem affert victoriam; that a long preparation begets a speedy victone. for the Greeks confumed ten yeares in the attempt: and Troy, as it seemes, was entred, fackt, and burnt in the third yeare of Habdon.

Three yeares after Troy taken, which was in the fixt yeere of Habdon, Aeneas arrived in Italy. Habdon in the eighth yeare of his rule, died, after he had beene the Father of 40. fonnes, and 30. grand-children. And whereas it is supposed, that the 40. yeeres of o Ifraels oppression by the Philistims (of which Jud. 13. v.1.) took beginning from the ninthyeere of Jair, and ended with the last of Habdon: I see no reason for that opinion. For Ephraim had had little cause of quarrell against Jephra, for not calling them to war over fordan, if the Philistims had held them in servitude in their own territories: and if Ephram could have brought 42000 armed men into the field, it is not likely that they werethen opprest: and had it been true that they were, who will doubt but that they would rather have fought against the Philistims with so powerfull an Army for their ownedeliverance, than against their own brethren the Ifraelites? but Ammon being overthrowne, it seemed at that time, that they feared no other enemy. And therefore these 40. veers must either be supplied elsewhere, as in the time of Sampson, and afterward or elfe they must be referred to the inter-regnum between the death of Habdon. and the deliverance of Ifrael by Sampfor, fuch as it was.

CHAP. XIII. Of the Warre of Troy.

Of the Genealogy of the Kings of Troy, with a note touching the ancient Poets show they have observed historicall truth.

He Warre at Troy with other ftorieshereupon depending (because the ruine of this Citie, by most Chronologers is found in the time of Habdon Judge of Israel, whom in the last place I have mentioned) I rather choose here to treat of in one entire narration, beginning with the lineal descent of their Princes, than to breakehe story into pieces by rehearsing a-part in diversive years, the diversity of occurrents.

The Historic of the ancient Kings of Troy is uncertaint, in regard both of their originall, and of their continuance. It is commonly held that Teucer and Dardanus were the two founders of that Kingdome. This is the opinion of Pireil: which if he (as Raneccius thinks) tooke from Berofus, it is the more probable: if Annius borrowed it ofhim, then it refts upon the authority of Virgil, who faith thus:

> Creta Jovis magni mediojacet insula Ponto ! Mons Idaus ubi ,& gentu cunabula nostra. Nn a

In the maine Sea the Ile of Creete doth lve: Whence Jove was borne, thence is our progeny. There is mount Ida: there in fruitfull Land An hundreth great and goodly Cities stand. Thence (if I follow not mistaken fame) Teucer the eldeft of our grand-fires came To the Rhætean shores: and reigned there Ere yet faire Ilion was built, and ere The Towers of Troy : their dwelling place they fought In lowest Vales. Hence Cybels rites were brought: Hence Corybantian Cymbals did remove: And hence the name of our Idean grove.

Thus it seemeth by Virgil, who followed surely good authority, that Teucer first give name to that Countrey, wherein he reigned ere Troy was built by Dardanus: of which Dardanus in the same booke he speaks thus:

Est locus, Hesperiam Grait cognomine dicuns: Terra antiqua, potens armis et 45 where gleba. Oenotrii colucre viri nunc fama minores Italiam dixiffe, ducis de nomive gentem. Ha nebis propria fedes : binc Dardamis ortus : Jafinfq; Pater, genus à que principe noftrum.

Hesperia the Gracians call the place: An ancient fruitfull Land, a warlike race, Oenotrians held it : now the later progenie Gives it their Captaines name, and calls it Italy; This feat belongs to us, hence Dardanus, Hence came the author of our stocke, Jasius.

Some old Aruncans, I remember well, (Though time have made the fame obscure) would tell Of Dardanns, how borne in Italy: From hence he into Phrygia did flic. And leaving Tufcaine (where he earst had place) With Corytus did faile to Samothrace; But now inthronized he firs on high, In golden Palace of the starry skie.

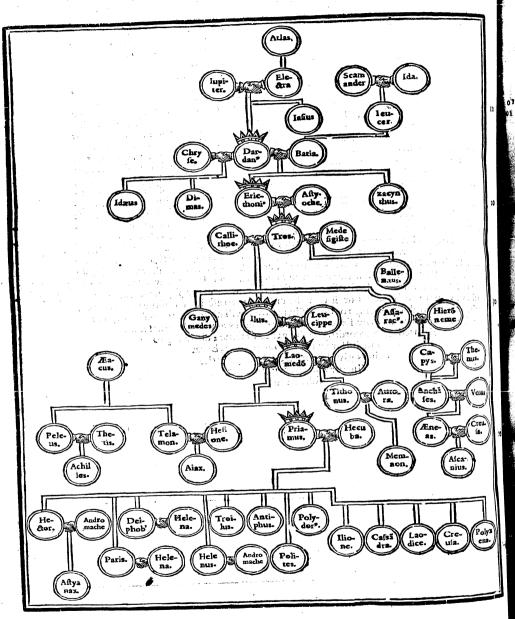

But contrary to this, and so many Authors, approving and confirming it, Reintella thinkes that thefe names, Trees, Teneri, and Thraces, are derived from Tires or Thirs the fon of Japhes : and that the Dardanians, My fians, & Afcanians, mixt with the Trojan were Germane Nations, descended from Ashkenaz, the sonne of Gomer: of whom the Countrie, Lake, and river of Ascanius in Asia tooke name. That Askenaz gave name to those places and people, it is not unlikely: neither is it unlikely, that the Ascanit, Darda. mi and many others, did in after-times paffe into Europe: that the name of Teucer came of Irras, the conjecture is somewhat hard. Concerning Tencer, whereas Hal carnalleur makes him an Athenias, I finde none that follow him in the fame opinion. Virgil (as is hefore shewed) reporteth him to be of Crete; whose authority is the more to be regarded because he had good meanes to finde the truth, which it is probable that he carefully fought, and in this did follow, seeing it no way concerned Augustus (whom other-whiles to he did flatter) whether Tencer were of Grete or no. Reineccius doth rather embrace the opinion of Diodorus, and others that thinke him a Phrygian, by which report he was the Sonne of Scamander and Ida, Lord of the Country, not founder of the Citie; and his Daughter or Neece Batia was the second wife of Dardanus founder of Troy. Reineccius further thinkes that Atlas raigned in Samothracia, and gave his daughter Elettra to Coretus, or Coritus: and that these were parents to Chryse, first wife to Dardanus. Virgilholds otherwise; and the common Tradition of Poets makes Dardanus the sonne of Electra by Jupiter, which Electra was the daughter of Atlas, and wife to Coritus King of Hetruria, to whom she bare Jasius. Annius out of his Berefus findes the name of Camboblascon, to whom he gives the addition of Corytus, as a Title of dignity, making him Father of Dardanus and Jasius; and further telling us very particularly of the faction betweene these Brethren, which grew to fuch heate, that finally Dardanus killed his Brother, and thereupon fled into Samothrace. The obscurity of the historie gives leave to Annus of faying what he lift. I, that love not touse such libertie, wil for beare to determine any thing herein. But if Dardanus were the Sonne of Jupiter, it must have beene of some elder Jupiter than the Father of those that lived about the Warre of Troy. So it is likewise probable that Atlas the Father of Electra was rather an Italian than an African, which also is the Deville 423: opinion of Boccace. For (as hath often been faid) there were many Jupiters, and many of Boccace gen almost every name of gods: but it was the custome to ascribe to some one the acts of the rest, with all belonging to them. Therefore I will not greatly trouble my self with making any narrow fearch into these fabulous antiquities, but set down the Pedigree according to the generall fame; allowing to

Concerning the beginning and continuance, the Trojan Kingdome, with the length of every Kings reigne, I have chosen good Authors to be my guides, that in a History, whereon depends the most ancient computation of times among the Greeks, I might not follow incertainties, ill cohering with the consent of Writers, and generall passage of things elsewhere done. And first for the destruction of Troy, which was of greater note than any accident befalling that City whilest it stood, it is reckoned by Diodorus to be Diodles. 780. yeares more ancient than the beginning of the ninety fourth Olympiad. Whereas therefore 372. did passe betweene the beginning of the Olympiads, and the first yeare of the 94. it is manifest that the remainder of 780. yeares, that is 408. yeares went betweene the destruction of Troy, and the first institution of those games by Iphitus, if Diodin pref. the authority of Diedorus be good proofe, who elsewhere tels us, that the returne of the Herachdæ, which was 80. yeares after the fall of Troy, was 328. yeares before the first Olympiad.

Hereunto agrees the authority of Dionysius Halicarnasseus, who placing the foundati- Dionysi Halica on of Rome in the first of the seventh Olympiad, that is, source and twenty yeares after the Antique. beginning of those games, accounts it 432. later than the fall of Troy. Solians in expresse solian politifica; words, makes the institution of the Olympiads by Iphitus, whom he calleth Iphiclus, 480. yeares later than the destruction of Troy. The summe is easily collected by necesfary inference out of divers other places in the same booke. Hereunto doth Eusebius, Eusebide rap.Ereckoning exclusively agree: and Eratosthenes (as he is cited by Clemens Alexandrinus) vangl. 10 c.3.cle.

Theother collections of divers writers that are cited by Clemens in the fame place doe neither cohere any way, nor depend upon any collaterall hiftory, by which they may be

The destruction of Troy being in the yeare before the Olympiads four hundred and eight: we must seeke the continuance of that from the beginning to the end, out of Essebius, who leads us from Dardanus on-wards, through the reignes of foure Kings, by the space of two hundred and five and twenty yeares, and after of Priamus, with whom also t length it ended. As for the time which passed under Laomedon, we are faine to doe as others have done before us, and take it upon trust from Annius his Authors; beleeving Manetho so much the rather, for that in his account of the former Kings reignes, and of Priamus, he is found to agree with Eusebins, which may give us leave to thinke that Anmus hath not herein corrupted him. But in this point we need not to be very scrupulous: for seeing that no history or accompt of time depends upon the reigne of the former Kings, but onely upon the ruine of the Citie under Priamus, it may suffice that we are carefull to place that memorable accident in the due yeare.

True it is, that some objections appearing waighty, may be alledged in maintenance of different computations, which with the answers I purposely omit, as not willing to dispute of those yeares, wherein the Greeks knew no good forme of a yeare; but rather to make narration of the actions which were memorable, and acknowledged by all writers, whereof this destruction of Troy was one of the most renowned.

The first enterprise that was undertaken by generall consent of all Greece, was the last warre of Troy, which hath bin famous even to this day, for the numbers of Princes and valiant Commanders there affembled; the great bartailes fought with variable successes the long indurance of the fiege: the destruction of that great Citie: and the many Colomes planted in fundry countries, as well by the remainder of the Trojans, as by the victorious Greeks after their unfortunate returne. All which things, with innumerable circumstances of especials note, have bin delivered unto posterity, by the excellent wits ofmany writers, especially by the Poems of that great Homer, whose verses have given immortality to the action, which might else perhaps have been buried in oblivion, among other worthy deeds, done both before and fince that time. For it is true which Herace faith:

Many by valour have deferv'd renowne Ere Agamemnon; yet lye all opprest Under long night, unwept for, and unknowne: For with no facred Poet were they bleft.

Yet foit is, that whilft these writers have with strange fables, or (to speake the bestof them) with Allegories farre strained, gone about to enlarge the commendations of those noble undertakers: they have both drawne into suspicion that great vertue which they fought to adorne, and filled after-ages with almost as much ignorance of the History, admiration of the persons. Wherefore it is expedient that we seeke for the knowledge of fuch actions, in Histories; learning their qualities who did manage them, of Poets, in whose workes are both profit and delight: yet small profit to those which are delighted otherwise; but such as can interpret their fables, or separate them from the naked truth, fhall find matter in Poems, not unworthy to be regarded of Historians. For those things excepted which are gathered out of Homer, there is very little, and not without much difagreement of Authors, written of this great warre. All writers consent with Home, that the rape of Helen by Paris the fon of Priamus, was the cause of taking arms: but how he was hereunto emboldened, it is doubtfull.

Eredetus fetcheth the cause of this rape from very farre; faying, That whereas the Phoenicians, had ravished 10, and carried her into Fgypt, the Greeks, tobe -revenged on the Barbarians, did first ravish Europa, whom they brought out of Phamera into Creta, and afterward Medaa, whom they fetcht from Celchos, denying to restore her to her father, till such time as they might be satisfied for the rape of the these deeds of the Greeckes, Paris (as the fame Herodorus affirmes) was emboldenedo doe the like; not fearing fuch revenge as enfued. But all this narration feemes frivolus. For what had the King of Calches to doe with the injury of the Phoenicians ? Orhow could the Greekes, as in revenge of 16, plead any quarrell against him, that never had heard the name of Phoenicians? Thucydides, a writer of unquestionable fincerity, maken it plaine, that the name of Barbarians was not used at all in Homers time, which was long after the warre of Troy: and that the Greeks themselves were not then called all by one name, Hellenes, as afterwards. So that it were unreasonable to thinke, that they should have fought revenge upon all Nations, as barbarous, for the injury received byone: or that all people else should have esteemed of the Greeks, as of a people opposed wall the world; and that even then when as the Greekes had not yet one common name among themselves. Others with more probability say, that the rape of Helen wasto procure the redelivery of Hefione, King Priamus his fifter, taken formerly by Hereult, and given to Telamon. This may have beene true: for Telamon (as it feemes) was active ell man, seeing his owne sonne Teucer durst not come in his sight, after the warre of Try, but fled into Cyprus, onely because his brother Ajax (which Teucer could not remedy) had flaine himselfe. Yet, were it so, that Hesione was ill entreated by Telamon, it was not therefore likely that Priamus her brother would feeke to take her from her husband, with whom shee had lived about thirty yeeres, and to whom shee had borne children which were to fucceed in his Dominion. Whereupon I thinke that Paris had note gard either to the rape of Europa, Medea, or Hesione, but was meerely incited by Venus, that is, by his luft, to doe that which in those dayes was very common. For not onely Greeks from Barbarians, and Barbarians from Greeks, as Herodotus difcourfeth; butally people were accustomed to steale women and cattell, if they could by strong hand or power get them: and having stollen them, either to fell them away in some farre Countrie, or keep them to their owne use. So did Thefeus and Pirythous attempt Proferpine; and so did Theseus (long before Paris) ravish Helen. And these practices, as it appears in Thucydides, were so common, that none durst inhabite neere unto the Sea, for feared pyracy, which was accounted a trade of life no leffe lawfull than merchandife: where fore Tyndareus, the father of Helen, confidering the beauty of his daughter, and the rape which Thefew had made, caused all her woods, who were most of the principall men in Greece, to binde themselves by solemne oath, that if she were taken from her hufband, they should with all their might helpe to recover her. This done, he gave free choice of a husband to his daughter, who chose Menelaus, brotherto Agamemnon. So the cause which drew the Greeks unto Troy in revenge of Helens rape, was partly the oath which so many Princes had made unto her Father Tyndareus. Hereunto the great power of Agamemnon was not a little helping : for Agamemnon, befides his great Dominions in Peloponnesus, was Lord of many Hands: he was also rich in mony, and therefore the Arcadians were well contented to follow his pay, whom he embarked for Troy in his owne ships, which were more than any other of the Greek Princes brought to that expedition.

Thus did all Greece, either as bound by oath, or led by reputation and power of the two brethren, Agamemnon, and Menelaus; or defirous to partake of the profit and honour in that great enterprise; take armes against the Trojans. The Greeks Fleet was (by Homers account) 1200. sayle, or thereabouts: but the vessels were not great: for it was not then the manner to build ships with deckes; onely they used (as Thucydides faith) small ships, meet for robbing on the Sea; the least of which carried fifty men, the greatest 120. every man (except the Captaines) being both a Mariner and a Souldier. By this proportion it appeares that the Grecian army confished of 100000. men or thereabout. This was the greatest armie that ever was raised out of Greece: and the greatnesse of this armie doth well declare the strength and power of Troy, which tenwhole yeares did stand out against such forces: yet were the Trojans which inhabitedthe citie, not the tenth part of this number, as Agamemeon faid in the second of Homers Ilads; but their followers and aides were very many and strong. For all Phrygia, Lycia, Missia, and the greatest part of Asia the leffe, tooke part with the Trojans. The Amazons also brought them succour. And Rhefus out of Thrace, and Memnon out of Affivia (though some thinke out of Æthiopia) came to their defence.

Of the Grecians journey, and Embassage to Troy, and of Helena's being detained in Egypt, and of the sacrifising of Iphigenia.

Herefore the Greeks, unwilling to come to tryall of armes, if things might be compounded by treaty-fent Menelous and William To the State of the Sta be compounded by treaty, fent Menelaus and Uly fes Embaffadors to Trey. who demanded Helen, and the goods were taken with her out of Menelaus his house. What answer the Trojans made hereunto it is uncertaine. Herodorus from the report of the Egyptian Priests, makes it very probable, that Helen was taken from Paris before his returne to Troy. The fumme of his discourse is this. Paris in his return with Helena, being driven by foule weather unto the coast of Egypt, was accused for the rape of Helen by some bondmen of his, that had taken Sanctuary. Proteus then King of Egypt, finding the accusation true by examination, detained Helen and the goods taken with her, till her husband should require them: dismissing Paris without further punishment, because he was a stranger. When therefore the Greeks demanding Helen, had answer, that she was in Egypt, they thought themselves deluded. and thereupon made the warre, which ended with the ruine of Troy. But when after the City taken, they perceived indeed she had not beene there, they returned home, sending Menelaus to aske his wife of Proteus. Homer and the whole Nation of Poets (except Euripides) vary from this History, thinking it a matter more magnificent, and more gracefull to their Poems, for the retaining of a faire Lady, than that they endured all by force, because it lay not in their power to redeliver her. Yet in the fourth of his Odysfis, Homer speaks of Menelaus his being in Egypt, before he returned home to Sparta; which voyage it were not eafily believed that he made for pleasure: and if he were diven thither by contrary Windes, much more may we thinke that Paris was likely to have bin driven thither by foule Weather. For Paris immediately upon the rape committed, was enforced to flye, taking fuch Windes as he could get, and rather enduring any storme, than to commit himselfe to any Haven in the Greek Seas: whereas Menelaus might have put into any port in Greece, and there have remained with good entertainment, untill fuch time as the Windhad comeabout, and served for his NaviCHAP, 14. that landed first.

One great argument Herodotus brings to confirme the faying of the Egyptian Priefts which is, that if Helen had been at Troy, it had beene utter madnesse for Priamus to fee fo many miseries befall him, during the warre, and so many of his sonnes slaine for the pleasure of one, who neither was here to the Kingdome (for Hetter was elder) nor cqui invertue to many of the rest. Besides, it may seeme that Lucian spake not more plea fantly than truely, when he faid that Helen, at the warre of Troy, was almost as older Queene Hecuba, confidering that she had beene ravished by Theseus the companions Hercules, who tooke Troy when Priamus was very young; and confidering further, the the was fifter to Castor and Pollux (she and Pollux being said by some to have been twinnes) who failed with the Argonauts, having Telamon the father of Ajax in their com. pany, before the time that Hesione was taken; on whom Telamon begat Ajax, 'that was a principall Commander in the Trojan warre. But whether it were so that the Trojan could not, or would not reftore Helen, foit was that the Ambassadours returned contented, and not very well entreated, for there wanted not some that advised to have them flaine. The Greekes hereupon incensed, made all haste towards Troy: at which time Calchas (whom some say to have been a Runnagate Trojan, though no such thing be found in Homer) filled the Captaines, and all the Hoast with many troublesomean fwers and divinations. For he would have Agamemnons daughter facrificed to appeale Diana, whose anger, he said, withstood their passage. Whether the young Ladywer facrificed, or whether (as some write) the goddesse was contented with a Hinde, itisms needfull here to bee disputed of. Sure it is, that the malice of the Divell, which awaits for all opportunities, is never more importunate, than where mens ignorance is more Calchas also told the Greekes, that the taking of Troy was impossible, till some half impediments were removed : and that till ten yeares were past, the towne should hill out against them. All which notwithstanding, the Greekes proceeded in their entitle prise, under the command of Agamemnon, who was accompanied with his Brother M. nelaus: Achilles the most valiant of all the Greekes, his friend Patroclus, and his Tun Phanix; Ajax and Teucer, the fonnes of Telamon; Idomeneus, and his companion Main ones; Neftor and his fonnes Antilochus and Thrafymedes; Ulyfes, Mneftheus the fonned Petreus, Captaine of the Athenians; Diomedes the sonne of Tydeus, aman of singuir courage; the wife and learned Palamedes, Ascalaphus, and Jalmenus, the sonnes of Man, who had failed with the Argonauts; Philottetes also the sonne of Pean, who haddher rowes of Hercules, without which Calchas faid, that the Citie could not be taken; has the fon of Oileus, Peneleus, Thoas, Eumelus, Tylandrus, Euripilus, Athamas, Sthungs, Tlepolemus the sonne of Hercules; Podalyrius, and Machon, the sonnes of Asculapinis, E. peus, who is faid to have made the wooden Horse, by which the towne was taken; and Protesilans, who first leapt on shore, neglecting the Oracle that threatned death whim

Of the Acts of the Gracians at the fiege.

Hese, and many other of lesse note, arriving at Trey, found such sharpe entrainment, as might easily perswade them to thinke that the warre would be more than one yeares worke. For in the first encounter, they lost Protesium, whom Hester slew, and many other, without any great harme done to the Trajunt save only that by their numbers of men, they wan ground enough to incamp themselves in, as appeareth in Thucydides. The principall impediment which the Greekes sound, was want of victuals, which grew upon them by reason of their multitude, and the simulanesse of their vessels, wherein they could not carry necessaries for such an Armic Cherronesse. Others to rob upon the Sea for the reliefe of the Campe. Thus was the warre protracted nine whole yeares, and either nothing done, or if any skirmishes were, yet could the rowne receive little losse by them, having equal numbers to maintain the field against such Greekes as continued the siege, and a more safe retrait if the enemity got the better.

Wherefore Ovid faith, That from the first yeare, till the tenth, there was no fighting at all, & Heraclide commends as very credible, the report of Heraclicus, that the Gred did not lye before Troj the first nine yeares: but onely did beare up and downe the sea exercifing their men, and inriching themselves, and so by wasting the enemies countrie, did blocke up the towne, unto which they returned nor, untill the fatall time drew neere when it should be subverted.

This is confirmed by the enquirie which Priamus made, when the Greeke Princes came into the field, the tenth yeare, for he knew none of them; and therefore fitting upon an high tower (as Homer tels) he learned their names of Helen: which though it is Homeliad is like to be a fiction, yet could it not at all have beene supposed that he should be ignorant of them, if they had shewed themselves before the towne somany yeares together. Betweener these relations of Thucydides and Herodicus, the difference is not much; the one faving, that a few of the Greeks remained in the Camp before Troy, whileft the reft made Durveyance by land and by sea: the other, that the whole armie did spend the time in wasting the sea-coasts. Neither doe the Poets greatly disagree from these authors: for they make report of many townes and Ilands wasted, and the people carried into Captivitie; in which actions Achilles was imployed, whom the armie could not well, nor would have spared, if any service of importance had beene to be performed before the Citie. Howfoever it was, this is agreed by generall confent, that in the beginning of that Summer, in which Troy was taken, great booties were brought into the Campe, and agreat peffilence arose among the Greeks: which Homer faith, that Apollo sent in revenge of his Priefts daughter, whom Agamemnon had refused to let goe, for any ransome: but Heraclides interpreting the place, faith, that by Apollo was meant the Sunne, who raised peffilent Fogs, by which the armie was infected, being lodged in a moorish piece of ground. And it might well be that the campe was over-peftered with those, who had beene abroad, and now were lodged all close together: having also grounded their ships within the for ifications.

About the fame time arose much contention betweene Agamemnon and Achilles about the bootie, whereof Agamemnon, as Generall, having first chosen for his part a captive woman, and Achilles in the second place chosen for himselfe another, then Ajax, Whise, and so the rest of the chiefe Captaines in order: When the Soothsayer Calchus had willed that Agamemnons woman should be restored to her father Apollo's Priest, that so the Pestilence might cease, then did Agamemnon greatly rage, and say, that hee alone would not lose his part of the spoile, but would either take that which had been given to Achilles, or that which had fallento Ajax, or to Uhises. Hereupon Achilles desied him, but was faine to suffer all patiently, as not able to hold his Concubine by strong hand, nor to revenge her losse otherwise than by resusing to sight, or to send forth his Captaines. But the Greeks, encouraged by their Captains, presented themselves before the Cities without him on this traces.

the Citie without him and his troopes. The Trojans were now relieved with great fuccours, all the neighbour Countries having fent them aide: partly drawne to that warre by their Commanders who affisted Priamus for money, wherewith he abounded when the warre began (as appeares by his words in Homer,) or for love of himselfe and his sonnes, or hope of marriage with some of his many and faire daughters; partly also (as we may well ghesse) incited by the wrongs received of the Greekes when they wasted the Countries adjoyning unto Trey. So that when Hettor issued out of the towne, he was little inferiour to his enemies in numbers of men, or qualitie of their Leaders. The principall Captaines in the Trojanarmie, were Hettor, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, and the other fonnes of Priamus: Aneas, Antenor, and his fonnes, Polydamas, Sarpedon, Glaucus, Asins, and the fonnes of Panthus, beides Rhefus, who was flaine the first night of his arrivall; Memnon, Queene Penthesilea, and others who came towards the end of the warre. Betweene the fe and the Greeks were many battels fought: the greatest of which were, that at the tombe of King Ilus upon he Plain: and another at the very trenches of the Campe, wherein Hellor brake through hefortifications of the Greeks, and began to fire their ships; at which time Ajax, the onof Telamon, with his brother Teucer, were in a manner the onely men of note that remaining unwounded, made head against Hettor, when the state of the Greekes was almost

Another battell (for so antiquitie calls it) or rather the same renewed, was fought by atroclus, who having obtained leave, drew forth Achilles troopes, relieving the wearie freekes with a fresh supply. Agamemnon, Diomedes, Ulyses, and the rest of the Princes, mough fore wounded, yet were driven to put on armour, and with helpe of Passocius, repelled the Trojans very hardly. For in that fight Patroclus was loft, and his bodie, with much contention recovered by his friends, was brought backe into the Campe: thear. mour of Achilles which he had put on, being torne from him by Hector. It was the manner of those warres, having slaine a man, to strip him and hale away his bodie, not resto. ring it without ransome, if he were one of marke. Of the vulgar little reckoning was made: for they fought all on foot, flightly armed, and commonly followed the fuccess of their Captaines; who rode not upon horses, but in Chariots, drawne by two or three horses, which were guided by some trustie followers of theirs, which drave up and downe the field, as they were directed by the Captains, who by the swiftnesse of their horses presenting themselves where need required, threw first their Javelins, and then and lighting, fought on foot, with swords and battel-axes, retiring into the ranks of footmen or else returning to their Chariots when they found cause, and so began again with anew dart as they could get it, if their old were lost or broken. Their armes defensive were helmets, breft-plates, boots of braffe, or other mettall, and shields commonly of leather plated over. The offensive were swords and battel-axes at hand; and stones, arrows or dans when they fought at any distance. The use of their Chariots (besides the swiftnesse) was to keep them from wearinesse, whereto the leaders were much subject, because of their armour, which the strongest and stoutest ware heaviest : also that from them they might throw their Javelins downwards, with the more violence. Of which weapon I find not that any carried more than one or two into the field: wherefore they were oftendriven in to return to their tents for a new one when the old was gone. Likewise of armours they had little change or none; every man (speaking of the chiefe) carried his own complete, of which if any piece were lost or broken, he was driven to repaire it with the like, the had any fitting, taken from fome Captaine whom he had flain, and stripped: orelleto borrow of them that had by fuch means gotten some to spare. Wheras therefore Adult les had lost his armour which Hettor (as is faid before) had taken from the bodie of Pana clus, he was fain to await the making of new, ere he could enter the fight: whereof hebe came very defirous, that he might revenge the death of Patroclus his deare friend.

At this time Agamemnon reconciled himselfe unto Achilles, not onely restoring his concubine Brifeis, but giving him very great gifts, and excufing former matters as well and he might. In the next battell Achilles did so behave himselfe, that he did not onely put the Trojans to the worst, but also slew the valiant Hestor, whom (if Homer may heren be believed) he chaced three times about the walls of Troy. But great question may be made of Homers truth in this narration. For it is not likely that Hetter would stay alone without the Citie (as Homer doth report of him) when all the Trojans were fled into it: nor that he could leape over the rivers of Xanthus and Simos, as he must have done in that flight: nor that the Trojans, perceiving Hellor in fuch an extremitie, would have forborne to open some of their gates and lethim in. But this is reported onely to grace Achilles, who having (by what meanes foever) flaine the noble Hedor, did not onely carry away his dead bodie, as the custome then was, but boring holes in his feet, and thrust # ing leatherne thongs into them, tyed him to his Chariot, and dragging him shamefully about the field, felling the dead bodie to his father Priamus for a very great ransome. But his crucltie and coverousnesse were not long unrevenged; for he was shortly after slame with an arrow by Paris, as Homer fayes, in the Scaan Gate; or as others, in the Templeof Apollo, whither he came to have married Polyxena the daughter of Priamus, with whom he was too farre in love, having flaine so many of her brethren; and his bodie was ranso med(as Lycophron faith) at the felfe-fame rate that Hellors was by him fold for Notlong afterthis, Penthefilea Queen of the Amazons arrived at Troy, who after some proofegiven of her valour, was flaine by Pyrrbus the fon of Achilles.

Inally, after the death of many worthie persons on each side, the Citie Was taken by night, as all Writers agree: but whether by the treason of Enew and Antenor; or by a woodden Horse, as the Poets, and common fame

(which followed the Poets) have delivered, it is uncertaine. Some write that upon one of the gates of Troy, called Scea, was the image of a horse, and that the Greekes entring by that gate, gave occasion to the report, that the Citie was taken by an artificial horses It may well be that with some wooden engine, which they called an horse, they either did batter the wals, as the Romanes in after-times used to do with the Rammetor scaled the wals upon the sudden, and so tooke the Citie. As for the hiding of men in the hollow bodie of a woodden horse, it had bin a desperate adventure, and serving to no purpole. For either the Trojans might have perceived the deceit, and flaine all those Princes of Greece, that were inclosed in it (which also by such as maintaine this report they are faid to have thought upon: Jor they might have left it a few dayes without the Citie for it was unlikely, that they should the very first day both conclude upon the bringing ir into the towne, and breake downe their wals upon the fudden to doe it:) by which meanes they who were thut into it, must have perished for hunger a if they had not by iffing forth unfeafonably discovered the invention. Whereas further it is faid, that this horse was so high and great, that it could not bee brought into the towne through any of the gares, and that therefore the Trojans were faine to pull downe a part of their wall to make way for it, through which breach the Greekes did afterwards enter: it is hereby manifest, that the inclosing of so many principall men was altogether needlesse, confidering that without their helpe there was way fufficient for the armie, fo that the furprising of any gate by them was now to no purpose. .

John Baptista Gramay in his Historic of Asia, discoursing of this warre, saith that the Greekes did both batter the wals with a woodden engine, and were also let into the Citie by Antenor, at the Schan gate: the townesmen seeping and drinking without feare or care, because the fleet of the Grecians had hoisted faile, and was gone the day before to the fle of Tenedos, thereby to bring the Trojans into security. That the Citie was betraved, the books of Dares and Dyttis must prove, which whether we now have the same that were by them written, it may be suspected; for surely they who have made mention of these writers in ancient times, would not as they did, have followed the reports of Humer and others quite contradictorie in most points to these two authors, without once taking notice of the opposition, which they having served in that warre made against the common report: had it not beene that either those bookes were even in those times thought frivolous, or elfe contained no fuch repugnancie to the other Authours as now is

Allo concerning the number of men flaine in this warre, which Dares and Dyttis fay to have beene above 600000. on the Trojan fide, and more than 800000. of the Greeks, it is a report meerely fabulous; for as much as the whole Fleet of the Greekes was reckonedby Homer, who extolled their armie and deedes as much as he could, to bee fomewhat leffethan 1200. faile, and the armie therein transported over the Greeke feas, not much above 100000. men, according to the rate formerly mentioned. But it is the common fullion of men to extoll the deeds of their Ancients: for which cause both Homer magnified the Captaines of the Greekes that served in the warre, and Virgil with others were as diligent in commending and extolling the Trojans and their Citie, from which the Romanes descended. Yea, the Athenians long after in the warre which Xerxes the Persian King made against all Greece, did not for beanto vaunt of the great cunning which Mneffeus the fon of Peteus had shewed in marshalling the Grecian army before Troy: whereupon, as if it had bin a matter of much consequence, they were so proud, that they refused to yeeld unto Gelon King of almost all Sicily, the Admiralty of their Seas, notwithstanding that he promised to bring 200. good fighting ships, and 30000 men for their defence.

The like vanitie possessed many other Cities of Greece, and many Nations in these Parts of the world, which have striven to bring their descent from some of the Princes that warred at Troy : all difficulties or unlikelihoods in fuch their Pedigree notwithstanding. But those Nations which indeed, or in most probabilitie, came of the Trojans, were the Albanes in Italie; and from them the Romans, brought into that Country by Aneas: the Venetians first scatted in Padua, and the Country adjoyning by Antenor: the Chaonians planted in Epirus by Helenus, the sonne of King Priamus, To which Hellanicus addeth, that the posteritie of Hector did assemble such of the Trojans as were left, and reigned over them about Troy.

Oncerning the Greeks, they tasted as much miserie as they had brought upon the Trojans. For Thucydides notes, that by reason of their long abode at the siege, they found many alterations when they returned for that many were driven by their borderers from their ancient seats: many were expelled their Countries by facilion: some were slaine anon after their arrivall: others were debarred from the Soveraigntic among the people, by fuch as had flayed at home. The cause of all which may feeme to have beene the dispersion of the Armie, which, weakned much by the li calamities of that long warre, was of little force to repell injuries, being divided intofo many pieces under feverall Commanders, not very well agreeing. For (befides other quarrels ariling upon the division of the bootie, and the like occasions) at the time when they should have set Taile, Agamemnon and his brother fell out, the one being desirous to depart immediately, the other to flay and perform some facrifices to Minerva. Herupon they fell to hot words, halfe the fleet remaining with Agamemnon, the rest of them falled to the Ile of Tenedas; where when they arrived, they could not agree among themselves, but fome returned backeto Agameninon; others were dispersed, each holding his own courfe. But the whole fleet was fore vexed with tempests: for Pallas (as Homer faith) would not be perswaded in haste. .

They with returned fafe were Nefter and Pyrrbus, whom Oreftes afterwards flewalfo Idomeneus and Philoctetes, who neverthelesse, as Virgittells, were driven soone afterto fecke new feats: Idomeness among the Salentines, and Philothetes at Petilia in Italia. Ma. memnon likewise returned home; but was forthwith slaine by his wife, and by the Adulterer Agysibus, who for a while after usurped his Kingdome. Menelaus wandring long upon the Seas, came into Egypt, either with Helen, or (as may rather feeme) to fetchler. uly fes, after ten years, having loft all his company, got home in poore effate, withmuch ado recovering the mastership of his own house. All the rest either perished by the way,
